difficulties might have existed as to the enforcement of what had been the law for 1,200 years, and, indeed, since Christianity was part of the law of the land—since 1835 the path had been plain and the road clear, and there could be no doubt that those marriages in the cognizance of every Court of Law were null and void. They were always null and void before; but a defect in procedure prevented the enforcement of the law in the temporal Courts. Their Lordships were asked to pass that Bill because it had been repeatedly brought up to them from the Lower House. Now, to urge that the measure had constantly received the support of the House of Commons was grossly to misrepresent the real facts of the case. The measure had been before Parliament since 1841, and there had been eight or nine Parliaments since then, and, speaking broadly, the measure had been before every one of those Parliaments. In the Parliament elected in 1841 the House of Commons refused to allow the Bill to be introduced at all. In the Parliament elected in 1847 the Bill was twice read a second time. In the Parliament of 1852 it was once read a second time and once rejected on the second reading. In the Parliament of 1857 the Bill was twice read a second time; in that of 1859 the House of Commons twice rejected it; in that of 1866 they rejected it once; in that of 1868 the second reading was four times carried; and in that elected in 1874 the second reading was negatived. This showed that in the majority of Parliaments the House of Commons refused to accept the Bill, and in the Parliament most favourable to the Bill, that of 1868, the majority in favour diminished from 100 to 35. So far as any argument could be drawn from the House of Commons its votes were conclusive against the Bill. Certainly, the noble Baron ought to be convinced by these statistics that the Bill had not been hitherto defeated by the action of the Episcopal Bench; and even when the Bill was last before their Lordships' House, the second reading was rejected by a majority of lay Peers. He thought the reference to the Episcopal Bench was an invidious one, and devoid of the basis of fact. But he did not know any question for which the presence of Bishops in that House was more appropriate than one such as this affecting the interests of morality and religion. The majority of the House of Commons had rejected the Bill; and, therefore, he hoped their Lordships would not listen to misrepresentations which were industriously circulated. The law of England, as it was in this matter, had stood for 1,200 years. It was clearly defined by the Westminster Confession of Faith. The principle there laid down was that a man might not marry of his wife's kin one nearer than he might of his own. This was the principle on which the law rested, and if that principle were once encroached upon he could not tell how they were to escape from further encroachments. The whole of the English family-life rested on the clear lines of this marriage law, and once they departed from those lines they could not possibly stop. It was said there was no country in Europe where these marriages were not allowed, and they were told to take the case of Germany; but their Lordships had not been told that wherever these marriages were allowed, marriages between uncles and nieces were permitted. Among the Royal Houses of Germany arrangements of this description were frequent from political purposes; and there was one case in which a ruling Prince had married two of his own nieces in succession who were sisters. The noble Baron told them to look at America. He should decline to go to America. He did not prefer the social and domestic life of America to that of England. He might point to the peculiar arrangements that prevailed in certain classes in the United States, and would refer their Lordships to the enormous number of divorces as a proof of how slender was the family tie in that country. In whose interest was this change in the law proposed? It could not benefit the children, for in thousands of families the children received the greatest possible benefit from the tender teaching of the mother's sister. But if this Bill became law, the aunt could not give the same attention to her sister's children which she now gave, and desolation and dismay would be brought into hundreds and thousands of homes. Jealousy would take the place of love, and suspicion would be found where now there was confidence. They would not increase the confidence of the children in the aunt by making her a stepmother. It would not benefit the widower, who now was able to seek consolation with his wife's relatives, but who, were this Bill to become law, would be deprived of their society for himself and his children. Who, then, would benefit by this Bill? The rich and powerful? No one ventured to say so, and therefore he would pass over that part of the question with this remark—that the money lavished in promoting this Bill could not have come from the very poor. Would this alteration of the law satisfy those who were moving in the matter? He deplored the well-known fact that among the lower classes so many men and women should be living together without being bound by the marriage tie; but that was no proof that this was owing to the restrictions imposed by the law upon marriages of the description now in question. He had been supplied with some statistics referring to a certain parish, by which it appeared that out of a total of nearly 30 cases there were three cases of union with a deceased wife's sister, and two cases of union with a wife's sister while the wife was still living; but there were seven cases of men living with their own daughters, ten cases of men living with their own sisters, and six cases of men living with their own nieces. Therefore he said that if they were to deal with the case of the poor, this measure really brought them no relief whatever; but it did unsettle the foundation of our marriage law. The noble Baron had alluded to the Roman law in respect to marriage in terms of depreciation. But he would read to their Lordships a passage from the history of Mr. Gibbon, which would show in what light the Romans regarded this subject. He says—

“The freedom of love and marriage was restrained among the Romans by natural and civil impediments. An instinct almost innate and universal appears to prohibit the incestuous commerce of parents and children in the infinite series of ascending and descending generations. Concerning the oblique and collateral branches, nature is indifferent, reason mute, and custom various and arbitrary. In Egypt the marriage of brothers and sisters was admitted without scruple or exception; a Spartan might espouse the daughter of his father, an Athenian that of his mother; and the nuptials of an uncle with his niece were applauded at Athens as a happy union of the dearest relations. The profane law-givers of Rome were never tempted by interest or superstition to multiply the forbidden degrees; but they inflexibly condemned the marriage of sisters and brothers, hesitated whether first cousins should be touched by the same interdict, and revered the parental character of aunts and uncles, and treated affinity . . . as a just imitation of the ties of blood.”

On one occasion, when this Bill was under consideration in the House of Commons, Lord Russell said that if they made this change in the law they could not stop there—that this change would be, in his opinion, utterly imperfect unless they made it applicable to both sexes and to all degrees of relationship. Those who sought to defend this Bill by resorting to the Scriptural argument would find themselves standing on very slippery ground. He implored the House not to pass the Bill, because it would destroy the happiness of English homes and the trust and purity of English family life, while it would introduce confusion into our law.

Amendment moved, to leave out (“now”) and add at the end of the Motion (“this day three months.”)—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

VISCOUNT LIFFORD said, that while he could not agree with the arguments of the noble Earl who had just sat down (Earl Beauchamp), neither could he altogether join in the conclusions of the noble Baron (Lord Houghton) who moved the second reading. Our marriage law, no doubt, was founded upon the Levitical law; but there was nothing in Holy Scriptures which in any way tended to forbid such marriages as those with a deceased wife's sister, and it was not until that most iniquitous Pope, Alexander VI., sanctioned the restriction in the Canon Law that such a restriction became a law of the Church. He would here take the liberty of reminding the right rev. Bench that the Canon Law prohibited the marriage of priests. He thought he need hardly ask whether the right rev. Prelates acknowledged such marriages to be null and void? His own opinion was that these marriages, not being forbidden by the law of God, it became very much a matter of taste and inclination, and there was no reason why we should not revert to the old Levitical law. He believed that these marriages were much more numerous than was imagined, and the reason was that the people who contracted them considered that they were doing nothing contrary to Scriptural law. On the whole, he had come to the conclusion to support the Bill.

LORD COLERIDGE: I should like to say in a few sentences why I am still unable to vote for the second reading, or adopt the principle, of this Bill. It is not a question to be looked at from a Party point of view, nor is one's judgment upon it to be affected by Party considerations. Why supporting it should be supposed to be a portion of the Liberal creed I have never been able to make out; why Liberals more than Tories should desire this particular marriage, or care less than Tories for the comfort and delight which unmarried sisters-in-law can give, I confess passes my comprehension. It is possible that the grounds on which this measure is opposed do not approve themselves to the majority of Liberals; but dissent from some of the reasons of opposition is quite consistent with a strong dislike for other reasons to the thing which is opposed. So, at least, I find it in my case, and I will, with your leave, proceed to tell your Lordships why. I do not argue the religious question. I do not pretend to oppose the sanctioning of this measure because it is forbidden either in the Old Testament or the New. I have no pretence to the scholarship which would enable me to appreciate the Old Testament argument; and I can see nothing in the text of the New Testament, at any rate, in terms directed against this marriage. But if it were otherwise, I should deliberately refuse to argue the question upon any such grounds. Such reasons, if they exist, are no doubt binding on the consciences of those who believe in their existence; but they have no force for those who do not, and it is useless—it is merely irritating—to attempt to silence an adversary by an authority which he does not acknowledge; it is a waste of time to argue except on common ground and from premisses which are admitted. Thus much, and thus much only, I think, may be said from a religious point of view. We are standing upon an existing state of things; to change it will, in the opinion of many persons entitled to respect, be a breach of religious obligation. Without disputing whether it be so or not, you who wish the change ought to have some very strong reasons of another sort to justify you in changing the law when the change will so heavily affect many good and honourable men. Thus far, and thus far only, do I feel inclined to push the religious argument. Furthermore, I freely admit that the whole question of marriage is more or less one of convention. Reflection shows us that there is, with hardly an exception—parent and child is probably no exception—no abstract right or wrong in these things. The marriage law of any country as to the degrees within which marriage is to be contracted is the result of what the cultivated intelligence of that country thinks wisest and best for the regulation of that sacred and intimate relation from time to time. It is obvious that connections from which we now quite rightly shrink, and which we quite rightly esteem as unholy and impure, and therefore as unlawful, were sometimes, must have been under some circumstances, pure and chaste and lawful. There is not a trace that Abraham's marriage with his half-sister shocked the feelings of the writer of the Book of Genesis. The Ptolomies and Cleopatras, following in this the customs of the Persians, allowed marriages between brothers and sisters of the whole blood apparently without scandal. To the nobler civilization of the Romans this connection had become intensely repulsive in the time of Juvenal. His condemnation of the Jewish King—

"Barbarus incestæ dedit hunc Agrippa Sorori." is familiar to your Lordships. Yet to the Romans themselves the marriage of an uncle and a niece from the time of Claudius and Agrippina to the days of the Christian Emperor Constans was allowed without offence by the public law of the Roman Empire. It would be tiresome and pedantic to multiply examples. What I wish to draw from those with which I have troubled you is the consequence that you cannot argue conclusively from any former times that in this matter of marriage you must get, if you can, at the general sentiment, and aim at the general good, and that you should maintain that which conduces to the general good and which the general sentiment approves. Now, can it be said that the general sentiment approves this marriage? Go back 20 years, and no one can say that the current of opinion has, on the whole, been in its favour. The House of Commons has repeatedly rejected it. Even in the Parliament of 1868 the majorities in its favour steadily and largely diminished. Your Lordships' House—not a popular elective Assembly indeed—yet in this, which is not a Party question, no bad index of the sentiment of educated men—has steadily rejected it. The richer and well-to-do are classes at least much divided on it. The poorer—I rejoice to think that we have nothing of the exploded nonsense as to its being a poor man's question—are, as far as I may presume to speak of them in my part of England, certainly against it. Scotland is not, perhaps, unanimously, but largely, against it. So, happily, without distinction of creed, is Ireland too. In all this I am speaking of men, and of men only. But to every marriage besides the man there is another party, and that is the woman. And whatever unpopularity may have been incurred, justly or unjustly, by woman's rights and by those who advocate them, it will, I suppose, hardly be disputed that in such a matter as this women have rights, and equal rights with men. If the vast majority of Englishwomen in point of number, if the great majority of refined and cultivated Englishwomen are opposed to this measure, if it is abhorrent to their feelings, what right have we, even if we were all agreed, to overbear them and disregard their wishes? That the women of these Islands in an enormous majority are opposed to it I absolutely believe. Such a matter as this is not easy of demonstration. I can but speak as I believe. I know that many women who shrank from any public action some years ago did not shrink from petitioning against this Bill. I know that amongst my own acquaintances I scarcely know one who supports it. I know that, as a rule, men most in earnest in support of the measure have admitted to me with regret that the women, as a whole, dislike it. I do not deny to Englishmen the legal power; I do deny to Englishmen the moral right to pass a law of marriage contrary to the wishes and repulsive to the feelings of the great body of their countrywomen. It is not generous, it is not manly, it is not, in my opinion, just. That there are some men who wish to contract this marriage, and some women too, of course I am not so foolish as to deny; but that the majority of those who support this measure are eagerly desiring to marry their sisters-in-law I must entirely disbelieve. It is, and always has been, the result of an agitation for which I have neither sympathy or respect. And, further, I believe that a like case and a like agitation might be got up for legalizing marriage with any other kinswoman of the wife. Certainly, for example, with the wife's niece, if the same trouble were taken and the same money spent. I could have some sympathy and some respect for an agitation which had for its object a reconsideration of the whole marriage law, which went upon some principle which distinguished, for example, broadly between consanguinity and affinity, between kinsfolk and connections. I do not say I should agree with, but I should respect and understand an argument founded upon a sensible distinction which said that the kindred of the wife were not the kindred of the husband, nor the kindred of the husband the kindred of the wife. But this Bill is founded on no principle; it sets man free, but it leaves woman bound. It lets the husband marry his wife's sister, because it is said she is not his sister; but it forbids the wife to marry her husband's brother because he is her brother. Where is the justice, where is the common fairness of this? Suppose it were stepchildren, where there is no blood in common, would anyone bear for an instant with a proposition that a man might marry his wife's daughter, but that a woman might not marry her husband's son? My noble Friend knows that he dare not bring forward a measure founded upon any principle. He knows that the whole feeling of the country would rise against it with indignant scorn. Is it unfair, then, to say that this is advocated to please a few men who have broken the law, and to set free a few men more who wish to break it, but who are firmly determined that the liberty they claim themselves they will deny to their widows? My Lords, I deny that the general sentiment supports the Bill. I deny also that it is for the general good. It is not easy to overstate the benefit which the whole of society derives from the social relations at present possible between the husband and the wife, and the family of the other. Affection into which passion does not enter is the great civilizer of mankind. Passion we share with the brutes. The lowest savages equal in passion the most civilized races in the world. But unpassionate affection refines and lifts up, and is the source of half the graces and more than half the beauty and delight of social life. Now your wife's sisters are your own, and the circle of unpassionate affection is largely widened. But pass this Bill and they become to you like any other women, and the circle of unpassionate affection is at once contracted. My Lords, I admit that, as a rule, you should be tender to minorities. I admit that, if possible, you should indulge men's affections. But this is a case in which you cannot indulge the wishes of the minority without doing a great injustice, and inflicting a terrible hardship on the majority. Let me explain. Most men do not lose their wives, and for them this Bill has no significance. To some men there comes a time when a great shadow falls upon them, when the light of their life goes out and hope dies within them. Some of them recover, form fresh ties, begin their lives again, and marry another woman. The majority of such men do not wish to marry their sisters-in-law, and for them, too, this Bill is of no use, but may be most mischievous. There remain those who do not recover, and who do not desire to form new ties of marriage. To these men and to those who do re-marry, till they re-marry, the society of a sister-in-law is a blessing perfectly unspeakable. Who can count the sum of innocent delight and comfort which this relation has given to men who most need such comfort, and at a time when they need it most? Why, for the sake of the few who do want to marry their wives' sisters, are sisters-in-law to be abolished for the vast majority of those men who do not so wish? Because you do abolish them. I said many years ago, and I venture to repeat it here because it is true, that by passing this measure you point out by statute the sister-in-law as the proper Parliamentary successor of the wife, and what modest woman will put herself in the way of a succession when most people will say that she is manifestly seeking it? Why is this hardship to be done to the great majority who are contented with the law for the sake of a very few who want to break it? My Lords, I will admit that the law of marriage having been altered in some of our Colonies, and altered in the direction of this Bill, somewhat complicates the question. As to some of them I do not deny that the law of marriage is within their competence to alter. Disliking this marriage as I do, I myself, when Attorney General, advised, I believe—the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies will correct me if I am wrong—that Colonial Statutes, at least in the case of some Colonies, for such an object were not illegal. But much as I regret this, and disagreeable as some of the consequences may be, I cannot admit that we are to change a law which we in these Islands think for the general good because our Colonies have passed a law which we do not think wise or beneficial. I will not speak of dragging down or dragging up; but I say that if in a matter of social concern affecting the tenderest and holiest relations of life, one or the other is to give way, it ought not to be this great country, the mother of nations, the home of a domestic purity and happiness, I will not say unequalled, but I will say unsurpassed, in the whole history of the world. There is much more to say, but I will not longer abuse a patience which I know I must have tried; and on these grounds, most inadequately and imperfectly stated, I ask your Lordships to reject a measure which tampers dangerously with a most delicate yet a most important subject upon no fixed principle, without sufficient reasons, with aims which are not entitled to respect and sympathy, and which I believe will lower the morality and impair the happiness of the great mass of the people.

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble and learned Lord who has just sat down has said what really amounts to a truism—namely, that this question is not a Party question. His putting it so clearly encourages me, in my personal capacity, and entirely apart from any Party connection or feeling, to say a few words, although I am not prepared to make any elaborate speech on this subject. The noble and learned Lord asked why it should be thought that this question should recommend itself more to the Party with which I am connected than to the Conservative Party. I can give no answer to that, except that the idea may have originated in the fact that the tendency of the Liberal Party is to think that any restriction upon freedom requires to be carefully justified on the ground of the public advantage. The noble Baron who has introduced this

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Justice Denman and Mr. Justice Lopes, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the Borough of Macclesfield.

MACCLESFIELD ELECTION.

Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

To The Rt. Honble.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

We, the Honble. George Denman, and Sir Henry Lopes, knt., Judges for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Act, certify that upon the 21st day of June 1880, and the following day, we held a Court at Macclesfield for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the Borough of Macclesfield, between Isaac Day, Charles Shaw, James Gayes, and Edward Fairhurst, Petitioners; and William Coare Brocklehurst and David Chadwick, Respondents.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, We certify that we determined that the said Respondents were not duly elected and returned, and that the said Election is void.

And we hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

VOL. CLIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

And whereas charges were made in the said Petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Act, report in writing to you as follows:—

1. That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any Candidate at the said Election.

2. That the following persons were proved at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices at the said Election:—John Baker, William Johnson, William Smale.

3. That we have reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the Election to which the said Petition relates.

GEORGE DENMAN.

HENRY C. LOPES.

Bewdley,

June 23rd 1880.

And the said Certificate and Report were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

MR. BRADLAUGH.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to give Notice that I shall move on Tuesday next that the Resolution passed by the House in regard to Mr. Bradlaugh on Tuesday, the 22nd of June, be read and rescinded. I will take this opportunity of asking the Prime Minister, Whether the Government will afford me on that day facilities for bringing the matter before the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have not had any opportunity of consulting my Colleagues on this important question. Therefore, I wish to reserve my answer in a certain degree—that is to say, as to the particular form of proceeding it may be right to adopt—but as to that which I take to be the essential part of the Question which has just been put to me, I will say that I certainly am of opinion—I can undertake to say on the part of my Colleagues that we are distinctly of opinion—after the proceedings of yesterday, that it is requisite and necessary the subject of Mr. Bradlaugh's right should be effectually re-considered, and we will consider at the sitting of the Cabinet tomorrow what may be the best method of proceeding. I may also say at once to the hon. Member that I think the day for such consideration should not be later than Tuesday next.

hear it said that the cases in which a widower and his wife's sister share the same home are very few. I believe, on the contrary, that in certain parts of the country they are very numerous indeed. The noble and learned Lord says this is a question to be decided entirely by the cultivated minds of the community, and that the cultivated women of the country do not desire the change. Well, the law does not oblige these cultivated women to marry, and there is not the slightest obligation upon them to marry their sisters' widowers; but it surely would be wrong, because they may not wish to do so, to deprive others of that which they believe would be a great consolation to them. The noble and learned Lord stated that the feeling in Scotland was opposed to this Bill. But only a few days ago a Memorial in favour of this Bill was presented on behalf of the Convention of all the Royal and Parliamentary Burghs in Scotland, after a resolution had been passed by an enormous majority in support of the measure. It was stated at the time that in Scotland the practice of marriage with a deceased wife's sister was largely followed by the poor, and was rapidly spreading among the middle classes, and that these marriages were contracted without exciting the slightest moral or social reprobation in the circles in which they took place. In conclusion, I wish to say that no real reason has been given us why this amendment of the law should not be made; and, therefore, I, for one, will cheerfully give my support to the second reading of the Bill.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, that it had been suggested that the right rev. Bench ought not to seek to impose its ecclesiastical opinions upon Nonconformists. But was it not possible that those who sat upon the Episcopal Bench should take an enlarged view of an important question quite apart from ecclesiastical considerations? He did not desire to touch upon any ecclesiastical considerations, but to deal with the matter simply as one which concerned all classes of the community. The Bill before their Lordships was, in fact, a Bill for the abolition of the table of prohibited degrees. Now those degrees were degrees of nearness; they prohibited marriage in the nearer degrees and allowed it in the more remote. The Bill allowed the near, and prohibited the more remote. A man was to be allowed to marry his wife's sister, but not the wife's niece. The Bill, in fact, would put an end to the idea of nearness of kin in relation to marriage. To talk of nearness of kin in the connection of marriage would be thenceforth idle words. He was surprised at the statement of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) that the present law was only 45 years old. He always hesitated to dispute a statement of the noble Earl; but he was bound to say that his statement was absolutely incorrect. He understood that in a leading case decided about 19 years ago it was stated by the Lord Chancellor that Lord Lyndhurst's Act made no change in the law; it only related to procedure. Moreover, the question of a deceased wife's sister was not mentioned from beginning to end of the Act. The Act made a retrospective distinction between affinity and consanguinity, and thus embraced the whole range of incestuous marriages. The House could not deal with the question otherwise than by making a broad distinction between marriages of affinity and of consanguinity. Lord Lyndhurst's Bill dealt merely with procedure, leaving the law of England exactly where it had been for 300 years. The right rev. Bench were interested in the question for other than purely ecclesiastical reasons. They were often, as a social matter, asked to advise on the question of marriage. If the Bill were passed, and they were consulted on the advisability of a marriage between persons related by affinity, they would be asked what possible ground they could have for discouraging such marriages, when the principle on which they were prohibited had been abandoned. He had not heard a shadow of reason in favour of the Bill. He should have thought that such a Bill would not have been brought in light-heartedly. It was proposed to do away with one principle without substituting another. On so important a question he thought that the advice of competent and learned men would have been sought before the introduction of such a measure. But he did not think that narrow prejudices should be imputed to the episcopal body without better reasons than he had heard that evening.

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN: My Lords, I would not have risen but for an ex-

I will take this opportunity of asking the Prime Minister, Whether the Government will afford me on that day facilities for bringing the matter before the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have not had any opportunity of consulting my Colleagues on this important question. Therefore, I wish to reserve my answer in a certain degree—that is to say, as to the particular form of proceeding it may be right to adopt—but as to that which I take to be the essential part of the Question which has just been put to me, I will say that I certainly am of opinion—I can undertake to say on the part of my Colleagues that we are distinctly of opinion—after the proceedings of yesterday, that it is requisite and necessary the subject of Mr. Bradlaugh's right should be effectually re-considered, and we will consider at the sitting of the Cabinet tomorrow what may be the best method of proceeding. I may also say at once to the hon. Member that I think the day for such consideration should not be later than Tuesday next.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Justice Denman and Mr. Justice Lopes, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the Borough of Macclesfield.

MACCLESFIELD ELECTION.

Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

To The Rt. Honble.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

We, the Honble. George Denman, and Sir Henry Lopes, knt., Judges for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Act, certify that upon the 21st day of June 1880, and the following day, we held a Court at Macclesfield for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the Borough of Macclesfield, between Isaac Day, Charles Shaw, James Gayes, and Edward Fairhurst, Petitioners; and William Coare Brocklehurst and David Chadwick, Respondents.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, We certify that we determined that the said Respondents were not duly elected and returned, and that the said Election is void.

And we hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

VOL. COLIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

And whereas charges were made in the said Petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Act, report in writing to you as follows:—

1. That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any Candidate at the said Election.

2. That the following persons were proved at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices at the said Election:—John Baker, William Johnson, William Smale.

3. That we have reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the Election to which the said Petition relates.

GEORGE DENMAN.

HENRY C. LOPES.

Bewdley,

June 23rd 1880.

And the said Certificate and Report were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

MR. BRADLAUGH.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to give Notice that I shall move on Tuesday next that the Resolution passed by the House in regard to Mr. Bradlaugh on Tuesday, the 22nd of June, be read and rescinded. I will take this opportunity of asking the Prime Minister, Whether the Government will afford me on that day facilities for bringing the matter before the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have not had any opportunity of consulting my Colleagues on this important question. Therefore, I wish to reserve my answer in a certain degree—that is to say, as to the particular form of proceeding it may be right to adopt—but as to that which I take to be the essential part of the Question which has just been put to me, I will say that I certainly am of opinion—I can undertake to say on the part of my Colleagues that we are distinctly of opinion—after the proceedings of yesterday, that it is requisite and necessary the subject of Mr. Bradlaugh's right should be effectually re-considered, and we will consider at the sitting of the Cabinet tomorrow what may be the best method of proceeding. I may also say at once to the hon. Member that I think the day for such consideration should not be later than Tuesday next.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I wish to ask the hon. Member for

Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), Whether, in accordance with the declaration that he made yesterday, it is Mr. Bradlaugh's intention to continue his attempts to disturb the peace of the House? ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I cannot allow the noble Lord to put a Question with regard to the intentions of Mr. Bradlaugh. I am bound to say that such a Question is irregular, and is not a question relating to any Bill or Motion before the House, and therefore cannot be put.

Afterwards—

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, with reference to the answer the Prime Minister has given to the sitting Member for Northampton, which I understand to convey his decision to announce to the House what conclusion the Government may come to on the suggestion for rescinding the Resolution of Tuesday last, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, for the convenience of hon. Members, and for your convenience, Mr. Speaker, Whether, until he has made the announcement of the Government, he will resist any attempt to use the privilege given by the Standing Order of 1866 of raising the question at any time, or to renew past scenes, which may be attempted on the part of Mr. Bradlaugh or his Friends?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not quite sure that I caught the meaning of the hon. Gentleman. What is the privilege that he refers to?

MR. NEWDEGATE: I will put the matter very shortly. The right hon. Gentleman, as Leader of this House, has announced that he will communicate to this House the opinion of the Government with respect to the present position of the person who claims to represent Northampton. ["Oh, oh!"] May I not be allowed to answer the right hon. Gentleman? I want to know, Whether, as Leader of the House, until he has made that announcement, he will resist any attempt to renew the scene which occurred on Wednesday in this House.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: Before my right hon. Friend answers that Question, perhaps he will also inform the House, Whether, supposing the case is taken on Tuesday, it will be at a Morning Sitting or at 4 o'clock.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, as I understand the matter, the Question would be raised at the Morning Sitting on Tuesday, and what I have said was on that assumption. It is quite possible, however, that it may be the subject of re-consideration on Monday. I am at present under the impression that if the Motion is made, it will not be desirable for those who make it, or for those who resist it, to enter upon a revival or renewal of the lengthened arguments we lately had on the occasion of the former debate. If the meaning of the Question is what course I shall take in the event of the occurrence of anything calculated to disturb the Order of the House before the interval for further discussion has elapsed, then it appears to me to be quite impossible to give an answer until I know what the occurrence is. I should then, of course, endeavour to discharge my duty in maintaining Order.

MR. SPEAKER: It is right that I should point out to the House that at a Morning Sitting it has usually been the practice to proceed with the Orders of the Day, the Sitting being suspended from 7 to 9. I would, therefore, submit that if this matter is to be considered on Tuesday, it would be for the convenience of the House if the House met at the usual time.

MR. GLADSTONE: Probably, in the present state of matters, it will be better to allow the question to stand over until Monday. I say this with due deference to your opinion, Sir.

MR. COURTNEY: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether, considering the probability—I may say the certainty—of legal proceedings following the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh on Affirmation, he will take into consideration the expediency of introducing a Bill to extend to all persons elected to serve in Parliament as Members of the House of Commons, who may be unable or unwilling to take or subscribe the Oath, the liberty of making an Affirmation instead of taking the Oath, such as has been conceded to Quakers and other persons, so as to remove all doubts as to what persons are at liberty to make an Affirmation?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am unwilling at this moment to add anything to the general views I expressed in the recent debate. What I have stated is, that tomorrow, when the Cabinet will meet, we shall feel it our duty to take the whole question into consideration.

Lord Randolph Churchill

MR. MACARTNEY: Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to convey that there would be a Sitting of the House on Saturday?

MR. GLADSTONE: What I meant to convey was that there would be a meeting of the Cabinet to-morrow.

POOR LAW—CATHOLIC INSTRUCTORS IN WORKHOUSES.

MR. BYRNE asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he has observed in a discussion of the West Derby Board of Guardians, at a recent meeting, on a motion to pay a salary to the religious instructor of the Catholic inmates, it was stated that such a payment would be illegal, and would be disallowed by the Local Government Board; whether the present state of the law gives the Local Government Board the right to disallow a salary voted by a board of guardians to Catholic instructors in a workhouse; and, if it is so, whether he will take steps to call the attention of the board of guardians to the matter?

MR. DODSON: Sir, a payment to a Roman Catholic instructor would not be held illegal, and could not properly be disallowed if such an officer were appointed and his salary approved by the Board, as has been done in several instances.

COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE (IRELAND) BILL—PAYMENT OF TITHE RENT-CHARGE, &c.

MR. MUNTZ asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If, in the event of the passing of the "Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill," provision would be made to enable landlords affected by the Bill to postpone the payment of tithe rent-charge, and other payments for which they are liable, by virtue of their holding such property, until the 31st December 1881?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I must observe to my hon. Friend that the question of this Bill will be before the House this afternoon. I cannot make such a provision as is suggested. I have no doubt the hon. Gentleman would wish me to give the reasons why; but really I must decline to do so pending the debate.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—DRAINAGE WORKS AT BRUFF AND ATHLACA, COUNTY LIMERICK.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If a joint application for a loan was received (by the Board of Public Works in Ireland) from the Earl of Sandwich and the Earl of Buckinghamshire, for the purpose of sinking the Morning Star River between Bruff and Athlaca, in the county of Limerick, which river overflows its bank every wet season, and destroys thousands of pounds' worth of hay on the property of those noblemen; and, if so, why the loan was not granted, the people being so badly in want of employment in that district?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I find, Sir, that application was made by the Earl of Buckinghamshire and two other gentlemen for the purpose mentioned, and that the Board of Works were asked in the month of February last to give £2,120 for the purpose of draining the river alluded to. The loan was granted, and a first instalment of £320 issued; but in consequence of a delay in obtaining a power of attorney for the local agent, it was kept back until the 25th of May. On the 5th of the present month an application was made for the second instalment, but no reply has yet been officially given.

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—THE GALWAY MODEL SCHOOLS.

MR. MARTIN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, if an allowance of 3½ per cent per annum be made on the money invested in the erection of the Galway Model Schools, and the average annual cost of repairs and other expenses be calculated, it be not the fact that the amount expended by the Commissioners of National Education in preparing each child in the girl's department for the result examinations during the two years ending the 31st March 1879, did not on an average for each child during these years exceed £9 each year; or, if not, can he state the amount expended by the Commissioners for each child during these years; has the aid given by the Commissioners for the preparation of each child in the King's Inn Street Convent National School exceeded 10s.; and, if so, by what amount; is it not the fact that these last named schools have during these years supplied about thirty-one teachers, and the Model Schools but one, to other schools, or how otherwise; is it not the fact that in the last published Report of the Inspectors made by Mr. Gillies he has not stated that the King's Inn Street Schools was the best National School of any class he ever examined; and, whether, having regard to the small amount of State aid given to the King's Inn Street Schools and the high educational results there obtained, any steps have been taken or suggestions made with the view of increasing the payments made to the King's Inn Street Schools; and, if not, can he state the reasons for the continued application by the Commissioners in a manner so disproportionate to the educational work done as between the Model and King's Inn Street Schools?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, with regard to the Question of the hon. Member, I must say that as far as the money invested in the erection of the Galway Model Schools is concerned it would be impossible, or at any rate very difficult, to ascertain the proportion of the cost which was expended in the girl's department. As for the capitation grant, the amount per head in the Galway Model Schools in the year ending the 31st of March, 1878, was £7 4s., and in 1879 was about six guineas. The King's Inn Street Convent National Schools have had an average grant of 10s. per head; but in 1878 it was £1 2s. 8d., and in 1879, £1 3s. I have no information as to the last part of the Question, which opens up the whole question of the Model Schools, and I cannot at present enter into it.

MR. MARTIN: I beg to give Notice that I shall call attention to this subject on the Estimates for the Board of National Education in Ireland being brought forward.

ARMY — AUXILIARY FORCES — THE MID ULSTER ARTILLERY REGIMENT OF MILITIA — DUNGANNON WORKHOUSE.

MR. MACARTNEY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of

Mr. P. Martin

Ireland, Whether it is the case that the Local Government Board in Ireland has refused to allow the Board of Guardians of Dungannon Union to afford to the Mid Ulster Artillery Regiment of Militia the accommodation which it has hitherto enjoyed in Dungannon Workhouse during its period of training, which accommodation has, up to the present year, been allowed upon terms satisfactory to the ratepayers of said Union; and, if so, what are the grounds upon which said refusal is based?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I find that the Local Government Board, in consequence of the distress of this year, think it necessary to keep the workhouses as available as possible for any emergency. I hope that there is no special distress in this district; but I shall try if this difficulty can be avoided without any great breach of the general rule.

CHURCH RATES (ST. SAVIOUR'S, SOUTHWARK).

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the letter in the "Daily News" of 23rd June, from Mr. Fielding, of Findlater's Corner, London Bridge, and from Mr. Stannah, of 20, Southwark Bridge Road, complaining of distresses being levied on them for church rates collected by the churchwardens of St. Saviour's, Southwark; and whether it is possible for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, from the funds at their disposal, to make such payments to the minister of St. Saviour's Church as will obviate the practice complained of?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I believe the state of the case to be this. These proceedings are not accurately described—though I do not hold the hon. Member responsible for the inaccuracy—as distresses levied for church rates. As far as I understand the matter, they have no connection whatever with a subject which was at one time so well known to us under the name of the church-rate controversy. Under a private Act of Parliament, a compromise, as it was deemed at the time, was effected between the incumbents concerned and the parishioners. The incumbents, on the one hand, surrendered the extensive claims of which they conceived themselves to be legally in possession, and the parishioners agreed to constitute an endowment of the church by a charge on the property of the parish. That, as I am informed, is a correct statement of the case. The distresses which have been levied, and of which I know nothing except from the Question of my hon. Friend, must have referred to the payments which fell due in respect of such endowments. I have communicated with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners on the subject, and the answer I have received from them is to the effect that they do not feel at liberty to appropriate their funds, which were destined for the relief of spiritual distress, in order to enable the authorities of Southwark to dispense with an income that is already available under statute.

DISTRESS (IRELAND.)

LORD ELCHO asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in any of the districts scheduled in his "Bill to provide compensation for disturbance in certain cases of ejectment in Ireland," a state of destitution and suffering now exists such as prevailed so generally in Ireland in the great potato famine in 1846-7; and, whether, at that time any measures for the suspension or remission of rents was introduced into Parliament and passed by the Government of the day, or whether there is any record in the Irish Office of such a measure having been contemplated or considered?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I believe and trust there is in no one of the distressed Unions a state of destitution such as existed in the great Famine of 1846-7. I sincerely hope that not in the lifetime of my noble Friend, of his grand-children, or any of his descendants will there be such a famine again. As regards the measure now brought forward, I find no record of any previous similar measure. I will remind the noble Lord that what happened during the Famine cannot be considered as much of a guide for legislation. I will also further remind him that the Land Act has been passed since then.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the following paragraph in the "Echo" of June 24th:—

"Kildysart, Thursday.

"At the Ennis and Kilrush Quarter Sessions which have just concluded, nearly 100 cases of ejectment were disposed of and the decrees obtained. The greater part of those against whom the decrees were taken out are people who are dependent upon the relief funds for support. At Kilrush a decree was obtained against a man named Nash, with ten children, the holder of half an acre, for which, with a dwelling house, he paid four pounds yearly. A few days before the sessions the sum was made up by subscription, and he forwarded it, together with ten shillings costs, to the landlord's solicitor, but it was almost immediately returned;"

whether it is the fact that numerous ejectments have also been served throughout Ireland generally, and whether the Government will introduce any provision into the Compensation for Disturbance Bill to prevent landlords forestalling its operation; and, whether the Return of Evictions for the last six months, founded on district returns from the various head constables and sub-inspectors of Irish Police, will be presented to Parliament; and, if so, what are the circumstances taken into consideration by the police in filling up the column "hardship or not" contained in this return?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, his attention had only been called to the paragraph referred to when he read the Question of the hon. Gentleman. As to the second part of the Question, he would have something to say on that head when the provisions of the Bill about to be introduced were discussed. He would ask that the application for the Return should for a short time be postponed until further information was obtained.

ELECTION PETITIONS—REPORTS OF ELECTION JUDGES.

MR. WHITBREAD asked Mr. Attorney General, If he will state the position of the House in relation to its power, when, on the trial of an Election Petition, the Judge has reported the existence of extensive corruption?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, he was glad to have the opportunity of correcting an inaccurate report of what he had said with respect to the action of the House on Election Petitions. He would briefly state the position of the House in relation to its power over the Reports of Election Judges. In cases in which a Report was made to the House that extensive corrupt practices had prevailed, it was within the power of the House, under the Statute of 1852, to move for a joint Address with the other House to Her Majesty, representing that a report of extensive corrupt practices had been received, and praying that a Royal Commission might issue to inquire into the existence of such corrupt practices. By the Statute of 1863, the obligation was cast on Committees of the House in all cases of bribery and corruption to Report to the House whether such practices had extensively prevailed. The Statute of 1868 transferred the obligation to the Judges, and the House had the power, but not the imperative duty, of moving an Address in the terms he had mentioned to the Crown jointly with the other House. It was usual to regard the Report of the Judges as final; but it was within the power of the House to review their Reports.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked, Whether any real difference of facts was implied in the distinction between the two forms, "corrupt practices have extensively prevailed" and "there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed?"

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) replied, that the latter form was, in his opinion, equivalent to a direct Report of corrupt practices.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked what would be the Business of the House on Monday?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he proposed to proceed with the Navy and Civil Service Estimates, and on Thursday he hoped to take the Employers' Liability Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked at what time the Prime Minister would ask the House to consider the second reading of the Burials Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: I will take care to give full Notice of the time of the second reading of this Bill; but, viewing the state of Business in this House, it cannot be on a very early day.

The Attorney General

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 232.]

(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: As the House is aware, this Bill, though it is only a short one, and is also a temporary one, yet excites much interest, not to say opposition—in fact, I do not know that I ever had anything to do with a Bill to which I found so much opposition—arising, I believe, from very great misapprehension. I find, for the first time in my life, that I am looked upon as a very extravagant and revolutionary person. The Bill also has been termed revolutionary—it has been described as a measure to encourage the non-payment of rent, to confiscate the property of landlords, and to destroy all rights of property. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen cheer the statement—but, possibly, they will cheer still more the description of the Bill given by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), who, doubtless, considered that he combined almost every epithet of opprobrium, when he said that it "embodied all the worst and most noxious features of the Land Act of 1870." I am sure, however, the House will give me a fair hearing while I explain what I understand to be the object, meaning, and probable effect of this Bill. And, in doing so, I must trouble the House with some explanation of what I believe to be the intention of some of the clauses of the Land Act of 1870—because there is great misapprehension with regard to them as well as with regard to this Bill. Before I sit down I hope to show that this Bill is expedient and just—that it is brought in to carry out the spirit of the Land Act, and that it is required as a temporary modification of that Act, under the special circumstances of the case. Now, let me explain its principles. There is in it a limitation of time, and there is also a limitation of area—it is limited to the end of next year and to the area of those districts which are scheduled as distressed. We introduce these limitations, first, because we do not think the House is ready—and, in fact, we ourselves are not ready—for the introduction of any permanent Bill with regard to the Land Question; and next, because in the special circumstances of this year, and in the special circumstances of these districts, we think that a Bill with regard to evictions—why, I shall explain hereafter—is especially urgent, and, in fact, to our minds, necessary. Now, what are these districts? They have not been defined by me, or by the present Government, or by the present Parliament—they are those districts which were declared to be specially distressed by the late Government and by the late Parliament. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) asked me a Question yesterday with regard to these districts, and I think he was rather surprised to find that none had been scheduled since the 29th February. None could legally have been scheduled since, and there has, of course, been no intention to break the law. They were scheduled by the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (the Duke of Marlborough), in consequence of the belief that the Government had—a belief that has been confirmed by the unanimous vote of this House—that exceptional temporary legislation was required for the exceptional circumstances of these districts. There has been exceptional legislation. Loans of very large sums have been granted in order to meet the distress of these districts on terms, I believe, never offered before. It was because we wanted to fasten this Bill on the attention of the House and the Country, that when we thought it necessary to propose this measure, we first tried to introduce it as an amendment to the Relief of Distress Bill. I mention this in order to explain to the House why we took that course. There was no intention whatever to take the House by surprise—if we had been allowed to keep this clause in the Relief of Distress Bill, we should have had to move an Instruction, and hon. Gentlemen would have had the same opportunity of discussing it, and of rejecting it if they choose, as they will now have on the second reading of this Bill. I should be very sorry if any Member of the House thought I had wanted under any circumstances to take an unfair advantage. The proposal is limited, as I have said, to the scheduled Unions, generally speaking, to the Western half of Ireland; but there is, practically, another limitation—that is, it is limited to those Unions outside Ulster and outside of the districts where Ulster Tenant-right exists. And for this reason—that I cannot conceive that any tenant in Ulster would seek to make use of this Bill when he has a much stronger and more speedy remedy, and one which gives him a much larger compensation.

Now, what is this temporary proposal? Simply this—that if in the distressed districts, and during this year of distress, it shall appear to the Court—meaning the County Court Judge, the official to whom these questions are referred by the Land Act, who has under that Act much more important cases of compensation to decide than will come under this Bill—if it shall appear to this Court, first, that one of the tenants is unable to pay his rent; secondly, that he is unable to do so on account of the distress arising from the bad harvest of this and the two previous years; thirdly, that he is willing to continue in his tenancy on just and reasonable terms as to rent, and arrears of rent, and otherwise; and, fourthly, if those terms are unreasonably refused by the landlord—then, and then only, can he obtain such compensation as the Court may think just under the 3rd section of the Land Act, 1870. Now, observe that all these conditions must be fulfilled. No compensation will be given unless the tenant cannot pay his rent; unless he is too poor to pay; and unless his poverty arises, not from sickness, unthriftiness, or from his own action, but from the special grounds of these three bad harvests. Then, again, he must be willing to try his utmost to pay a reasonable rent—that is, to submit to pay a rent either reasonably reduced under the circumstances of this year, or with reasonable time given in which to pay, and the landlord must be unwilling to make that reasonable reduction, or to give him that reasonable time. If all these conditions are fulfilled, then the landlord and tenant come under the scope of Section 3 of the Land Act. I hope the House will not think I am wearying them if I remind them what that section is. The reason why I go back to the Land Act is, because, although it was passed only some 10 years ago, it seems to me that its provisions are most wonderfully forgotten—there seems to be a most curious forgetfulness with regard to them. I hear hon. Gentlemen speaking of the Land Act as if it merely enacted two provisions—one, to legalize the Ulster Tenant right, and, secondly, to give compensation to tenants all over Ireland for improvements. But Section 3 of the Land Act did a great deal more. It went so far as to establish the principle that not only in Ulster, but out of Ulster, the tenant had some right to his holding. I will not now enter into a discussion as how that right should be termed—whether property or goodwill, but some interest of the tenant in his holding is very clearly acknowledged by that section; and there was so much interference with the right of the landlord to do what he will with his own, or there was so far a declaration that his land was not absolutely his own, that he was not allowed to do what he could do in England or Scotland—namely, turn out his tenant when the tenancy expired, simply because he wished to do so. Remember that is what the Land Act enacted by Section 3. It clearly enacted that there was to be compensation for what was called “disturbance,” by the landlord making the tenant leave his holding. Well, what does “compensation for disturbance,” mean? It means that the tenant is to receive a sum of money which was regulated by the number of years’ rent—the maximum of compensation being limited to £250—because he was dispossessed of his holding. I suppose that is what the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) calls “the worst and most noxious feature of the Land Act.” But, after all, the Land Act was passed almost unanimously in this House, and unanimously in the other House. It is quite true that when this clause was brought forward, many hon. Members thought it a startling one. It was, no doubt, a clause new to the British Statute Book. The objections to it were most powerfully put, for the Motion against it was moved by the present Lord Beaconsfield; but the House declared by a large majority in its favour. I do not know, however, that it is my business, at this time, to defend what was done by Parliament in regard to the Irish Land Question in 1870. I believe this House is not less likely to consider the claims of tenants or more likely to consider the claims of landlords than was the House of 1870; but I will add that, looking back to the history of the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, we must regard this clause as a just and wise one. And I will go further, and say that my belief is that without some such clause as that Ireland would have had at this time to be governed by martial law. I remember being present in Ireland, not very long ago, at a meeting of gentlemen who were not, generally speaking, of my own side of politics. A very pleasant evening I spent with them; but though they complained a great deal of the Land Act, they admitted that, at all events, it had had the effect of putting an end to capricious evictions—and we know that, though Irish landlords will, as I believe, compare favourably with any others as regards justice and kindness, yet still capricious evictions did occur. But, in taking away this power from Irish landlords of capricious eviction—that is, of getting rid of his tenant simply because he did not wish to keep him as his tenant—we acknowledged and declared this principle to the tenants of Ireland—especially to the smaller tenants of Ireland—that they have by the very fact of their tenancy some right and some interest in their holdings different to what is possessed by the tenant either in England or Scotland. I am perfectly well aware that there is an exception to this clause, and it is one which I hope may give the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire some comfort, and may lead him to acknowledge that the Land Act was, after all, not altogether so bad as he supposes. Section 9 of the Act declares that except on some specific limitation—which I will allude to afterwards—the power of discretion given to the Court to compensate evicted tenants shall not be exercised in the case of tenants who are evicted for non-payment of rent. Therefore, the question we have now before us is this—whether or not I am right in saying that, under the special circumstances of this year, and for the relief of these distressed districts, this exception ought not itself to be modified? Remember, Section 3 was not only framed with the intention of putting a stop to capricious evictions, inasmuch as it made the landlord pay heavily for them, but it also gave the Court power to give the tenant such compensation as it might think just, where the rent was raised without the consent of the tenant. I do not know whether hon. Gentlemen are aware of the fact that by the law as it now stands, throughout the whole of Ireland, with the exception of Ulster—that is, even where there is no Ulster Tenant-right—if the landlord chooses to raise the rent of the holding, he can only do it at the expiration of the tenancy; and if the tenant does not consent to pay the increased rent, he has to give notice to quit, and that notice will bring the tenant within the operation of this 3rd section, and he will then get the compensation for disturbance which the Court may award him. Bearing this in mind, I ask hon. Gentlemen whether I am not right in saying there is very good ground to suppose that in a good many cases the keeping up in 1880 of the same rent, or anything near the same rent, as was paid in the good years before 1877, is really very much the same thing as if in good or average years the rent had been raised; and whether this temporary Bill is not merely carrying out the spirit of the Land Act, when it proposes that in these cases a tenant may be treated as though his rent had been raised? I have described Section 9 as a limitation of Section 3; but Section 9 has its limitation within itself—and that, again, I suppose, is another “noxious feature.” Section 9 declared, as it finally passed, that certain tenants, if the rent be “exorbitant,” could apply to the Court for compensation. This part of the clause has, however, been, in fact, rendered a nullity by the use of the word “exorbitant,” which has a special legal meaning. The word “exorbitant” was inserted in the clause in place of the word “excessive” by the House of Lords, and thereby the operation of the section was defeated; but the principle of this Bill is there—for the principle was affirmed that where the rent is “exorbitant,” a tenant may be entitled to compensation even when he is evicted for non-payment of rent. This is what the clause affirmed, as it finally passed; but how was it passed in this House? It left the House of Commons with words in it which provided that ejectment for non-payment of rent should not be deemed disturbance of the tenant by the act of the landlord, unless the Court so decided, on “special grounds,” in the case of persons claiming for compensation at the termination of the tenancy existing at the time of the passing of the Act. That is how the Act left the House of Commons, and if it had been passed in that, it would have been a greater interference with landlords and a greater protection to tenants than the Bill which I am now submitting to the House. But “special grounds” is a very wide and grave description. Who can doubt that if the Court have power to take into consideration “special grounds,” it would deem the harvests of the last two or three years such “special grounds” as would authorize it to afford greater protection to the tenant? I may be told what has that to do with the question—what does it matter what passed in the House of Commons? We must take the Act as it passed both Houses of Parliament. But I am dealing with the House of Commons, and I repeat, I do not think the House of Commons of 1880 will be less disposed to consider the claims of the tenant than the House of Commons of 1870 was; more especially, seeing that the change in the Bill was only effected after two or three conferences between the two Houses, and was only reluctantly assented to on the part of this House for the purpose of saving the Bill. I shall be told that this limitation only referred to tenancies then existing. True; but who doubts that the circumstances which demanded special protection for some tenants then, are similar to the circumstances which demand it for some tenants now? And who can suppose that, if it had been thus passed, its operation could have been limited by date of tenancy among tenants similarly circumstanced? Very probably words will be quoted from speeches of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone), separating the fact from the fiction. It is not for me to defend him; but it may be that he and most of us in the Government of that day had more hope and faith in the absolute settlement of the Land Question by the Land Act than has been justified. I believe it has done great good, and I believe without it we should have had incalculable evil. Nevertheless, it may be true that, at the time it was passed, the tremendous strain of the last three years was not foreseen.

Well, I have tried to tell the House what the Bill is, and how it amends the Land Act. Perhaps the House will allow me to refer to a statement I saw to-day, because it really shows how, even among gentlemen connected with Ireland, there are great misapprehensions. There is a letter in the papers to-day from a noble Lord who, I believe, is a gentleman of great Irish experience (Lord Annesley), in which he says—

“Were it to become law, a creditor who asked his debtor to pay him what he owed him would in some parts of Ireland be fined seven times the amount of the debt; in other parts, where Tenant right prevails, from 20 to 40 times that amount. If a tenant refuses to pay his rent, the only means of enforcing payment is by an ejectment.”

Really, this is a remarkable statement. The writer seems to forget that if the Ulster tenant is ejected at this moment for non-payment of rent, and under circumstances discreditable to himself—if he cannot pay from want of thrift—still he does not lose the value of his tenant-right; and if the landlord chooses to take his farm into his own hands, he has to pay him that value, whatever it is. If hon. Gentlemen would only test what they hear by the facts, they would find that much that is said is not altogether justified. But, now, what is the actual position of affairs? Practically, this Bill will mainly affect small tenants. The scale of possible compensation is seven years' rent for tenants under £10, five years' under £30, one year above £100, and the highest sum that can be awarded, whatever the size of the holding may be, is £250—that is the utmost a County Court Judge can give. Against this sum have to be set the arrears of rent, which, I suspect, will, in many cases, sweep off all the compensation. Now, I want to ask the House to consider who are these small tenants with whom we have to deal. First, they are men unable to pay the rent, or else the Court would not consider the claim; secondly, it is the circumstances of the time—the distress of the year and the failure of the harvest—that have made them thus unable; thirdly, they are willing to pay the rent if the landlord would give them reasonable terms in reduction or time; and, lastly, the landlord will not give them these reasonable terms. It is only under all these conditions that the tenants can get compensation from the Court. They are—or a very large majority of them are—attached to their holdings—it may be by what we call a sentimental attachment. Considering the misery that they and their families have lived in for centuries, it is only surprising that they should be so attached; but there are sentiments with which we cannot reason, and this is a sentiment much akin to patriotism, without which very few countries would be what they are. Remember, too, that these are men whose interest in their holdings has been acknowledged by the Land Act—whether by what is called its “noxious features” I do not know, but by this Act—passed by an enormous majority in this House, and, I believe, unanimously in the House of Lords. Remember, also, in the vast majority of cases these small tenants have no other means of living than their holdings. I will read a letter I have received to-day from a friend who worked with me in the Famine of 1847 (Mr. Tuke), who went to Donegal to see the state of things now as compared with what it then was. He does not find the destitution now equal to the famine in those days; but he does find great distress due to the two or three bad crops that have deprived the people of their sustenance. He says—

“It is extremely difficult to an Englishman to realize the intensity of feeling which exists on the Land Question in Ireland; and, in looking for some of the causes which have led to this, we shall find that it is due to a large extent to the overwhelming proportion of the population which is engaged in agriculture. To nine-tenths of the population of Connaught the possession of a bit of land is the sole means of existence. Of manufacture there is none, and, the majority of the farms being too small to need hired labour, of agricultural labour there is scarcely any. Take away from the tenant his little holding, and nothing is left to him but the workhouse. Except in some of the towns, there is not even an unoccupied house which a man could hire if he obtained work apart from his holding. Hence the tenacity with which the holding is retained and defended. They are like shipwrecked sailors on a plank in the ocean; deprive them of the few inches by which they ‘hold on,’ and you deprive them of life. Deprive an Irishman of the few feet of land by which he ‘holds on,’ and you deprive him of all that makes life possible. For the workhouse, distasteful enough to an English labourer, is simply unendurable to an Irish peasant. That this is no mere sentiment is often impressed upon the visitor who enters the cabins of the people, where it is so common to find some infirm or aged person dependent on the kindness of the family for the miserable subsistence he obtains, and who in England would without doubt have been sent to the workhouse long before. Who would wish to lessen this kindly feeling, or break down the almost insurmountable repugnance to the workhouse?”

Mr. W. E. Forster

Well, I have said that no Ulster landlord need regard with fear the operations of this Bill. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Hervey Bruce) asked me a question about it, and, knowing he was an Ulster landlord, I could understand his interest; but I hope his sympathy with the landlord out of Ulster will induce him to consider whether the better position of the Ulster landlord may not be, in some measure, owing to the better position of the Ulster tenant. Now, what is the position of the Ulster tenant? What did this Land Act do in Ulster? First, it legalized the Ulster Tenant-right—that is, it made the goodwill of the farm or the property in the tenancy a legal property. Next, it made the County Court Judge the judge of the value of the property; and, thirdly, it acknowledged the right of the owner of the property—that is, of the tenant—to obtain compensation in every case—in case of ejectment for non-payment of rent as well as in others. I refer to this fact partly for this reason. We have many champions of political economy in these matters; I do not know that they are exactly the same Gentlemen who advocate political economy in other matters. However, I ask them to consider whether, seeing that after long debates such provisions as I have described, to be applied in Ulster and out of Ulster, were passed by Parliament in 1870, there must, after all, be some circumstances in Ireland affecting landlords and tenants which prove that the rules of political economy as between buyer and seller do not absolutely apply? But, however this may be, I want the House to compare the position of the Ulster tenant with the position of the non-Ulster tenant, because I have had to compare them, and I have had to make the comparison because tenants out of Ulster make it themselves. Do not imagine that they do not know what this Act has done in legalizing the position of the tenants in Ulster. Take an estate, part of which is in Ulster and part out of it. Suppose there be small tenancies in each case; suppose distress arising from failure of crops has had the same effect in one place as another; the tenant on the Ulster side of the border gets his compensation for disturbance—upon having to leave his farm, he gets something that he can go to America with. The tenant outside Ulster, unless there be special kindness on the part of the landlord, is driven out helpless and hopeless. I am not one of those who would discourage emigration by these small tenants—I believe that some of them are in such a difficult position on account of the numbers existing on very poor land that no law that we could pass would give them a comfortable life—and, instead of discouraging them, I would encourage them to emigrate; but there is all the difference between a man emigrating with the means of re-starting in life, and a man emigrating without a farthing and finding himself helpless and hopeless in the slums of New York, suffering greater misery than he did in Ireland. I do not want the emigrant to go away with a feeling of hardship and injustice. I am not making any charge against the landlords as a class; it would be most unjust and untrue to do it. But there are exceptions; there are landlords who are hard by nature; there are others who are hard through circumstances, because they are in the power of others, or because they are too far away from their property and do not know the facts. I shall not allude further to these exceptions, because I want the House to feel what I feel—that if the landlords have the letter of the law behind them, we must enforce their rights. Remember this, if the landlords carry out the letter of the law, the Irish Government must enforce the landlords' legal rights. We must do this, because, whatever may be the hardship to the tenant, that does not equal the evil of allowing the law to be disregarded and disobeyed.

Now, you may say, with these facts before you, why did you not bring in this Bill at the beginning of this Session? You knew the distress—you knew the meaning of the Land Act—you knew the relative positions of the Ulster tenant and the non-Ulster tenant. Well, we did not do so because we hoped that we might put off legislation until we had all the facts before us, and knew how the Land Act was working, and then we might bring it before the House, and inquire how far it required amendment. Then, it may be said, "If you did not bring it in then, why have you brought it in now?" Well, for this reason—that we found we could wait no longer. Facts are accumulating upon us. Evictions have increased and are increasing—I have here the figures as to the evictions the Constabulary have had to conduct—they are not all that have been effected, only those in which the aid of the Constabulary has been required—and I deduct from them all the cases where the evicted tenant has been re-admitted—this list, moreover, has nothing to do with process-serving. The average evictions for the five years ending in 1877 was 503 for each year; in 1878 the number of evictions was 743; in 1879 it was 1,098; and up to the 20th of June in the present year it has been 1,073.

MR. CHAPLIN: How many of these evictions were for non-payment of rent?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I cannot say exactly, but I know that a very large portion of them have been for non-payment of rent. Well, with this exceptional increase of evictions has come the necessity of using an exceptional amount of force to carry out the law. Now, I take merely the West Riding of Galway. Since the 1st of January in this year, the number employed in protecting process-servers has been 107 officers of Constabulary and 3,300 men, and 16 officers and 626 men in carrying out actual evictions; there have been from 40 to 50 cases of process-serving, and 12 of actual evictions. I have read these figures, because I want the House to sympathize with the Government in this matter. I want them to see how we find it to be serious. Three or four Sundays ago I was informed that 87 processes would have to be served upon a village in the wildest part of Galway, where there was a very poor tenantry and very few roads, and in which village there had been an effectual resistance in the spring of this year. I was told that 150 men were told off for the duty, and that the probability was that they would be resisted and would have to fire their way through the mob. Of course, I did what any man in my position would do. I gave directions at once that the process-server must be protected in the discharge of his duties, but that every possible care must be taken to avoid collision between the people and the Constabulary, and that, therefore, a force must be sent out which would make resistance hopeless; and if the Constabulary was considered insufficient, the aid of the military must be called in. The result was that a large force of Constabulary—a force of 200 men well led—were sent down, and proceedings were conducted with the greatest success. If there had not been enough of men there might have been something approaching a battle. What happened, however, on that same day in another village in Galway not far off? A force of 50 men went with another process-server—I was not previously informed—but the force was not strong enough to prevent resistance, and the consequence was that the Constabulary had to charge through the mob with their swords drawn. I am glad to hear that no one was killed, though several were wounded; but I trust none of the wounds were serious. Two days before that, 100 men were engaged at no great distance in seeing an ejection carried out. I am not going to condemn the landlords upon any one of these occasions, and I am perfectly aware that the law must be enforced; but what I want the House to consider is, whether, with facts such as these before them, they will not make such modification in the present law as will carry out the spirit of the Land Act, so that we may be enabled to carry out the law with a clear conscience?

I cannot sit down without saying a word or two with reference to the objections that either have been or may be raised to this Bill. It has been said that, in introducing this measure, we are making a concession to what is called the Anti-Rent agitation. I must here remark that there are very few agitations for which there is absolutely no ground. There are very few cases of great smoke where there is absolutely no fire. My belief is that by passing this measure we shall be putting out the fire, and doing very much to destroy the agitation. Do not let hon. Members suppose for a moment that I approve of this agitation—I deeply lament it—I deeply condemn it. If any Gentlemen here have been promoters of that agitation—I beg them to recollect that if they have ever been at meetings, and have used any expressions which would give these poor people, who have got the distress of centuries rankling in their minds, the notion for a moment that they could resist the law, or that they would have the slightest success in such an attempt, they could not by any possibility be doing them a greater harm or be incurring a greater responsibility. I do not know that I can better express my opinion on this subject than by reading the following extract from the Flag of Ireland, which certainly is not written in the interest of the landlords of Ireland.

MR. PARNELL hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would also state that that newspaper did not represent the Irish Land League.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: When the hon. Member hears the extract read, he will see that it is unnecessary to point out that fact. The extract, which appeared on the 19th of this month, is as follows:—

"A representative of the Land League, at a meeting held last Sunday, said that the League 'had in view a set of objects, and if they enabled them to carry out those objects they would make the property of Irish landlords so worthless that they would leave it with them.' These objects were that they should endeavour to 'keep a grip' of their holdings, and that no one should be allowed to take a farm from which a tenant had been ejected. Their American friends, he said, were going to work in the right way. 'They could not send them arms, but they could send that which created arms—money, and he trusted they would band together and agitate and organize for the total extinction of landlords'—by 'constitutional agitation,' of course. We say deliberately that talk such as this is iniquitous. To goad an unharmed and helpless people, by thinly-veiled incitements like this, to deeds for the attainment of objects which are unattainable—which must bring ruin, swift and sudden, upon themselves and their families—is entirely unjustifiable, and the men who do this incur very grave responsibility."

I cannot leave this matter without making some allusion to what has happened in the West of Ireland. There have been many bad cases of great cruelty to tenants who have paid rent, or who have taken holdings from which others have been evicted; and, in order to injure their owners, there has been great cruelty to helpless and unoffending animals. A subject I do not like to talk about is the way in which the anger of men has been gratified by maiming and torturing dumb animals; but why do I refer to this? These men are not well taught—they have the teaching of centuries of wrong to guide them, but there are gentlemen going among them who have been well taught, and who know well what to tell these men; and I feel it my duty to say that I have looked in vain—and, because in vain, with deep regret—to the speeches of those gentlemen who have addressed these people for any denunciation of these outrages, and for any word informing their hearers that, however unjust they may think the law to be, yet that there are duties owing to their fellow-men, and even to beasts. I find myself confronted now with what I said on this matter when I was not in Office; but I do not see the slightest reason to charge me with having changed my views or action. I said then what I say now—that the law must be maintained—that individual outrages against law ought to be denounced by the friends of those who suffer from what they consider to be bad laws, not merely because of the highest interests of justice, but because of the interest of those men themselves; but I also said that the House of Commons and Parliament ought to consider with the utmost fairness and impartiality any measure brought forward for a change in the law. Well, the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) has brought forward an amendment of the law, involving a considerable change in the Land Act. It is, to some extent, an improvement, but it goes much further than we think it ought to go, and, to a great extent, it is not an improvement; and we think it our duty to oppose it. I have seen it stated in many places that we ought not to have considered that Bill for one moment, because it was brought forward by the hon. Member and those who act with him. We do not think so. We are not responsible for the hon. Member and his Friends—we should be sorry to be so; but we cannot forget that they are Members of Parliament representing these very districts that are distressed, and we are bound to hear them and give the fullest consideration to what they say. We are bound to take into account the fact that an amendment of the Land Act has been proposed by an hon. Member from one of the districts that are suffering most at the present time. But it is said we ought at once to have declared that we were opposed to the principles of the Bill, instead of waiting for it to be discussed. So we should if, as some suppose, it had been a Bill for simply enacting that there should be compensation in all cases of ejectment for non-payment of rent. But the Bill did not do this; it referred to the Land Act, and thereby brought in incidentally the discretion given to the Judge, and we were, therefore, bound to consider how far it brought it in. We have considered the hon. Member for Mayo's Bill, and we oppose it, because it is misleading, and would give tenants the idea that they would get more than they could really obtain; and we also oppose it because we think this is not the time for permanent legislation. We adhere to the opinion which, as the organ of the Government, I expressed earlier in the Session. We do not think this is a year for permanent legislation on the subject of the Land Act. But we accompany this temporary Bill with the declaration that we propose the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the working of the Land Act, and we hope to get a Report from this Commission as speedily as the proper prosecution of their inquiry will make possible. In bringing forward this Bill, I wish the House to understand that it is done to meet what we consider urgent distress in certain districts during the present and, perhaps, the succeeding year. But it will leave the House perfectly free and uncommitted; so that whatever may be the result of these inquiries, and whatever may be the opinions of the House or the Government with regard to them, the House and the Government will be perfectly free to take whatever course they may think fit. It may be that, as the result of this inquiry, the House may return to or rather establish perfect freedom of contract between the buyer and the seller—between the landlord and the tenant. I myself do not expect this; I doubt whether we shall find that both parties are absolutely free. The House may declare that a landlord is able to do what he likes with his land, just as he may do what he likes with his money in the Funds—that is, it may repeal the present Land Act. I do not expect that. Or the House may declare that, putting aside the present exceptional circumstances, it is best not to interfere with the Land Act. Or, lastly, the House may favourably consider the extension of the Ulster Tenant right, or some one of the other changes proposed. But, however that may be, the House is left absolutely uncommitted. Do not let anyone think that he is giving his vote for or against anything except a proposal to meet present circumstances. As to its effects, it will, to my mind, improve the position of the reasonable landlord, insuring, as it does, the carrying out of just terms between landlord and tenant. I do not believe it will even put the unreasonable landlord in a much worse position than he is. Policemen cannot by any means insure that a process shall be served. Whether by the collusion of the process-servers, or from some other cause, it is very difficult, in present circumstances, to get the law carried out. Is it likely, then, that the landlord who has to suffer from difficulties of that kind, will suffer from the operation of the Bill? There is great distress in Donegal, but we have had no difficulty. Donegal is almost entirely under Ulster Tenant right, and in Donegal no necessity exists for sending small armies with the process-servers. Why is this? Because there is some possible compensation; because the Donegal tenant has some hope of his rights receiving due attention. Instead of endangering property, this makes it more safe, and thus the strain of this year is borne. With regard to the discretionary power to be given to the County Court Judges, I am, on the whole, perfectly surprised to find how little complaint there has been made—in a country where complaints are not uncommon—against the action of the County Court Judges. I now ask hon. Members who criticize adversely the provisions of this Bill to put themselves in the position of the Lord Lieutenant and myself. We have to conduct the government of Ireland, and we must take the responsibility. We find distress not only existing, but acknowledged—not only by the previous Government, but by the recent Act of the last Parliament—and claiming most urgently our consideration. We find, at the same time, that with this distress there are many evictions, and that they are increasing. We feel bound to carry out the law, and enforce these evictions with any exercise of force however severely they may press upon this distressed people. So long as I remain where I am, and that law exists, it will be my hard duty to enforce it, because nothing can work so much harm in Ireland as to allow the law to be disobeyed or disregarded. At any exercise of force we must enforce the law. And mark what I am going to say—let the House realize our responsibility, in order that they may realize its own. We must enforce the law, even at the cost of life. On the other hand, we find a feeling of injustice; and, looking at the Land Act, we believe, that under the circumstances of this year, its spirit can only be carried out by such a modification in its letter as we are now proposing. We make this proposal, guarded in such a manner that it cannot, as we believe we can prove, work injustice to the reasonable landlord, and will hardly leave the unreasonable landlord in a worse position than he is in if he tries to strain the law; and we make this proposal so that it does not commit the House, but leaves it perfectly free to deal with the subject when it gets before it all the facts, and, we may trust, without the exceptional and painful circumstances of this year. On our part, we are forced to declare that the responsibility of not permitting this temporary and, as we conceive, this necessary modification of the law must rest upon Parliament, and not upon us. For my own part, I feel confident that the House of Commons will not take upon itself that responsibility. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. CHAPLIN: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, in the closing sentences of his speech, appealed to the House for sympathy in the position in which he finds the Government is placed. I think the Government indeed require, if they do not deserve, that sympathy; and on every personal ground I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that he has mine with great sincerity. But, politically speaking, and with regard to the course which the Government has pursued, there is, I regret to tell him, absolutely none. I think that the course pursued from first to last by the Government, with regard to this measure, is, perhaps, the chief and the greatest blunder of a Session which consists, I am afraid, of little else than blunders. The right hon. Gentleman tells us of the distress in Ireland. I will not yield to him for one moment in my sympathy for the distressed people in that country. There is something, I always think, in the qualities, the history, and the race of the people of that country which appeals to the imagination and which touches the hearts of their fellow-countrymen

in England. But the duty of the Government is clear. It is no kindness that you do them, but the most cruel injury, when, by propositions of this kind, you fire their quick and sensitive imaginations, and excite in their minds feelings, hopes, and delusive expectations which the Government know, as well as I know, it is impossible can ever be fulfilled. The duty of the Government at this time is clear. They have to relieve distress in Ireland. Let them do it with a liberal and, if necessary, with a lavish hand. Let them come, if necessary, to Parliament again and again, and Parliament, I know, will give ungrudgingly whatever is needed for the wants of the people of that country. Let them also do that which is the first duty of every Government in the world—let them enforce law and order in a manner which cannot be mistaken, and let them give security for life, for peace, and for property in Ireland. Is there that security to-day? It is for the Government to make answer to that question; and if there is not, then I tell them that great is the responsibility which rests upon them at this moment. Both sides of the House will acknowledge the importance of the statement which has just been made by the right hon. Gentleman. It is a statement in reference to a measure of which I shall say this—and my views are not shaken in the least by the sanguine anticipations or assurances of the right hon. Gentleman—that it touches, and, indeed, assails, the rights of property in Ireland directly, and indirectly the rights of property throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. It is one which departs entirely from every principle of legislation which has hitherto been sanctioned and admitted in civilized society in the country and in the age in which we live. [Murmurs.] If hon. Members opposite do not agree with my opinion they will have an opportunity of answering me afterwards; but I hope I may be allowed to conclude my observations. Under these circumstances, I confess it would have been more satisfactory to the House, and certainly to myself, if, following the more usual and ordinary practice in regard to questions of this great and vital importance, this statement had been made on the first introduction of the measure. The right hon. Gentleman has given us no reason for departing from that course, and, consequently, there is no other course open to us to-day except to bow to that decision with the protest which I make. The House will recollect that the introduction of this measure is a new and a complete departure from the views announced by the Government earlier in the Session. The right hon. Gentleman not only told us he did not intend to introduce an Irish Land Bill or to deal with the Irish Land Question during the present Session; but he gave us most admirable and convincing reasons in support of that wise decision on the part of the Government. He told us that the Land Question was one with which it is exceedingly difficult to deal in a comprehensive manner, and that, therefore, it would be impossible to deal with it in the remainder of the Session. The right hon. Gentleman said that to introduce a Ten Minutes' Bill would be, in his opinion, an unwise course to adopt, though it seems to be that that is almost exactly what he has now done. He said that if such a Bill as the ad interim Bill proposed by an hon. Member from Ireland had been introduced by the Government, that every branch of the questions connected with Irish Land would have to be thoroughly discussed. The right hon. Gentleman further said that the Irish Land Question was just one of those questions with which it was impossible to deal without a general knowledge of principles and a full knowledge of details, and that if any mistake were made as to the actual condition of the country, the whole matter might be thrown into a state of confusion that would probably do infinitely more harm than good; and he showed conclusively to the House that the Government did not possess this information, for almost immediately afterwards he intimated to the House the intention of the Government to appoint a Royal Commission for the express purpose of obtaining that information in which he acknowledged that the Government were deficient. Under these circumstances, I have listened with the utmost interest to the right hon. Gentleman to-day, in order to learn what are the reasons which have brought about this change of policy on the part of the Government, and which have induced them, almost at a moment's notice, to submit to Parliament a measure of this most extreme and most alarming character. First, the right hon. Gentleman tells us that the Government were mainly induced to introduce the Bill on account of the evictions. I asked at once, across the House, how far have the number of evictions increased since the commencement of the Session? That question the right hon. Gentleman was unable to answer. So it is established to the House that the increasing number of evictions form no reason whatever for this change of policy on their part. They knew at the commencement of the Session, when they decided not to introduce the measure as well as they know now, that evictions were increasing; and they are unable to say now if there has been any further increase since their first intention was announced. With regard, also, to evictions increasing in Ireland, that is one of my chief causes of complaint against this Bill. Why, it is the anticipation of these revolutionary proposals on your part that is driving the landlords of Ireland, in self-defence, to make these evictions, and to rescue their property from what they believe will be complete annihilation. If the evictions have influenced you at all, they are, in considerable measure, owing to yourselves. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say he had no intention of surprising us, and of springing upon us anything in the nature of a surprise. I entirely acquit the right hon. Gentleman of that intention. Then, he said, unless I misunderstood him, that this measure was necessary, because, otherwise, he was convinced that Ireland must be governed by martial law. Why, what a commentary this is on the policy which was pursued 10 years ago. Next, the right hon. Gentleman went on to speak of Clause 9, and he endeavoured to show to the House that the principle contained in this Bill was contained in Clause 9 of the Land Act of 1870. It is all very well to say that; but, unless I am entirely mistaken, the right hon. Gentleman himself is very considerably in error. Clause 9 of the Land Act referred exclusively to tenancies in the past. When that clause was being discussed, the present Prime Minister said—"Nothing would induce them to apply anything of the kind to the future." And Lord Carlingford (then Mr. Chichester Fortescue) remarked—

"The clause had no reference whatever to tenancies created after the passing of the Act. It was entirely confined to the past."

Mr. Chaplin

Therefore, this argument of the right hon. Gentleman fell to the ground. Then the right hon. Gentleman pointed to the Ulster custom, by which the tenant gets his compensation, and, no doubt, he does get compensation. But there is an important distinction between tenants under the custom in Ulster and in other parts of Ireland. Under the Ulster custom, he buys his right when he comes in, and is paid for it when he goes out; while in other parts of the country, he would, under the Land Act, have a claim for compensation for disturbance, whether he had purchased the goodwill on entry or not. This is the distinction between the two cases; and the argument with regard to the Ulster custom, therefore, falls to the ground. Again, though I have listened to the right hon. Gentleman with great attention, I can find nothing in his speech to account for the sudden change of policy on the part of the Government, or to remove in the least the objection I have to the nature and character of this measure. What is the effect of the Bill? The right hon. Gentleman has told the House this afternoon that I hold, and have always held, that the principle of compensation for disturbance was the worst and most vicious feature in the Irish Land Act. I acknowledge and entirely adhere to that opinion. The right hon. Gentleman has given us his version of the meaning of compensation for disturbance. Now, there must be many hon. Members in the House who do not remember the discussions on that principle when the Bill of 1870 was being passed; and as some of them, probably, do not realize the true purport and meaning of the principle, perhaps I may be permitted to give my version of it also. I am not speaking now of compensation for improvements, of what would be called tenant right in England, in the direction of which few men would probably be disposed to go further than myself. Compensation for improvements is one thing, compensation for disturbance is another. The improvements which a tenant makes on a farm are provided for elsewhere, in the 4th clause of the Land Act, largely and liberally, as they ought to be, and especially in the case of Ireland, where, owing to the immense competition for land, the tenant is in a worse position to make a fair bargain with his landlord

than in England. But over and above his compensation for improvements, and after he has been repaid for everything which he has spent upon his farm, the tenant is entitled in Ireland, under the 3rd clause, to a further claim besides, to what is called "compensation for disturbance," a principle by which the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Land Act of 1870 apparently desired to give to the tenant a proprietary interest in the soil, and did, in fact, entitle him to levy on the landlord a fine, amounting in some cases to seven years' rent, or one-third of the value of the fee simple of the land. It is to that principle, to which I objected from the first that it was indefensible and inexpedient, that I renew my objections more strongly than before, after 10 years' experience of its actual operation. Let me point out to the House a few of the extravagances to which some of the principles of the Bill may lead. I need not remind hon. Gentlemen that the position of the occupier of the soil in Ireland is one very eagerly sought after, and that the privilege of holding a farm is very highly prized. But we must remember that it is the landlord who first confers this privilege upon the tenant; and it seems to me absolutely monstrous to make a landlord compensate a tenant for the loss or rather the non-continuance of a privilege which in the first instance emanated from himself. You might as well—or, perhaps, even with more justice—compensate a man for the refusal of a farm in the first instance, and with this additional good reason—that while in the first case he has enjoyed the profits of the farm for years, in the latter he would have no chance of making any profits at all. This is the first absurdity to which we are logically driven by the principle of compensation for disturbance. I may venture to quote the opinion of a very high authority on the subject. Judge Longfield says with reference to this measure—

Then he goes on to say—

"He is liable to be called on to pay £70, the whole rent that he had received; and the tenant, who need not have laid out a penny on the land, will have had the enjoyment of it for seven years rent free."

Again, take the case of a tenant holding a farm at £10 a-year for three years, at the end of which time, after he has paid £30, he is evicted. On eviction he immediately claims £70—that is to say, he holds his farm for three years for nothing, and finally receives a bonus of £40 for doing so. What I have stated justifies in some degree my hostility to the principle of compensation for disturbance. I must, however, admit that the Land Act of 1870 had one redeeming feature, that the principle of compensation for disturbance was not extended to cover the case of tenants who were evicted for non-payment of rent. That exception is now to be swept away by a dangerous and alarming piece of legislation. I should like to describe in a few words the chief effects of the measure on property in Ireland by reading a statement sent to me this morning:—

“The main result of the Bill, if passed into an Act, will be to foster the notion so sedulously promulgated by agitators in Ireland, that every man who, by any undertaking or promise, has induced another to put him into possession of lands becomes thereupon endowed with a right to retain that possession, though he may violate the promises by which it was procured. It gives public recognition to the principle that there is nothing dishonest, nothing of which a Member of Parliament need be ashamed, in taking from one party to a contract a substantial portion of his property, unless he will allow the other to violate his side of it with impunity. During the period named for the operation of the Act, it is plain that in those parts of Ireland to which the Bill refers no ejectment can be brought for non-payment of rent, or any other cause, unless at the risk of a heavy loss on the part of the landlord. In Ireland, ejectment is the only remedy in the vast majority of cases for the recovery of land, the rent of which is now deliberately and in concert withheld by many tenants perfectly able to pay. To this combination, notorious and boasted of, it is proposed to give a triumph by Act of Parliament. Nearly all landowners have charges on their property which can only be met out of rents as they are received. Jointures, younger children, mortgagees, must all, under the proposed legislation, be left without their incomes until they shall have succeeded in forcing the depreciated estate of the involuntary defaulting landowner to judicial sale at a sacrifice ruinous to him and perhaps to themselves.”

That reminds me that the right hon. Gentleman has omitted to answer in his speech a question put to him with regard to the effect of the measure on mortgages, and I hope he will give us some explanations on this point. I know on good authority of a case in which £15,000 was to be raised by mortgage on a certain estate in Ireland, and the solicitor for the mortgagee immediately drew back on the announcement of the Bill, and on finding that the estate in question was within the scheduled districts. In such circumstances as these we are entitled to have some explanation of the course which the Government may intend to pursue in dealing with cases of this kind. Viewing the measure as a whole, I regard it as unwise, impolitic, and unjust. It is not in this way that you will restore peace and prosperity to Ireland. Where, I should like to know, is the distinction between the Bill of the Government and that of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, and to which the Government have tardily announced their opposition? The principle of the two Bills is the same; and, except for the limit of time, the schedules of districts, and the discretion of the Courts, there is no difference between them whatever. The hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Grey) who moved the Address in reply to the most gracious Speech from the Throne with an eloquence and ability which commanded, and justly commanded, for him compliments from the Leaders on both sides of the House, and who, I believe, inherits with the name the power and qualities of a statesman by descent, gave public Notice of his intention to ask the House of Commons to reject the measure proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. I cannot doubt that I shall have the support and assistance of the hon. Member on this occasion, and I will not, I cannot, believe that he will stand alone upon that side of the House. I would ask hon. Gentlemen opposite, I would appeal to them to take warning for the future from that which has happened in the past. Let them look at the condition of Ireland to-day, and as they look let them remember that 10 years ago the same man who is Prime Minister at this moment was Prime Minister then, and that he had his way and had his will almost unchecked in Ireland. The results of this fatal and reckless policy were prophesied at that time, prophesied in the words of one whose voice must, and ever will, command the attention and respect of Parliament, and with reading them I will conclude:—

“There will be an ew grievance—the payment of rent: and the non-payment of rent will become a principle, asserted by the same rural logic, the startling consequences of which have filled the mind of the country with apprehension and horror almost every day. The argument of the Irish tenant—belonging to the very class that you think you are now setting up by this violation of the fundamental law of the country—will be to this effect:—‘I have lost my holding because I did not pay my rent; can anything be more flagrantly unjust than that a man should be deprived of his contingent right to a third of the freehold because he does not pay his rent?’ That is a natural view which may lead to a much more successful agitation than any we have yet heard of. The question is unanswerable; we may think it is abstractedly unreasonable, but it is the necessary result of our legislation. And what will be the consequence? Why, that payment of rent will become a grievance, and you will find yourselves in exactly the same position in which you are now placed. There will be great complaints of the consolidation of farms, great complaints of vexatious and tyrannical evictions, and, on the other, side the most violent means by which the supposed rights of the occupiers to property in the soil may be vindicated will be resorted to. And so far from the improvement of the country, so far from terminating all these misunderstandings and heartburnings, which we seem now so anxious upon both sides of the House to bring to a close,”—

[Murmurs.] I have no doubt it is objectionable to Irish Members. [“No!”]

—“you will have the same controversies still raging, only with increased acerbity, and under circumstances and conditions which inevitably must lead to increased bitterness and increased perils to society.”—[3 Hansard, cc. 1184-5.]

This is no prophecy by one who is wise only after the event. These words were spoken, Mr. Speaker, upwards of 10 years ago, by a Member of this House, when the foresight of a statesman told him what must be the inevitable results of the reckless policy of the right hon. Gentleman. His name was Mr. Disraeli. His words, his language are literally fulfilled in the transactions of this hour. Comment upon my part would be utterly superfluous. I ask the House of Commons—I ask hon. Members on both sides to support me when I move, as I do now, the rejection of this most ill-timed, most ill-advised, and most unrighteous measure.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months.”—(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL, in supporting the Bill, said, he hoped when the

hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire had made himself more completely master of the circumstances in Ireland which called for that legislation—which had justified that legislation—he would find the Bill more acceptable than he had done that day. He was very glad, however, to find English Members entertained themselves with the consideration of Irish questions, because the more they were entertained the more they would see the justice of the views of the people of Ireland. He had no doubt that the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken would be prepared in a spirit of sincere generosity to deal with the funds of the Imperial Exchequer for the relief of Irish distress; but there he seemed to stop. This Bill, however, proposed to do something—although by a temporary measure—to redress the state of things which had led to the present condition of Ireland. The hon. Member had told an interesting story of a mortgage for £15,000, which was very near completion, but which, owing to the introduction of this Bill, fell through, the landlord being unable to effect a loan. If the views of the parties to that commercial transaction were based on the opinions entertained by the hon. Gentleman as to the extravagant character of the present Bill, he could well understand that the transaction should have fallen through. But it would probably be found that the result of this debate, and especially of the speech of the Chief Secretary, would be that the transaction would be carried out. He recognized the perfect consistency of the hon. Gentleman in his opposition to this Bill, seeing that he was an opponent of the legislation of 1870. Those who, like the hon. Gentleman, had set themselves against the legislation of 1870, were justified in taking the course which he had taken. But hon. Gentlemen on both sides who were willing to accept the legislation of 1870 would not be led away by the arguments of the hon. Member. This was a Bill which was not only limited in time, but limited in area; it was in harmony with the Bill of 1870, and was justified by the exceptional circumstances of the present time. Its object was to restrain ejectments for non-payment of rent in Ireland in a limited area and for a limited time under certain stringent conditions. And here he would mention what was not generally known, that no such thing as ejectment for non-payment of rent merely was known to the Common Law or to the Statute Law of England. He wished to accentuate that point. But if by the terms of the compact between landlord and tenant there was a clause of re-entry, then upon failure by the tenant to observe the covenants, among others payment of rent, the landlord had the right of ejectment. It followed, therefore, that in every case of letting which did not comprise this clause of re-entry, the landlord's remedy was to terminate the tenancy by notice. Now he wished to point out the peculiar hardship which this power of ejectment entailed in Ireland, and how injuriously it operated. Even on the best managed estates in Ireland it was usual to leave a half-year's rent in arrear, which was called "a running gale." On well-managed estates, where the tenants paid their rents with some punctuality, it was not considered unreasonable that the rent which was due in May should be paid the following Christmas. Now let them mark the operation of the exceptional law in Ireland as to ejectments. Let them suppose that by the 1st of May following the tenant was unable to pay his rent. He would then be a year's rent in arrear, and by the law of Ireland—which was not the law of England—the tenant could be turned out of his holding by the landlord without any notice to quit whatever, and the only means by which he could live could be taken from him without any compensation. In similar cases in England the landlord must give a year's notice to quit ending with the year of tenancy. Was it surprising that a man who was turned out of his farm in Ireland under such circumstances should leave it with a sense of oppression and wrong rankling in his breast? He had lived there, it might be for years; he had spent such means as he had upon it; he had spent the power of his body upon it, and his children had laboured, sweated upon it to improve it, and yet, according to the law, he might be turned out, as he had said, without any notice to quit, and under the law, as it now stood, without one penny of compensation except in one case, to which he should presently refer. He knew it would be said—"Oh, but landlords of honour and character would not do such things." He believed not; but laws were and ought to be made to restrain the doing of that which honourable men would voluntarily abstain from doing. For his part, he desired not to say one word which would seem to savour of an attack upon the landlords of Ireland. He attacked the land system. He had said frequently, looking at the enormous power which the law gave to the owners of the land in Ireland, the wonder was not that that power had been used so much, but that it had been abused so little. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire had said that he did not understand what the 3rd section of the Act of 1870 meant; what it was intended to recognize and give compensation for. He would endeavour to give an answer to that question. First of all he must remind the House that they were dealing, as a general rule, with a relation very unlike the common relation between landlord and tenant in England; but they were dealing in Ireland with a relation in which the landlords supplied nothing but the staple commodity of the industry—namely, the land; and the tenants supplied all else that was necessary to work the land. He did not stop to notice the rather curious language of the hon. Member when he spoke of the origin of this relation as the conferring of the privilege by the landlord upon the tenant. Where was his rent to come from unless it be out of the bone and sinew of the tenant? The landlord also conferred upon the tenant the privilege of paying a full rent! To his mind such language as that which had been used by the hon. Member smacked much too strongly of the old feudal days, when the landlord was the lord of all, and treated the men who dwelt upon the land very little better, in his estimation of property at least, than the cattle which grazed upon the farm. But these days were happily gone, and the result of the state of things to which he had referred was to bring about an exceptional and a complex relation between landlord and tenant in Ireland, which might not be inaptly described as a partnership. From that relation had grown up to be recognized by the moral sense of mankind a right of the tenant in its intrinsic nature—in the first foundation upon which it rested as truly property as the fee simple of the landlord itself. He need not point out that that was an interest which the law had recognized, though tardily. Nor need he detain the House by pointing out a somewhat analogous case in this country, where rights beginning on such slender foundations as these had grown to be the real acquisition of property in land. What was the history of the law of copyhold in England originally? The lord of the manor allowed his men, who were the copyholders and servants, to dwell on the land; they were strictly what the law called tenants at the will of the landlord, whatever their early status had been; but owing to the fact of the moral claim which, in consequence of their occupancy and their labour, these tenants acquired in process of time, and under the healthy and fostering influence of a strong public opinion, which, he regretted to say, was wanting, to a great extent, in Ireland, they came to be recognized until the copyhold right was now little inferior to the fee simple right. Nay, that copyhold tenure supplied another feature which threw some light on the present discussion. The lords of those days said — “Oh, although we must recognize this customary continuance of occupation, we have one means of asserting our rights. When you, the tenants, who are now in possession of my land, die, the person who has to succeed you must come to me for admission, and I will bar the door against him, and assert my right by imposing a fine for admission.” And the lords of the manor imposed those fines. How were they restrained? By the intelligent action of the Courts of the country, backed up by public opinion, which imposed upon the landlords in that case the stipulation that the fine should be a reasonable one. In the case of Ireland the right of the tenant was tardily recognized by the Act of 1870, which he recognized as the great act of a great statesman; because although he was not going to say that that Act was not defective, yet when he recalled the powers which were arrayed against it, and the high assertion of feudal rights which even that day had found utterance in the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire, he said that too much credit could not be given, not merely to the wisdom, but to the resolution of the statesman who successfully carried that legislation. The Act of 1870 recognized the right on the part of the tenant to compensation for improvements and also for disturbance, that disturbance being the deprivation by the landlord of the tenant right, or goodwill which the man acquired in his holding. But it had two defects. First of all, it did not in any degree meet the case of land which held to-day at its fair value fell in value, and next it suffered no claim for compensation to be considered by the Court, except where rent was exorbitant. Under the operation of the Act as it stood at present the landlord could push up his rent shilling by shilling until it had reached the point just short of this exorbitant limit; and the tenant failing then to pay could be turned out without one penny of compensation. He said that was not just; but he had a still greater objection to make. Section 3 unquestionably recognized the property of the tenant in respect of something for which he was to be compensated if he was disturbed in it, but measured the extent of compensation which he was to get in an extreme case by seven years' rent where the rent did not exceed £10. What he wanted to point out was this—If that right, which he called the goodwill of the tenant, was legalized and recognized as a right of property in the tenant, why, for one year's non-payment of rent, was he to have confiscated what might be the six or seven years' value of his interest? Under the Ulster tenant right, a tenant in arrear of his rent for one or two years had a right to sell his tenant right interest; and if he sold it for many years' purchase, all that the landlord got was his arrears of his rent, the tenant receiving the balance. Now, one other reason in favour of this Bill, which he thought was a small one, although he gratefully recognized the spirit which had prompted its introduction, was that it would undoubtedly bring the law, to some extent, into harmony as affecting land over the whole of Ireland. The difference between Section 9 of the Act of 1870 and this Bill was the smallest in the world. The former Act provided that the tenant might get compensation if the Court held that he was ejected for non-payment of a rent that was exorbitant; the present Bill allowed compensation if the Court found that he was unable to pay the rent in consequence of the prevailing distress, and that he was willing to remain on just terms, but that those terms were unreasonably refused. The difference between exorbitant rent and unreasonable terms was not such as to justify the extravagant language which had been used of this Bill. It was designed to meet a state of things which could hardly be realized in England. It was said that the effect of the measure would be to give an additional inducement to tenants in Ireland not to pay their rent. He wholly disbelieved that statement; and, speaking from a somewhat extensive experience, he could say that the cases were few in which tenants really able to pay their rent did not do so. The reason was obvious. They dared not run the risk of subjecting themselves to ejectment, not having any other avenue of industry open to the them. Deprived of their land, they were thrown upon the world. There were not in Ireland, as in this country, those large industries which made the land for agricultural purposes almost a secondary want. He desired to say nothing which would offend any hon. Member, or rake up any bygone memories needlessly, but retrospect was sometimes necessary; and it was not unimportant for the House of Commons to bear in mind that the past legislation of the Imperial Parliament, in stifling and putting down all such industries as were growing up in Ireland, had thrown the people upon the land as their sole means of subsistence, and for the exercise of their industry. Though that legislation no longer existed its effects did. After all, centuries in the life of a nation were but as years in the life of man. If exceptional circumstances were needed, they surely existed to justify this Bill. Famine almost stalking the country, and people still flying in their hundreds and thousands—a fact of great import addressed to a people so peculiarly attached to the place of their birth—or receiving, as they had been told, something like a pauper's dole at the hand of charity. So strong, too, is the feeling of the country as to this Land Question, that the posse comitatus of the Sheriff, a small army, as the right hon. Gentleman rightly termed it, were necessary to execute an ejectment process. Surely this was a state of things which called for the best efforts that Parliament could make for redressing existing grievances. Let the House recollect the responsibility that rested upon this country. The Imperial Parliament had now for many centuries charged itself with the destinies of Ireland. It was its duty to legislate for the just needs of that country; and if it now failed to do so it supplied the motive and reason for "the Third Party" in that House which many hon. Members deplored. Was not the state of things in Ireland a reproach to hon. Members representing English and Scotch constituencies—a state of things which, at one time, was said to be accounted for upon theories, forsooth, of race and of religion. But, happily, these theories had been exploded; and finally they came back to the question that the state of things in Ireland, the result of past legislation and of misrule, called for, in this day, generous and exceptional treatment on this question of the land in Ireland. The philanthropic men alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman, who assisted to relieve the distress of 1846, tried to look beneath the surface, and to ascertain the cause of it; and they put it on record, as their deliberate opinion, that the state of the Land Law in Ireland was, in a great measure, accountable. That being recorded in 1846 and 1847, was it not a reproach to Parliament that until the present Prime Minister took the matter in hand in 1870 nothing really effective was done? The state of things which existed cramped industry, because it gave no motive for industry; it prevented that full development of the land which it ought to be the object of all just land legislation to promote; and it prevented improvements in the social life of the lower classes of the country. He knew cases in which men able to pay their rent pretended that it was by the greatest effort they were able to pay it, though they did pay it, that they were in great poverty, wore bad clothes, and had untidy houses. And why? Because they knew that the thrifty and industrious tenant who exhibited the appearance of prosperity and comfort, and improved his house and land, was at the mercy of the unscrupulous landlord. Whilst recognizing the importance of this measure of the Government as indicating an honest desire on their part to do what they could for the Irish tenant, he did not think it touched more than the extremest fringe of the question. He could not believe that in any

ing of injustice; and, looking at the Land Act, we believe, that under the circumstances of this year, its spirit can only be carried out by such a modification in its letter as we are now proposing. We make this proposal, guarded in such a manner that it cannot, as we believe we can prove, work injustice to the reasonable landlord, and will hardly leave the unreasonable landlord in a worse position than he is in if he tries to strain the law; and we make this proposal so that it does not commit the House, but leaves it perfectly free to deal with the subject when it gets before it all the facts, and, we may trust, without the exceptional and painful circumstances of this year. On our part, we are forced to declare that the responsibility of not permitting this temporary and, as we conceive, this necessary modification of the law must rest upon Parliament, and not upon us. For my own part, I feel confident that the House of Commons will not take upon itself that responsibility. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. CHAPLIN: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, in the closing sentences of his speech, appealed to the House for sympathy in the position in which he finds the Government is placed. I think the Government indeed require, if they do not deserve, that sympathy; and on every personal ground I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that he has mine with great sincerity. But, politically speaking, and with regard to the course which the Government has pursued, there is, I regret to tell him, absolutely none. I think that the course pursued from first to last by the Government, with regard to this measure, is, perhaps, the chief and the greatest blunder of a Session which consists, I am afraid, of little else than blunders. The right hon. Gentleman tells us of the distress in Ireland. I will not yield to him for one moment in my sympathy for the distressed people in that country. There is something, I always think, in the qualities, the history, and the race of the people of that country which appeals to the imagination and which touches the hearts of their fellow-countrymen

in England. But the duty of the Government is clear. It is no kindness that you do them, but the most cruel injury, when, by propositions of this kind, you fire their quick and sensitive imaginations, and excite in their minds feelings, hopes, and delusive expectations which the Government know, as well as I know, it is impossible can ever be fulfilled. The duty of the Government at this time is clear. They have to relieve distress in Ireland. Let them do it with a liberal and, if necessary, with a lavish hand. Let them come, if necessary, to Parliament again and again, and Parliament, I know, will give ungrudgingly whatever is needed for the wants of the people of that country. Let them also do that which is the first duty of every Government in the world—let them enforce law and order in a manner which cannot be mistaken, and let them give security for life, for peace, and for property in Ireland. Is there that security to-day? It is for the Government to make answer to that question; and if there is not, then I tell them that great is the responsibility which rests upon them at this moment. Both sides of the House will acknowledge the importance of the statement which has just been made by the right hon. Gentleman. It is a statement in reference to a measure of which I shall say this—and my views are not shaken in the least by the sanguine anticipations or assurances of the right hon. Gentleman—that it touches, and, indeed, assails, the rights of property in Ireland directly, and indirectly the rights of property throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. It is one which departs entirely from every principle of legislation which has hitherto been sanctioned and admitted in civilized society in the country and in the age in which we live. [Murmurs.] If hon. Members opposite do not agree with my opinion they will have an opportunity of answering me afterwards; but I hope I may be allowed to conclude my observations. Under these circumstances, I confess it would have been more satisfactory to the House, and certainly to myself, if, following the more usual and ordinary practice in regard to questions of this great and vital importance, this statement had been made on the first introduction of the measure. The right hon. Gentleman has given us no reason for departing from that course, and, con-

proaching correctness—and he said it with no disrespect—the right hon. Gentleman did not seem to understand his own proposals. He produced a number of ejectments; but he was unable to say what proportion applied to the country and what to the towns; how many for non-payments, and how many for other causes. He adopted an average of five years previous to 1877, and then made the addition from year to year. Was it possible to ask the House to take action on such a statement? So far as he understood the contention of the right hon. Gentleman, it was that some ejectments were for non-payment of rent, and that this number had considerably increased lately. Well, of course, in a time of the prevalence of extraordinary distress, ejectments for non-payment would increase, as in England the same cause threw a large number of farms on the hands of the landlords. They could not expect a normal state of things under such exceptional circumstances. But he did note one thing, and that was that the increase in the number of ejectments for the last 18 months kept pace with and accompanied the unhappy and disastrous land agitation of that time. Was this remarkable when by orators, who had the ears of the people, the latter were told not to pay rent except as the last payment to be made? Every other claim was first to be settled. Could it be surprising, then, that landlords were obliged to take action now to a greater degree than at other times? It would have been more surprising had there not been this increase in the number of ejectments for non-payment. He knew also that simultaneously with this agitation agrarian outrage had blazed out with fearful intensity. He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman speaking with some degree of decision, in condemnation of the anti-rent agitation; but the conclusion he drew was rather a strange one. He spoke with warmth and justice of the agitation which had misled the people, and which was likely to mislead them further; but here in the Bill was practically the same principle and the same view put forth in the House as had been pressed in Ireland by the Land League. ["No, no!"] Certainly he understood the Bill lately introduced by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) was put forward by eminent members of the League. Therefore, he said that the Bill practically gave a Government sanction to some, at least, of their strongest demands, for he was right in saying that the principle of the Government Bill and that of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) were the same. The Government sanctioned the strongest immediate demands of the League. He said the immediate demands, for what the ulterior effects might be he could not say. But as to the propriety of intrusting to some third person to settle what was or was not a reasonable rent, as to the propriety of interfering between landlord and tenant, simply on account of the prevailing distress, it did sanction and adopt the principles which had been put forward for months by the Land League. He would undertake now to prove that in principle the proposal was almost identical with that of the hon. Member for Mayo. If the Government had pleased they could have introduced, by way of amendment to the hon. Member's Bill, all the limitations which they had put into their own Bill. Without any departure from principle this might be done; and, as he understood, the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) had intimated his intention of proposing Amendments to this Bill to make the two Bills similar. What was the principle of these two Bills? He quite admitted that in one sense they were framed on a principle the germ of which was found in the Land Act of 1870. As the House was well aware, in that Act very large provisions were made for the protection of the tenants at the expense of the landlords of Ireland. By the 3rd clause protection was given against eviction; by the 4th clause the value of improvements was secured; and by the 7th clause compensation was secured for goodwill paid by the incoming to the outgoing tenant. Not to go through all the clauses, it was alleged by the Prime Minister, on the second reading, that it did confer on the tenantry of Ireland such benefits and protection as were not enjoyed by the occupiers of the soil in England or Scotland, who were amongst the most favoured nations in this respect; but, though large concessions were made at the expense of the landlords, two principles were insisted upon as a kind of set-off against these concessions, and great credit was taken by the Prime Minister for the maintenance of those principles.

Mr. Plunket

Therefore, this argument of the right hon. Gentleman fell to the ground. Then the right hon. Gentleman pointed to the Ulster custom, by which the tenant gets his compensation, and, no doubt, he does get compensation. But there is an important distinction between tenants under the custom in Ulster and in other parts of Ireland. Under the Ulster custom, he buys his right when he comes in, and is paid for it when he goes out; while in other parts of the country, he would, under the Land Act, have a claim for compensation for disturbance, whether he had purchased the goodwill on entry or not. This is the distinction between the two cases; and the argument with regard to the Ulster custom, therefore, falls to the ground. Again, though I have listened to the right hon. Gentleman with great attention, I can find nothing in his speech to account for the sudden change of policy on the part of the Government, or to remove in the least the objection I have to the nature and character of this measure. What is the effect of the Bill? The right hon. Gentleman has told the House this afternoon that I hold, and have always held, that the principle of compensation for disturbance was the worst and most vicious feature in the Irish Land Act. I acknowledge and entirely adhere to that opinion. The right hon. Gentleman has given us his version of the meaning of compensation for disturbance. Now, there must be many hon. Members in the House who do not remember the discussions on that principle when the Bill of 1870 was being passed; and as some of them, probably, do not realize the true purport and meaning of the principle, perhaps I may be permitted to give my version of it also. I am not speaking now of compensation for improvements, of what would be called tenant right in England, in the direction of which few men would probably be disposed to go further than myself. Compensation for improvements is one thing, compensation for disturbance is another. The improvements which a tenant makes on a farm are provided for elsewhere, in the 4th clause of the Land Act, largely and liberally, as they ought to be, and especially in the case of Ireland, where, owing to the immense competition for land, the tenant is in a worse position to make a fair bargain with his landlord

than in England. But over and above his compensation for improvements, and after he has been repaid for everything which he has spent upon his farm, the tenant is entitled in Ireland, under the 3rd clause, to a further claim besides, to what is called "compensation for disturbance," a principle by which the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Land Act of 1870 apparently desired to give to the tenant a proprietary interest in the soil, and did, in fact, entitle him to levy on the landlord a fine, amounting in some cases to seven years' rent, or one-third of the value of the fee simple of the land. It is to that principle, to which I objected from the first that it was indefensible and inexpedient, that I renew my objections more strongly than before, after 10 years' experience of its actual operation. Let me point out to the House a few of the extravagances to which some of the principles of the Bill may lead. I need not remind hon. Gentlemen that the position of the occupier of the soil in Ireland is one very eagerly sought after, and that the privilege of holding a farm is very highly prized. But we must remember that it is the landlord who first confers this privilege upon the tenant; and it seems to me absolutely monstrous to make a landlord compensate a tenant for the loss or rather the non-continuance of a privilege which in the first instance emanated from himself. You might as well—or, perhaps, even with more justice—compensate a man for the refusal of a farm in the first instance, and with this additional good reason—that while in the first case he has enjoyed the profits of the farm for years, in the latter he would have no chance of making any profits at all. This is the first absurdity to which we are logically driven by the principle of compensation for disturbance. I may venture to quote the opinion of a very high authority on the subject. Judge Longfield says with reference to this measure—

Then he goes on to say—

not been clearly stated; and he would like to know whether there were any restrictions so described as to cause reliance to be placed upon the course of action which should be taken. They certainly affected a considerable part of Ireland, inasmuch as the Bill applied to 13 counties, and to more than one-half of the whole country. Why should that distinction be drawn? The Schedule in which those districts were specified was drawn up for the purposes of the distress, and, no doubt, much distress had existed in some parts; but there were some parts mentioned in the Schedule which had been entirely free from distress, although surrounded by distressed districts; while, on the other hand, there were some parts not included in the Schedule which were as much in distress as those within the bounds of the Schedule. Now, he wished to know why a Schedule of that kind ought to be taken as a guide for a measure of the nature before the House, and should at all interfere with the bargain which had been made between two men by saying that the landlord's rent should not be obtained from a tenant? There was no ground upon which they would be able permanently to base such a capricious restriction. The measure provided that if an owner of land came within the Schedule, he came within the benefit of the Act; whereas those who owned land outside the Schedule did not come within the purposes of the measure. What justice was there in refusing the right to men outside, while they granted it to those inside? [Mr. PARNELL: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member for Cork thought there was injustice in such a result, and he could well understand such a conviction in his mind. Now, there was another restriction to which he wished to refer. The Bill was confined to two years, or to one year and a-half. But why should any such time be fixed upon? He had heard from some authorities on the other side of the House that the distress had already almost passed away. ["No, no!"] The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had certainly stated the other night that in some parts the distress had been successfully grappled with, and that in other districts, though there was still suffering, there was hope of an abundant harvest, which it was believed would entirely remove it. ["No, no!"] But

supposing they had one good year or two good years, followed by another wet autumn and a bad spring, were they going to continue this Bill? And if they were not, how could they rest firmly on such insecure restrictions as these? He had no faith in any limitation of time when once the right principle which should pervade the measure had been departed from. But the most extraordinary part of the Bill was probably that relating to the tenant's ability or inability to pay. If they wished to evade the payment of rent they should do it straightaway by a Bill like the one introduced by the hon. Member for County Mayo; but to throw upon the County Court Judge the onus of deciding in such a matter was an utterly impracticable and absurd proposal. He would have to ask the tenant—"Are you able to pay?" Well, the answer they would easily guess, for there were very few tenants in Ireland, or even in England at the present time, who did not experience more or less difficulty in meeting their payments. Then, how could the Chairman cross-examine the tenant as to his means, or the landlord contradict the statements which might be made by the tenant? It was important to remember that the Bill only referred to the landlord's debt, while there was nothing about the tradesman and the money-lender. The tenant might simply come forward and say that there had been a very bad year for the crops, that he was in the scheduled district, and that he had found it very difficult to get on; that he had had to take goods on credit and to get money from the money-lender. The law the Government wished to establish would then in principle lay down that the tenant must pay the tradesman and the money-lender, but not the landlord. Such distinctions introduced into the measure some of the worst principles put forward by the anti-rent agitators. The result would be exactly the same, and the discretion given to the Chairman and the County Court Judge would be perfectly useless. The Bill would keep an open door for the dishonest tenant; it would be a terrible temptation to the honest one; it provided that the duties to the landlords would be in quite a different category to the other creditors; it would prove bad teaching to the people of Ireland, and no need would exist for anyone to urge a tenant not to pay his rent. The right

come a principle, asserted by the same rural logic, the startling consequences of which have filled the mind of the country with apprehension and horror almost every day. The argument of the Irish tenant—belonging to the very class that you think you are now setting up by this violation of the fundamental law of the country—will be to this effect:—‘I have lost my holding because I did not pay my rent; can anything be more flagrantly unjust than that a man should be deprived of his contingent right to a third of the freehold because he does not pay his rent?’ That is a natural view which may lead to a much more successful agitation than any we have yet heard of. The question is unanswerable; we may think it is abstractedly unreasonable, but it is the necessary result of our legislation. And what will be the consequence? Why, that payment of rent will become a grievance, and you will find yourselves in exactly the same position in which you are now placed. There will be great complaints of the consolidation of farms, great complaints of vexatious and tyrannical evictions, and, on the other, side the most violent means by which the supposed rights of the occupiers to property in the soil may be vindicated will be resorted to. And so far from the improvement of the country, so far from terminating all these misunderstandings and heartburnings, which we seem now so anxious upon both sides of the House to bring to a close,”—

—“you will have the same controversies still raging, only with increased acerbity, and under circumstances and conditions which inevitably must lead to increased bitterness and increased perils to society.”—[3 Hansard, cc. 1184-5.]

This is no prophecy by one who is wise only after the event. These words were spoken, Mr. Speaker, upwards of 10 years ago, by a Member of this House, when the foresight of a statesman told him what must be the inevitable results of the reckless policy of the right hon. Gentleman. His name was Mr. Disraeli. His words, his language are literally fulfilled in the transactions of this hour. Comment upon my part would be utterly superfluous. I ask the House of Commons—I ask hon. Members on both sides to support me when I move, as I do now, the rejection of this most ill-timed, most ill-advised, and most unrighteous measure.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months.”—(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL, in supporting the Bill, said, he hoped when the

hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire had made himself more completely master of the circumstances in Ireland which called for that legislation—which had justified that legislation—he would find the Bill more acceptable than he had done that day. He was very glad, however, to find English Members entertained themselves with the consideration of Irish questions, because the more they were entertained the more they would see the justice of the views of the people of Ireland. He had no doubt that the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken would be prepared in a spirit of sincere generosity to deal with the funds of the Imperial Exchequer for the relief of Irish distress; but there he seemed to stop. This Bill, however, proposed to do something—although by a temporary measure—to redress the state of things which had led to the present condition of Ireland. The hon. Member had told an interesting story of a mortgage for £15,000, which was very near completion, but which, owing to the introduction of this Bill, fell through, the landlord being unable to effect a loan. If the views of the parties to that commercial transaction were based on the opinions entertained by the hon. Gentleman as to the extravagant character of the present Bill, he could well understand that the transaction should have fallen through. But it would probably be found that the result of this debate, and especially of the speech of the Chief Secretary, would be that the transaction would be carried out. He recognized the perfect consistency of the hon. Gentleman in his opposition to this Bill, seeing that he was an opponent of the legislation of 1870. Those who, like the hon. Gentleman, had set themselves against the legislation of 1870, were justified in taking the course which he had taken. But hon. Gentlemen on both sides who were willing to accept the legislation of 1870 would not be led away by the arguments of the hon. Member. This was a Bill which was not only limited in time, but limited in area; it was in harmony with the Bill of 1870, and was justified by the exceptional circumstances of the present time. Its object was to restrain ejectments for non-payment of rent in Ireland in a limited area and for a limited time under certain stringent conditions. And here he would mention what was not gene-

of that House, on whichever side they sat, and however they voted, must regret that on all occasions whenever the words "landlord" and "tenant" were introduced in debate in that House they invariably acted as Shibboleths which resolved the House into two hostile camps, instead of being an inducement to the House to do all they could to promote the union, most intimate as it should be, of those who were so closely connected together in interest and relation. Whatever injured the landlord would re-act on the tenant, and whatever was injurious to the tenant would re-act on the landlord. He could not understand why the principle of the Bill had been denounced as inequitable, for it appeared to him to give perfectly equal justice both to landlords and to tenants. The principle of this Bill was the principle which was endeavoured to be introduced into the Land Act of 1870 in the interest of the landlord class. The principle of this Bill was that if a tenant in a limited area, for a limited time, and in exceptional circumstances, was willing to continue in occupation of his holding on just and reasonable terms, and if those terms were unreasonably refused by the landlord, then, and then only, did the scope of the Act come into operation for the protection of the tenant. Now, the 18th section of the Land Act of 1870 gave the Court power to deal with the equities both on the one side and the other, both of the landlord and tenant—

"If," said the Act of 1870, "it shall appear to the Court in any case in which compensation shall be claimed under Section 3 of this Act, that the landlord has been and is willing to permit the tenant to continue in the occupation of his holding upon just and reasonable terms, and that such terms have been and are unreasonably refused by the tenant, the claim of the tenant to such compensation shall be disallowed."

The application of that principle was the governing principle of the Bill before the House. Would not hon. Gentlemen opposite rebel with indignation the aspersion that they were not just and reasonable, and were not willing to act justly and reasonably? But then the Bill did not override any right they would desire to exercise. They would not be deprived by this Bill of the means of recovering their rent. The Bill had been denounced by hon. Members opposite, and by the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Leitrim (Major O'Beirne), as a revolutionary measure, introduced to confiscate the property of the landlords. Now, with great respect, he could hardly think, if Gentlemen would look at the matter impartially and fairly, they would think that a fair or adequate description of the principle of the Bill. A great calamity had befallen a large part of Ireland. It might be described as pervading half Ireland—that was to say, if they drew a line down Ireland through Athlone, the districts to the west of that line were distressed. It was the object of the Bill to assist distressed parts of the country; and the principles of this Bill had, in fact, been sanctioned by the last Parliament and by the Conservative Government by the first Act, passed in 1880. That Act originated in a Motion by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway County (Major Nolan), who would, he supposed, be classed by his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Plunket) with those to whom he applied such strong language. The question, then, was, whether large tracts of Ireland were to be left uncultivated and waste, or should means be furnished in the interest of the community at large for their cultivation. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway County proposed that present relief should then be given by the distribution of seeds. No voice had then suggested that Parliament thus had confiscated the property of landlords or any property. That Bill was limited to the distressed districts, and was also limited in time. Did anyone ever say that that Act which Parliament thus sanctioned was intended to establish the principle that tenants thereafter were not to provide their own seeds, or rely on their own resources; and that, because assistance was given them when they had been scourged by the visitation of Providence, therefore they were not in future to exert their own powers? In distressed districts assistance had thus been given to the cultivators of the soil; but it yet remained temporarily to arrange satisfactorily the mutual and relative duties of the landlord and the tenant in distressed districts lest large tracts of land subjected to the visitation of Providence, which might have been uncultivated, should yet become waste and untenanted. Notwithstanding the energetic and denunciatory language of the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Plunket), he could hardly think the House would hesitate to agree to this Bill. Let them look at parts of the district to which the Act was intended to apply. He would take a district from Ulster, another from Connaught, and another from Munster; and he would ask, should not assistance be given to the men to whom this Bill would apply? They were men of small and struggling circumstances; but were they, therefore, to be refused the fair relief which this Bill would give? In the County Donegal, where tenant right prevailed, and where the action of the police, and the assistance of the military, was not required to protect and enforce the process of the law, there were 1,100,000 acres divided into 33,000 holdings. 17,000 of these holdings did not exceed £4 valuation, 8,000 exceeded £4, but did not exceed £8, valuation. Out of 33,000 holdings, therefore, nearly 25,000 did not exceed a valuation of £8. Now let the House come to the aid of those 25,000 holdings, which represented, in most instances, the head of a family with a wife and children. Then as to the County of Mayo. It contained 1,300,000 acres, divided into 36,000 holdings. Of these, 19,000 holdings did not exceed £4 valuation, while 10,400 exceeded £4, but did not exceed £8, valuation. Nearly the same figures would prevail in the County of Galway, where there was an acreage of over 1,000,000 divided into 38,000 holdings, of which 28,000 did not exceed £8 valuation. The facts in the County of Kerry were much the same. With those figures before it, would the House consider that in the present circumstances of exceptional distress the power which the law gave of recovering rent by ejectment was to be used for the indirect purpose of clearing the land of its occupiers? To prevent that, and for that purpose alone, this Bill was introduced. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. O. Russell) had sketched with great accuracy the growth of rent ejectment in Ireland, and had shown how in this great and prosperous country this power did not exist in the same degree as in Ireland. No one would object to the law being made use of for the legitimate purpose for which it was originally intended—namely, of recovering rent. It was not until 1860

that in the Civil Bill Courts in Ireland landlords were empowered to maintain ejectment for non-payment of rent in respect of yearly tenancies held without writing and merely by oral and verbal arrangement, and it was not until the year 1860 that similar jurisdiction was given to Superior Courts. These constituted the great bulk of yearly tenancies in Ireland. It was thus only for the purpose of enabling the landlord to recover his rent that this power of eviction was given, and it was never contemplated that it was to be used for the purpose of clearing the land of its inhabitants. But, after all, the landlord would retain all the same power to recover his rent. He might also, like any other creditor, bring his action for what was due; he could get a judgment of the Court, and by virtue of that judgment he could realize through a Sheriff's sale the property taken in execution. The interest in the holding, if any, might be sold; and if anything over and above the liabilities was realized the tenant might get it. Amongst other benefits of the Ulster custom, where it prevailed, the tenant was secured the right to sell his interest, if he did not wish to remain, or if he became unable to pay his rent and was ejected for non-payment of rent. If the House would compare the Bill with the Land Act, it would see that both were on the same lines. It was not introduced for any political purpose. It was honestly introduced to meet exceptional distress from failure of crops. It run in the same groove as the Seeds Act. Its principle was simply this—that where a tenant was unable to pay, and where his inability was caused by the distress which had arisen from the failure of crops, and he could satisfy the Court—which, be it well remembered, was not to be an arbitrary Court, but one which Parliament had set up for the purpose of the Land Act—that his propositions for the arrangement of his rent and its arrears and otherwise were just and reasonable, and that his landlord unreasonably rejected those fair overtures, then that he should be compensated for the disturbance. Was that a Bill which was a subversion of the rights of property? Hon. Gentlemen who were so generous to their own tenantry were, at this moment, doing what the Bill would force those in whom justice and generosity had no place also to do. Was it to be that the bone and sinew of the country were to have no consideration after their recent bitter famine experiences? Stung with despair, they might be driven to emigrate to foreign lands. Would the House send them away with a feeling rankling in their hearts that the farms where they were born—where, perhaps, they had closed their parents' eyes in death—were not to be protected, and that they could not obtain the smallest consideration at the hands of the House of Commons of a United Kingdom. Would they not rather take from the hand of the agitator one of his most fatal weapons, and, at all events, show the people that that great Assembly was not afraid to be just?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Tottenham.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, that, considering the importance of the question, and the limited number of hon. Members who had had an opportunity of addressing the House upon it, he would consent to the adjournment of the debate until Tuesday at 2 o'clock.

MR. PARNELL thought it was much more likely to be brought to a close at an Evening Sitting than at a Morning Sitting.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government had already lost two Mondays, and he must ask them to go into Supply on Monday. It was absolutely necessary.

THE O'DONOGHUE remarked that Tuesday had been mentioned for the Bradlaugh affair, and it was a matter of Privilege.

MR. GLADSTONE replied, that they would see what happened; but they were in hopes that that would not be taken.

MR. GIBSON hoped that before the debate was resumed the Papers which had been quoted by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would be laid upon the Table, in such a form as to distinguish evictions for non-payment of rent from other causes. He also hoped Returns would be given of ejectments in cities and towns. He trusted that the Chief Secretary would hurry on the printing of the Poor Law Returns which he mentioned the other day.

The Solicitor General for Ireland

MR. W. E. FORSTER was afraid it would be impossible to produce all these Returns within the time mentioned.

Motion agreed to.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.—[BILL 188.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Fawcett, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [18th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the extension of the limits of deposits in Savings Banks proposed in this Bill would result in so serious a discouragement of private enterprise that, in the opinion of this House, no such step should be taken without careful inquiry,"—(Mr. William Fowler,)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. BARING expressed a hope that the Prime Minister would not press the Bill, since many hon. Gentlemen who were interested in it had gone away under the impression that it would not come on.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the objections were only in regard to matters of detail, which could be perfectly well discussed in Committee. The debate was only adjourned on the last occasion in consequence of the interposition of one hon. Gentleman.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not insist on reading the Bill a second time at present. He knew several Gentlemen who wished to speak on the subject.

MR. GLADSTONE, interposing, said, he had given Notice that he would take the second reading of the Bill the first opportunity he had.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, that in that case he should talk it out. He did not think it was fair of the right hon. Gentleman to push the Bill so, and take advantage of the absence of hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in it.

Mr. GLADSTONE hoped the hon. Baronet would not use language of that kind. He was not taking advantage of anyone in their absence.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he begged pardon if he had said anything amiss, and would withdraw the expression.

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at five minutes before Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CLOSING OF PUBLIC-HOUSES ON SUNDAY—RESOLUTION.

Mr. STEVENSON, in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the Law which limits the hours of sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday in England and Wales should be amended so as to apply to the whole of the day,"

said, that in bringing forward this important question he was greatly encouraged by the result of the discussion which took place only a week ago on the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). He believed his hon. Friend would not think he was criticizing in a hostile spirit the Resolution which he introduced, if he submitted that the Resolution he (Mr. Stevenson) had to propose was one of a much simpler character, and attended, in many respects, with fewer difficulties, and ought, therefore, more readily to command the attention of the House. There was no doubt about "Sunday closing," though some hon. Members had expressed a doubt as to the meaning of "Local Option." There was no question of compensation connected with this Resolution. He was glad to think that no question of compensation could possibly arise in connection with this Resolution, because, during the discussion of an analogous measure relating to Ireland, the question of compensation was considered and deliberately rejected as having no foundation. Nine-tenths of the population of Ireland were under the régime of Sunday closing, and the whole of Scotland between 20 and 30 years had been under a similar law. It appeared to be a great anomaly that the only trade to be carried on openly and generally on Sunday should be that of persons who, under the name of Licensed Victuallers, furnished anything rather than victuals, and little in the way of refreshments, to travellers. The contraction of the hours of sale on Sunday began in London. The Preamble to the Act of 1848 recited that provisions which had been in force in the Metropolitan Police district for some time had been attended with great benefits. A further contraction was made by the Act of the present Lord Winmarleigh, when Colonel Wilson Patten, which closed public-houses in the afternoon. It was a misunderstanding to suppose that there was any connection between that Act and the Hyde Park riots, for the Act had been in successful operation 10 months, and the riots were brought about by an attempt to limit Sunday trading in other articles in certain parts of London. Some publicans took advantage of the opportunity to direct the attention of Parliament to the subject, and in a panic the number of open hours was increased from seven to eight-and-half; but still afternoon closing was retained. In 1868, the last year of the £10 householder Parliament, Mr. Abel Smith brought in a Bill to reduce the hours and to alter the character of the sale from consumption on to consumption off the premises. It was said the last Session of that Parliament was chosen because the promoters of the measure dared not have proposed it in the reformed Parliament; but the real state of the case was just the other way, for in the reformed Parliament there was greater possibility of dealing with the subject than there was in that which represented the £10 householders. The new Parliament had the better means of knowing what the views of the constituencies were. He believed the great majority of the people desired Sunday closing. He believed proaching correctness—and he said it with no disrespect—the right hon. Gentleman did not seem to understand his own proposals. He produced a number of ejectments; but he was unable to say what proportion applied to the country and what to the towns; how many for non-payments, and how many for other causes. He adopted an average of five years previous to 1877, and then made the addition from year to year. Was it possible to ask the House to take action on such a statement? So far as he understood the contention of the right hon. Gentleman, it was that some ejectments were for non-payment of rent, and that this number had considerably increased lately. Well, of course, in a time of the prevalence of extraordinary distress, ejectments for non-payment would increase, as in England the same cause threw a large number of farms on the hands of the landlords. They could not expect a normal state of things under such exceptional circumstances. But he did note one thing, and that was that the increase in the number of ejectments for the last 18 months kept pace with and accompanied the unhappy and disastrous land agitation of that time. Was this remarkable when by orators, who had the ears of the people, the latter were told not to pay rent except as the last payment to be made? Every other claim was first to be settled. Could it be surprising, then, that landlords were obliged to take action now to a greater degree than at other times? It would have been more surprising had there not been this increase in the number of ejectments for non-payment. He knew also that simultaneously with this agitation agrarian outrage had blazed out with fearful intensity. He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman speaking with some degree of decision, in condemnation of the anti-rent agitation; but the conclusion he drew was rather a strange one. He spoke with warmth and justice of the agitation which had misled the people, and which was likely to mislead them further; but here in the Bill was practically the same principle and the same view put forth in the House as had been pressed in Ireland by the Land League. ["No, no!"] Certainly he understood the Bill lately introduced by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) was put forward by eminent members of the League. Therefore, he said that the Bill practically gave a Government sanction to some, at least, of their strongest demands, for he was right in saying that the principle of the Government Bill and that of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) were the same. The Government sanctioned the strongest immediate demands of the League. He said the immediate demands, for what the ulterior effects might be he could not say. But as to the propriety of intrusting to some third person to settle what was or was not a reasonable rent, as to the propriety of interfering between landlord and tenant, simply on account of the prevailing distress, it did sanction and adopt the principles which had been put forward for months by the Land League. He would undertake now to prove that in principle the proposal was almost identical with that of the hon. Member for Mayo. If the Government had pleased they could have introduced, by way of amendment to the hon. Member's Bill, all the limitations which they had put into their own Bill. Without any departure from principle this might be done; and, as he understood, the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) had intimated his intention of proposing Amendments to this Bill to make the two Bills similar. What was the principle of these two Bills? He quite admitted that in one sense they were framed on a principle the germ of which was found in the Land Act of 1870. As the House was well aware, in that Act very large provisions were made for the protection of the tenants at the expense of the landlords of Ireland. By the 3rd clause protection was given against eviction; by the 4th clause the value of improvements was secured; and by the 7th clause compensation was secured for goodwill paid by the incoming to the outgoing tenant. Not to go through all the clauses, it was alleged by the Prime Minister, on the second reading, that it did confer on the tenantry of Ireland such benefits and protection as were not enjoyed by the occupiers of the soil in England or Scotland, who were amongst the most favoured nations in this respect; but, though large concessions were made at the expense of the landlords, two principles were insisted upon as a kind of set-off against these concessions, and great credit was taken by the Prime Minister for the maintenance of those principles.

state of society in our time, certainly not in the condition of things existing in Ireland, it could be right, or just, or conducive to the good of the State, that the landlord should have the power, if he chose to exert it, of depopulating a whole country side. The only restraints upon him were self-interest and public opinion—restraints not always effectual. It was the existence of such a power that shackled the hands and arms of the industrious man, who would otherwise receive the fruits of his industry; and he failed to understand how there could be any injustice in allowing a man to be secure in the possession of the land on which he laboured so long as he did nothing to injure the property of his landlord, did not sub-let it, and so long as he paid a fair and just rent. Until some such state of things as that was brought about, he did not believe there would be any real or permanent settlement of this question. It was not alone the social evils of the system. Let the House consider the moral evils of it. Whilst Ireland was freer than England from other classes of crime, agrarian crime abounded, and a large part of the population sympathized with it. Surely that was the loudest and most eloquent denunciation of the present state of the law, coming, as it did, from a people not wanting in other matters in high moral qualities. He desired to be understood as speaking as one seriously anxious that there should be real union between England and Ireland, and that Ireland should share the career, the destiny, and the prosperity of the people of this country; and he hoped to see the time when the people of Ireland, prosperous and contented, would lend a willing obedience to laws which fostered their industry and secured its fruits.

MR. PLUNKET said, he felt sure the House would agree with him when he congratulated the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down on the speech which he had addressed to the House. He would not follow the hon. and learned Member in his large argument and the general treatment of the question, which, it seemed to him, would have been better adapted to some debates in the year 1870, before the Land Act was passed, or which might be raised at a future time when another Land Act was before the House; but which, he thought, went a little wide of the particular subject of discussion. There was very much in what he said as to the existing distress in Ireland in which he concurred and sympathized. Everything spoken on this point by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland in introducing the debate he freely adopted. He had never denied that there was severe distress in certain districts; and though this distress was happily diminished in extent and intensity, some still existed. But, as the Chief Secretary said last night, the greater portion of the danger from famine—the extreme pinch—had been successfully grappled with. With the efforts of those who effectually checked the increase of distress he entirely sympathized; and he could bear testimony, from what he had seen in the West of Ireland, to the extraordinary patience and endurance with which many of the tenantry bore their great privations. He would be proud to join in any effort to relieve this distress, and on this account he was glad that the measure before the House did not form part of the Relief of Distress Bill; because, while willing to support the Government in any Bill having that object, he must say at once he looked upon the Bill before them in a wholly different light. It was not a Relief Bill, it was a political proposal; and he should resist it, because he believed that as between landlord and tenant it would do the greatest amount of injury and the least amount of good. It was a direct confiscation of the income of one class in favour of another—of the landlord in favour of the tenant. He was certain, also, that the mere introduction of the measure—for he could never believe that it would pass—had done much, and would do more, to strengthen and confirm that disastrous agitation which for 18 months had raged in Ireland. He was bound to give the Bill, which strengthened the most violent proposals of agitators, his strongest opposition. He had felt somewhat at a loss to know how the Chief Secretary would justify the introduction of such a Bill. What hidden statistics, carefully sifted, while entirely undreamt of by the public, he was going to spring upon the House in asking for this exceptional and extraordinary measure? But what were the facts? Not one figure that could be vouched for as approaching correctness—and he said it with no disrespect—the right hon. Gentleman did not seem to understand his own proposals. He produced a number of ejectments; but he was unable to say what proportion applied to the country and what to the towns; how many for non-payments, and how many for other causes. He adopted an average of five years previous to 1877, and then made the addition from year to year. Was it possible to ask the House to take action on such a statement? Mr. Plunket

hon. Gentleman had expressed a hope that the Bill would be a great advantage to landlords in recovering their debts. In point of fact, however, a landlord would be deprived of the only effectual remedy he had to recover his rent. The honest tenants who hitherto had paid their rents would be tempted to exclaim—"What fools we were!" Even if this Bill should not become law, the mere initiation of it would have done a fearful amount of mischief. For some time past great courage was required on the part of those who opposed the unprincipled agitation in Ireland. ["No!"] He maintained that it was an unprincipled agitation. Ministers of religion and ecclesiastics high in the Church to which the majority of the Irish people belonged had stood forward and warned the people against the agitation. ["No!"] The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, in his Pastoral of November 17, said—

"Very rev. fathers, while standing forward to support our flocks in this their dark hour of distress, we must not fear to raise our voices to warn them against the results of their faults or mistakes. Our principle must be to give to Cæsar what Cæsar justly claims, else we cannot give to God what God commands. If just debts, fairly demanded, be not honestly discharged, a principle fatal to the prosperity of our country will be established, and sooner or later it will recoil on the heads of those who to-day may seem to be gainers by its adoption. But let us pray, rev. fathers, that the day may be yet far distant when Irishmen, who in olden times were renowned for their love of impartial justice, should set to the world an example of faith disregarded."

The sanction which this Bill seemed, as he had shown, to give to the programme of the agitators must paralyze the efforts of these holy men. He must now say a few words on behalf of the unhappy landlords of Ireland, many of whom were among his own constituents. The sources of their income in many cases would be dried up by the Bill when it became law; while, on the other hand, their taxes and other outgoings would still have to be met by them. Hundreds and thousands of landlords would practically receive no rent at all until 1882, and would so be ruined. He had endeavoured to show that, in principle, the Bill was really precisely the same as that for which it was brought forward as a substitute, and which made ejectment for non-payment of rent a disturbance. Such a principle was not based upon any sound lines. By adopting it they conferred as little benefit as possible on the honest tenants, and inflicted as much injury as possible upon landlords. It was his firm and strong belief that the measure would be regarded as a surrender to the land agitation. He knew the right hon. Gentleman had spoken generally against the agitation, and that he had pledged himself not to take any further steps in the same direction; but he should remember that his words would be read by only a few of the people to whom they referred, whilst the concessions he had made would be known to all. It was well known that Government had, at first, refused to do anything of the kind during the Session, and that they had refused to accept the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo; but that Parliamentary pressure had been successfully put upon them by those who favoured the anti-rent agitation, and that the leaders of the movement were induced to withdraw their Bill on the pledge of the Government to introduce the present measure. He knew that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was satisfied with the change which had come over the Government in this respect. The hon. Member recently remarked—

"Within the last few days the general situation has entirely changed, so far as the attitude of the Government upon the Land Question is concerned. Having announced at the beginning of the Session that they would not touch the subject this Session they now introduce a Bill very similar to that of Mr. O'Connor Power, and to effect an object which the draughtsmanship of Dr. Commins in Mr. Power's Bill has taught them how to accomplish. We shall now have an opportunity of introducing a clause for the suspension of ejectments, and also any other amendment of the Land Laws which it may be thought desirable this Session to press for."

He thought, therefore, that after that frank declaration on the part of the hon. Member for Cork, who was, at least, the godfather of the hon. Member for Mayo's Bill, it was unnecessary for him further to prove how identical they were in principle, and how likely this Bill, if passed into law, was to countenance the anti-rent agitation by carrying out one of the main articles in their programme by depriving the landlords of their rents.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he thought hon. and right hon. Members

not been clearly stated; and he would like to know whether there were any restrictions so described as to cause reliance to be placed upon the course of action which should be taken. They certainly affected a considerable part of Ireland, inasmuch as the Bill applied to 13 counties, and to more than one-half of the whole country. Why should that distinction be drawn? The Schedule in which those districts were specified was drawn up for the purposes of the distress, and, no doubt, much distress had existed in some parts; but there were some parts mentioned in the Schedule which had been entirely free from distress, although surrounded by distressed districts; while, on the other hand, there were some parts not included in the Schedule which were as much in distress as those within the bounds of the Schedule. Now, he wished to know why a Schedule of that kind ought to be taken as a guide for a measure of the nature before the House, and should at all interfere with the bargain which had been made between two men by saying that the landlord's rent should not be obtained from a tenant? There was no ground upon which they would be able permanently to base such a capricious restriction. The measure provided that if an owner of land came within the Schedule, he came within the benefit of the Act; whereas those who owned land outside the Schedule did not come within the purposes of the measure. What justice was there in refusing the right to men outside, while they granted it to those inside? [Mr. PARNELL: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member for Cork thought there was injustice in such a result, and he could well understand such a conviction in his mind. Now, there was another restriction to which he wished to refer. The Bill was confined to two years, or to one year and a-half. But why should any such time be fixed upon? He had heard from some authorities on the other side of the House that the distress had already almost passed away. ["No, no!"] The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had certainly stated the other night that in some parts the distress had been successfully grappled with, and that in other districts, though there was still suffering, there was hope of an abundant harvest, which it was believed would entirely remove it. ["No, no!"] But

supposing they had one good year or two good years, followed by another wet autumn and a bad spring, were they going to continue this Bill? And if they were not, how could they rest firmly on such insecure restrictions as these? He had no faith in any limitation of time when once the right principle which should pervade the measure had been departed from. But the most extraordinary part of the Bill was probably that relating to the tenant's ability or inability to pay. If they wished to evade the payment of rent they should do it straightaway by a Bill like the one introduced by the hon. Member for County Mayo; but to throw upon the County Court Judge the onus of deciding in such a matter was an utterly impracticable and absurd proposal. He would have to ask the tenant—"Are you able to pay?" Well, the answer they would easily guess, for there were very few tenants in Ireland, or even in England at the present time, who did not experience more or less difficulty in meeting their payments. Then, how could the Chairman cross-examine the tenant as to his means, or the landlord contradict the statements which might be made by the tenant? It was important to remember that the Bill only referred to the landlord's debt, while there was nothing about the tradesman and the money-lender. The tenant might simply come forward and say that there had been a very bad year for the crops, that he was in the scheduled district, and that he had found it very difficult to get on; that he had had to take goods on credit and to get money from the money-lender. The law the Government wished to establish would then in principle lay down that the tenant must pay the tradesman and the money-lender, but not the landlord. Such distinctions introduced into the measure some of the worst principles put forward by the anti-rent agitators. The result would be exactly the same, and the discretion given to the Chairman and the County Court Judge would be perfectly useless. The Bill would keep an open door for the dishonest tenant; it would be a terrible temptation to the honest one; it provided that the duties to the landlords would be in quite a different category to the other creditors; it would prove bad teaching to the people of Ireland, and no need would exist for anyone to urge a tenant not to pay his rent. The right

hon. Gentleman had expressed a hope that the Bill would be a great advantage to landlords in recovering their debts. In point of fact, however, a landlord would be deprived of the only effectual remedy he had to recover his rent. The honest tenants who hitherto had paid their rents would be tempted to exclaim—"What fools we were!" Member for Mayo's Bill, it was unnecessary for him further to prove how identical they were in principle, and how likely this Bill, if passed into law, was to countenance the anti-rent agitation by carrying out one of the main articles in their programme by depriving the landlords of their rents.

of that House, on whichever side they sat, and however they voted, must regret that on all occasions whenever the words "landlord" and "tenant" were introduced in debate in that House they invariably acted as Shibboleths which resolved the House into two hostile camps, instead of being an inducement to the House to do all they could to promote the union, most intimate as it should be, of those who were so closely connected together in interest and relation. Whatever injured the landlord would re-act on the tenant, and whatever was injurious to the tenant would re-act on the landlord. He could not understand why the principle of the Bill had been denounced as inequitable, for it appeared to him to give perfectly equal justice both to landlords and to tenants. The principle of this Bill was the principle which was endeavoured to be introduced into the Land Act of 1870 in the interest of the landlord class. The principle of this Bill was that if a tenant in a limited area, for a limited time, and in exceptional circumstances, was willing to continue in occupation of his holding on just and reasonable terms, and if those terms were unreasonably refused by the landlord, then, and then only, did the scope of the Act come into operation for the protection of the tenant. Now, the 18th section of the Land Act of 1870 gave the Court power to deal with the equities both on the one side and the other, both of the landlord and tenant—

"If," said the Act of 1870, "it shall appear to the Court in any case in which compensation shall be claimed under Section 3 of this Act, that the landlord has been and is willing to permit the tenant to continue in the occupation of his holding upon just and reasonable terms, and that such terms have been and are unreasonably refused by the tenant, the claim of the tenant to such compensation shall be disallowed."

The application of that principle was the governing principle of the Bill before the House. Would not hon. Gentlemen opposite rebel with indignation the aspersion that they were not just and reasonable, and were not willing to act justly and reasonably? But then the Bill did not override any right they would desire to exercise. They would not be deprived by this Bill of the means of recovering their rent. The Bill had been denounced by hon. Members opposite, and by the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Leitrim (Major O'Beirne), as a revolutionary measure, introduced to confiscate the property of the landlords. Now, with great respect, he could hardly think, if Gentlemen would look at the matter impartially and fairly, they would think that a fair or adequate description of the principle of the Bill. A great calamity had befallen a large part of Ireland. It might be described as pervading half Ireland—that was to say, if they drew a line down Ireland through Athlone, the districts to the west of that line were distressed. It was the object of the Bill to assist distressed parts of the country; and the principles of this Bill had, in fact, been sanctioned by the last Parliament and by the Conservative Government by the first Act, passed in 1880. That Act originated in a Motion by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway County (Major Nolan), who would, he supposed, be classed by his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Plunket) with those to whom he applied such strong language. The question, then, was, whether large tracts of Ireland were to be left uncultivated and waste, or should means be furnished in the interest of the community at large for their cultivation. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway County proposed that present relief should then be given by the distribution of seeds. No voice had then suggested that Parliament thus had confiscated the property of landlords or any property. That Bill was limited to the distressed districts, and was also limited in time. Did anyone ever say that that Act which Parliament thus sanctioned was intended to establish the principle that tenants thereafter were not to provide their own seeds, or rely on their own resources; and that, because assistance was given them when they had been scourged by the visitation of Providence, therefore they were not in future to exert their own powers? In distressed districts assistance had thus been given to the cultivators of the soil; but it yet remained temporarily to arrange satisfactorily the mutual and relative duties of the landlord and the tenant in distressed districts lest large tracts of land subjected to the visitation of Providence, which might have been uncultivated, should yet become waste and untenanted. Notwithstanding the energetic and denunciatory language of the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Plunket), he could hardly think the House would hesitate to agree to this Bill. Let them look at parts of the district to which the Act was intended to apply. He would take a district from Ulster, another from Connaught, and another from Munster; and he would ask, should not assistance be given to the men to whom this Bill would apply? They were men of small and struggling circumstances; but were they, therefore, to be refused the fair relief which this Bill would give? In the County Donegal, where tenant right prevailed, and where the action of the police, and the assistance of the military, was not required to protect and enforce the process of the law, there were 1,100,000 acres divided into 33,000 holdings. 17,000 of these holdings did not exceed £4 valuation, 8,000 exceeded £4, but did not exceed £8, valuation. Out of 33,000 holdings, therefore, nearly 25,000 did not exceed a valuation of £8. Now let the House come to the aid of those 25,000 holdings, which represented, in most instances, the head of a family with a wife and children. Then as to the County of Mayo. It contained 1,300,000 acres, divided into 36,000 holdings. Of these, 19,000 holdings did not exceed £4 valuation, while 10,400 exceeded £4, but did not exceed £8, valuation. Nearly the same figures would prevail in the County of Galway, where there was an acreage of over 1,000,000 divided into 38,000 holdings, of which 28,000 did not exceed £8 valuation. The facts in the County of Kerry were much the same. With those figures before it, would the House consider that in the present circumstances of exceptional distress the power which the law gave of recovering rent by ejectment was to be used for the indirect purpose of clearing the land of its occupiers? To prevent that, and for that purpose alone, this Bill was introduced. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) had sketched with great accuracy the growth of rent ejectment in Ireland, and had shown how in this great and prosperous country this power did not exist in the same degree as in Ireland. No one would object to the law being made use of for the legitimate purpose for which it was originally intended—namely, of recovering rent. It was not until 1850

that in the Civil Bill Courts in Ireland landlords were empowered to maintain ejectment for non-payment of rent in respect of yearly tenancies held without writing and merely by oral and verbal arrangement, and it was not until the year 1860 that similar jurisdiction was given to Superior Courts. These constituted the great bulk of yearly tenancies in Ireland. It was thus only for the purpose of enabling the landlord to recover his rent that this power of eviction was given, and it was never contemplated that it was to be used for the purpose of clearing the land of its inhabitants. But, after all, the landlord would retain all the same power to recover his rent. He might also, like any other creditor, bring his action for what was due; he could get a judgment of the Court, and by virtue of that judgment he could realize through a Sheriff's sale the property taken in execution. The interest in the holding, if any, might be sold; and if anything over and above the liabilities was realized the tenant might get it. Amongst other benefits of the Ulster custom, where it prevailed, the tenant was secured the right to sell his interest, if he did not wish to remain, or if he became unable to pay his rent and was ejected for non-payment of rent. If the House would compare the Bill with the Land Act, it would see that both were on the same lines. It was not introduced for any political purpose. It was honestly introduced to meet exceptional distress from failure of crops. It run in the same groove as the Seeds Act. Its principle was simply this—that where a tenant was unable to pay, and where his inability was caused by the distress which had arisen from the failure of crops, and he could satisfy the Court—which, be it well remembered, was not to be an arbitrary Court, but one which Parliament had set up for the purpose of the Land Act—that his propositions for the arrangement of his rent and its arrears and otherwise were just and reasonable, and that his landlord unreasonably rejected those fair overtures, then that he should be compensated for the disturbance. Was that a Bill which was a subversion of the rights of property? Hon. Gentlemen who were so generous to their own tenantry were, at this moment, doing what the Bill would force those in whom justice and generosity had no place also to do. Was it to be that the bone and sinew of the country were to have no consideration after their recent bitter famine experiences? Stung with despair, they might be driven to emigrate to foreign lands. Would the House send them away with a feeling rankling in their hearts that the farms where they were born—where, perhaps, they had closed their parents' eyes in death—were not to be protected, and that they could not obtain the smallest consideration at the hands of the House of Commons of a United Kingdom. Would they not rather take from the hand of the agitator one of his most fatal weapons, and, at all events, show the people that that great Assembly was not afraid to be just?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Tottenham.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, that, considering the importance of the question, and the limited number of hon. Members who had had an opportunity of addressing the House upon it, he would consent to the adjournment of the debate until Tuesday at 2 o'clock.

MR. PARNELL thought it was much more likely to be brought to a close at an Evening Sitting than at a Morning Sitting.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government had already lost two Mondays, and he must ask them to go into Supply on Monday. It was absolutely necessary.

THE O'DONOGHUE remarked that Tuesday had been mentioned for the Bradlaugh affair, and it was a matter of Privilege.

MR. GLADSTONE replied, that they would see what happened; but they were in hopes that that would not be taken.

MR. GIBSON hoped that before the debate was resumed the Papers which had been quoted by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would be laid upon the Table, in such a form as to distinguish evictions for non-payment of rent from other causes. He also hoped Returns would be given of ejectments in cities and towns. He trusted that the Chief Secretary would hurry on the printing of the Poor Law Returns which he mentioned the other day.

The Solicitor General for Ireland

MR. W. E. FORSTER was afraid it would be impossible to produce all these Returns within the time mentioned.

Motion agreed to.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.—[BILL 188.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Fawcett, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [18th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the extension of the limits of deposits in Savings Banks proposed in this Bill would result in a serious a discouragement of private enterprise that, in the opinion of this House, no such step should be taken without careful inquiry,"—(Mr. William Fowler.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. BARING expressed a hope that the Prime Minister would not press the Bill, since many hon. Gentlemen who were interested in it had gone away under the impression that it would not come on.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the objections were only in regard to matters of detail, which could be perfectly well discussed in Committee. The debate was only adjourned on the last occasion in consequence of the interposition of one hon. Gentleman.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not insist on reading the Bill a second time at present. He knew several Gentlemen who wished to speak on the subject.

MR. GLADSTONE, interposing, said, he had given Notice that he would take the second reading of the Bill the first opportunity he had.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, that in that case he should talk it out. He did not think it was fair of the right hon. Gentleman to push the Bill so, and take advantage of the absence of hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in it.

MR. GLADSTONE hoped the hon. Baronet would not use language of that kind. He was not taking advantage of anyone in their absence.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he begged pardon if he had said anything amiss, and would withdraw the expression.

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at five minutes before Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CLOSING OF PUBLIC-HOUSES ON SUNDAY—RESOLUTION.

MR. STEVENSON, in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the Law which limits the hours of sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday in England and Wales should be amended so as to apply to the whole of the day,"

said, that in bringing forward this important question he was greatly encouraged by the result of the discussion which took place only a week ago on the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). He believed his hon. Friend would not think he was criticizing in a hostile spirit the Resolution which he introduced, if he submitted that the Resolution he (Mr. Stevenson) had to propose was one of a much simpler character, and attended, in many respects, with fewer difficulties, and ought, therefore, more readily to command the attention of the House. There was no doubt about "Sunday closing," though some hon. Members had expressed a doubt as to the meaning of "Local Option." There was no question of compensation connected with this Resolution. He was glad to think that no question of compensation could possibly arise in connection with this Resolution, because, during the discussion of an analogous measure relating to Ireland, the question of compensation was considered and deliberately rejected as having no foundation. Nine-tenths of the population of Ireland were under the régime of Sunday closing, and the whole of Scotland between 20 and 30 years had been under a similar law. It appeared to be a great anomaly that the only trade to be carried on openly and generally on Sunday should be that of persons who, under the name of Licensed Victuallers, furnished anything rather than victuals, and little in the way of refreshments, to travellers. The contraction of the hours of sale on Sunday began in London. The Preamble to the Act of 1848 recited that provisions which had been in force in the Metropolitan Police district for some time had been attended with great benefits. A further contraction was made by the Act of the present Lord Winmarleigh, when Colonel Wilson Patten, which closed public-houses in the afternoon. It was a misunderstanding to suppose that there was any connection between that Act and the Hyde Park riots, for the Act had been in successful operation 10 months, and the riots were brought about by an attempt to limit Sunday trading in other articles in certain parts of London. Some publicans took advantage of the opportunity to direct the attention of Parliament to the subject, and in a panic the number of open hours was increased from seven to eight-and-half; but still afternoon closing was retained. In 1868, the last year of the £10 householder Parliament, Mr. Abel Smith brought in a Bill to reduce the hours and to alter the character of the sale from consumption on to consumption off the premises. It was said the last Session of that Parliament was chosen because the promoters of the measure dared not have proposed it in the reformed Parliament; but the real state of the case was just the other way, for in the reformed Parliament there was greater possibility of dealing with the subject than there was in that which represented the £10 householders. The new Parliament had the better means of knowing what the views of the constituencies were. He believed the great majority of the people desired Sunday closing. He believed that public opinion was ripe for this measure. What was wanted was, not a partial measure, but total closing—not a compromise, but full liberty to all in the trade to take a day of rest for themselves and their families. The last Parliament might have been considered a most unlikely one to deal with the question, and yet it passed the Irish Sunday Closing measure, because there was irresistible proof that it was desired by the people of the country. Their feeling was elicited by a house to house canvass, carried on with self-denial and honesty; and the votes of the Irish Members also showed that the people of Ireland desired what they succeeded in getting. In a similar way in England house to house canvassing had been carried on for many years, and with a corresponding result. It showed that about eight householders were in favour of the Sunday closing to one against it. When a question was put as to a modified measure, it was found that there was just as great a majority against that. Therefore, he wished to give the people, not what they did not ask for, but that which they did ask for, which was total Sunday closing. Last year's discussion of this subject disclosed an advance of public opinion for which many were not prepared. He was then pressed by many friends of temperance in the House to make a concession; and before the division, which was on the second reading of the Bill, he said that he would accept, in the way of clauses, the modification indicated, which was the opening of public-houses for two separate hours for the sale of dinner and of supper beer. He was not prepared to make that concession now; he should hope for better terms from this Parliament. The hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. J. W. Pease) wanted to advise a middle course with the hope of reaching the final result with greater safety. But what he wanted to know was how long they were to be in reaching Sunday closing? He wanted it now. But if it was to be approached gradually, was there to be the chance of adopting Sunday closing in any one parish? He could understand one kind of compromise—one of areas, such as the exemption of towns in Ireland, whose turn, he hoped, would come very soon. He could not, however, understand a compromise which gave what nobody asked for, and of which they had no experience; whereas the simpler plan of total closing had been tried over the whole of Scotland and in nine-tenths of Ireland. The compromise was proposed by Members to their constituencies, and not by the constituencies to their Members. The publicans did not propose it, for they wanted an unbroken day of rest for themselves and their families, and a compromise would not do that. After the last debate, he received a letter from a publican in the neighbourhood of London expressing the conviction that Sunday closing would be a great boon to the great majority of Licensed Victuallers and no material inconvenience to the public, and that it would, to some extent, prevent excessive drinking by working men, to which they were tempted by leisure when they had their wages in their pockets. The nine hours' movement gave the working man 54 hours a-week; but the open hours of the publican were double that, or 108 hours a-week. Thinking the publican who had written to him knew something of the question, he wrote to him about the stale beer difficulty, and the reply received was a valuable one for the House, for it stated that the difficulty was practically got over now by families who wanted their dinner beer earlier than the houses were open on Sunday, who obtained it on the Saturday night, and kept it in stone bottles to their own satisfaction. Another publican wrote him a letter, in which he said—

"Many of my customers at the present time get their beer for Sunday's use in stone bottles, for which they leave a small deposit; and although, no doubt, the beer when it comes to be used is not as good as when it was originally taken from the cask, yet it is far better than thousands of those beverages for the use of private families which are sold in 9 or in 18 gallon casks under the name of table beer."

Certainly, the small convenience of being able to obtain one's dinner beer direct from the public-house on Sundays was purchased at a very great cost indeed, the price being the toil and bondage of the publican and of his servants for the seven days of the week. His object, however, was to give them a complete break of one day in the week. In fact, some of the large public-houses never opened at all upon Sundays, and those employed in them felt the advantage of the rest. He objected to the compromise which had been suggested, on the ground that it would not effect any substantial improvement in the existing state of things, and would continue the temptation to Sunday tippling which existed under the present law. As far as the persons who kept public-houses were concerned, he did not think that they wished to carry on their business on Sundays. The profit which they made on that day was not particularly large; and they had, as he believed, a wish not only to rest themselves, but to give a day of rest to those in their employ. There was, of course, on their part a great show of opposition; but no one was willing to work continuously for seven days if he could get off for six. There was, at all events, considerable difference of opinion between them on this question of Sunday closing, as he gathered from the Report of a Conference of Licensed Victuallers lately held at Newcastle. In carrying out this opposition, the Protection Society of London, when he was about to bring forward this question early in the present year, sent out a number of Petitions among the trade to be exhibited for signature in every public-house. All persons above 16 years of age of both sexes were invited to sign it; and The Morning Advertiser, in March last, in a leading article, said:—

“We are anxious to point out to the trade, a great many of whom display too much apathy on the question, the absolute necessity there is that they should look to the instructions of the Committee.”

Still, the result was not very satisfactory. In one town the average number of signatures was six to each public-house. In another town they averaged 17, and in another 21. This, he thought, showed that the publicans were not greatly opposed to it. Indeed, a canvass from house to house, which Dr. Norman Kerr originated at Jarrow, showed they were in favour of it. Again, as regarded their customers, it was not the poorer classes who wished to have the public-houses kept open, but the members of the middle classes of society. The greatest enemies of the public-houses were the wives of the labouring classes, and they were unanimous in wishing to have them closed on Sunday. He regretted to find the Bishop of Llandaff stating his opinion in favour of keeping them open, as there was no district in England which suffered more from Sunday drinking than a portion of his diocese. The district in question was a colliery one, and he found that on Monday there were 5,178 men in the pits; on Friday there were 1,000 men more. In other words, on Monday morning, owing to how they had spent their Sunday, there were 1,000 incapable of resuming their work, which represented a great loss to their families. But, more than that, whereas the quantity of coal raised on Monday was only six tons per man, the quantity raised on Friday was eight tons per man, showing how much their physical energy was impaired by Sunday drinking. The operation of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act in Scotland had been severely tested—first, by the inquiry of a Royal Commission, which in its Report demonstrated by statistics that not only had committals for Sunday drinking been reduced to less than one-tenth of what they had been before the passing of the Act, but that Saturday and Monday drinking had been greatly reduced also. It had been tested, too, by the working of the Irish Sunday Closing Act, which had been productive of the most beneficial effects; so much so, that the Dublin Correspondent of The Times was able to state that the operation of the Act had falsified the predictions of its opponents and exceeded the expectations of its supporters, and that not only had the consumption of intoxicating drinks fallen off, but there were fewer families in want, and drinking in shebeen houses had become somewhat mythical. If they really wanted to understand all the evils of Sunday drinking, they should, as he had done, go round the public-houses and see how the trade was carried on. No one could do that without feeling a desire to put down so much misery and mischief. So far he was a Sabbatarian that he desired that every person should enjoy one day's rest in seven, and the burden of proof to the contrary lay upon those who denied it. In the interest, therefore, of the general public, and especially in the interest of the 300,000 or 400,000 persons who were deprived of a day of rest by the operation of the existing law, he begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. BIRLEY, in seconding the Motion, pointed out that not only had the result of the canvass been uniformly in favour of the proposal to close public-houses on Sundays, but there had been vast public meetings in support of the object, attended not by motley crowds, but, for the most part, by stalwart labourers who were in earnest in the cause of temperance. There had also been a great number of Petitions, which, however, he would pass over, because he knew that many hon. Gentlemen did not think much of Petitions. There had also been Memorials from the clergy and other considerable bodies. What were the arguments against the proposal? By some it was urged that as the rich man had his club to go to on a Sunday, so the poor man ought to have the benefit of his beerhouse. But gin palaces were not clubs; and he hesitated to indulge in the Utopian hope that working men would patronize clubs very largely apart from indulgence in intoxicating liquors. Others, again, said that they ought to rely on the gradual improvement in the habits of society. It was said that not long ago persons in the highest classes thought it no shame to be seen in a state of intoxication; and it was argued that they would soon see the day when neither artizans nor labourers would allow themselves to be seen in that state without a sense of self-reproach, and a still greater sense of reproach from their comrades. He could not help thinking that, in this argument, they ventured upon very severe reflections upon their grandfathers. No doubt, there were grandfathers and grandfathers; but he thought the state of the case was sometimes put more strongly than the facts justified. Moreover, the history of this country did not favour the conclusion that there had been a gradual improvement in the habits of the people in this respect. Authorities of the highest value bore their testimony to the fact that the greatest outbreak of intemperate habits took place in the first half of the last century, when the distillation of gin began in this country, and when the tax upon it was so small. He was not sure whether there was any tax at all in the first instance. The people were able to get drunk for the most insignificant sum. When the regulations were made more stringent, there was a conspicuous change in the habits of the people. Again, as to the habits of the higher classes of society—and he said it without any disrespect—he was not sure that the decrease in intoxication was not more due to the custom of drinking lighter wine than to the fact that there was less actual consumption of liquor; and he suspected that casual drinking was rather on the increase in this country. As to the influence of education, he believed that without the power of moral control in the nature of the persons themselves, strengthened by religious teaching, they would not preserve even the persons who were educated from the temptation to intemperate habits. He trusted that Sunday closing would be carried to the extent which this Resolution suggested; but he would be glad to see even a mitigation of the present evil, and he would suggest to the Home Secretary to issue six days' licences as a rule, instead of seven days' licences. That would be a move in the right direction. He believed the publicans as a body were favourable to the proposal of his hon. Friend, as, without it, it was impossible for them to indulge in any ramble or excursion, or in any relaxation on the Sunday, which they desired as much as other people. Then something might be said on behalf of the 200,000 or 300,000 barmen and barmaids, including pot-boys, who would be affected by the change. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had the Factory Acts in his charge, which prevent the over labour of women and boys in factories, and he might well extend the beneficial restrictions in the direction of beershops. It was a very common thing to say that grown-up men were able to take care of themselves in regard to temptation. He held a different view. He thought they ought to agree to abolish certain passages in the Lord's Prayer if they were to maintain that causes of temptation were not to be avoided as much as possible. Sir Walter Scott, in the days before temperance societies were established, spoke of the difficulties a working man had in passing a given number of public-houses. He was a man little influenced by any fanatical views; but he seemed to feel that there was a point at which the repetition of temptation acted upon a man to a degree that those who were not so influenced could scarcely understand. They all knew that even well-principled persons were not always able to resist such temptations. It was a matter of wonder to some people that, while men in the higher classes were often indifferent to Sunday closing, those in the lower strata were almost unanimously in favour of it. The fact was that these latter were the men who knew the terrible ravages of intemperance. If it were not for these men they would hear little of temperance societies or temperance reforms. These men who attended the meetings and signed the Memorials did it not for the sake of depriving their neighbours of a moderate indulgence; far from it. He did not think English people were of that disposition. But it was because in their own persons or in their families, or their immediate neighbours, they saw the fearful ravages from that cause. They saw it in every street and in every village. It was not merely a question of broken fortunes; it was a question of broken homesteads and broken hearts. These were the causes which had led public opinion in this direction. He had great pleasure in seconding the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the Law which limits the hours of sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday in England and Wales should be amended so as to apply to the whole of that day,"—(Mr. Stevenson,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. J. W. PEASE, who had an Amendment on the Paper proposing that the law limiting the hours of sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday should be amended so as to apply—

"As nearly as possible to the whole of that day, making such provision only for the sale during prohibited hours of beer, ale, porter, cider, or perry, for consumption off the premises, in the country; and for the requirements of the inhabitants of the Metropolitan district, as may be found needful to secure public co-operation in any alteration of the law," said, that he was sure the House must concur in the remarks of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Birley) in depreciation of the prevalence and the evils of intemperance. Little, he said, had yet been done in the direction of Sunday closing, because the advocates of that step were not content to proceed by degrees, but strove to reach their object at a bound. He was as ready as any one to give the publican the opportunity of taking rest; but it should be remembered that the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath, and that those who desired to use intoxicating liquors on a Sunday must have somebody to supply them. On that account, while thoroughly sympathizing in the object which the Amendment contemplated, he had given Notice of an Amendment to it, and as he could not move it in consequence of the Rules of the House, he found himself obliged to support his hon. Friend's Amendment, and when it became the substantive question he should ask leave to amend it in the sense of which he had given Notice. The advocates of total Sunday closing desired to remove temptation from the lower classes. Well, so did he; but they could advance in that direction without limiting very materially the liberty of the people to act as they might think fit with regard to supplying their homes with intoxicants on Sunday. The evidence that had been taken before Mr. Abel Smith's Committee proved conclusively that it was not necessary, in order to accomplish most of what was desired, to take the temptations out of the way of people during the whole of the Sabbath. He did not see why those who advocated the total closing of public-houses on the Sabbath day did not advocate the adoption of the same course on every other day in the week. If public-houses were to be shut throughout the whole of Sunday, it must be because they were intrinsically bad institutions; and if they were intrinsically bad on Sunday, they surely were so on Monday, Tuesday, and the remaining days of the week. He held that the advocates of temperance ought to aim at accomplishing their object without trenching too much upon the liberty of the people, and to refrain from taking an extreme step such as that proposed by his hon. Friend—a step which it would be perfectly impossible to carry into practice. In large towns it was proposed to close all restaurants and refreshment places except to the bond fide travellers and travellers at railway restaurants. That meant perfunctory teetotalism for all who did not travel or keep a store, or who had no club to dine at. Then the Resolution made no exemption whatever in the case of the Metropolitan district. Not many Sundays ago, being anxious to observe for himself how public-houses were used on Sundays, he went through the streets in the neighbourhood of the Broadway, Westminster, and, contrary to what was represented, he found that there was no rush, as soon as the houses were opened, by people anxious to get drink, but that neat and respectable girls, children, and young men were coming out of the public-houses with their small jugs of beer for home use; and he felt it would be impossible for him to vote for entire Sunday closing, and so deprive those people of their beer, whilst he could go home to his own luncheon where liquors were on the table, and supplied by his own servants. Mr. John Tremayne, who represented Cornwall in the late Parliament, and who took great interest in this question, had estimated as the result of his investigations that in London there were thousands of people who had no other place for their Sunday dinners but the restaurants and public-houses—a class consisting of those who lived in lodgings, and were accustomed, during their business hours in London, daily to get their principal meal at a restaurant. It would, therefore, be perfectly impossible, with due regard to the legitimate wants of the population, to have entire Sunday closing in the Metropolis, unless this House, backed by the country, came to the conclusion to have perfunctory teetotalism throughout the Kingdom. There was another aspect of the case. On another Sunday he came down the road leading from Epping Forest, and found that from Epping Forest to London there was an unceasing traffic. The large public-houses were surrounded by people who were taking their glass of liquor, and bringing it out to their wives and children, which might be morally wrong. ["No!"] He formed an estimate that on three miles of that road there were no less than 7,000 people travelling; and, although the public-houses were surrounded, there was nothing that could be called disorder, but the people seemed to be enjoying themselves, and he, for one, saw no crime in their doing so. But these travellers, according to his hon. Friend, were to have what they wanted; and whilst they were supplied the quiet people who stayed at home were to be compelled by law to go without liquor. This question had been attentively considered by the Lords' Committee, which was composed of men fully competent to take a statesmanlike and just view of it. The conclusion they came to was that there could not be absolute Sunday closing; but they suggested, as regarded the Metropolis, that the houses should remain open as now—from 1 o'clock until 3, and from 6 until 11; but that during the latter term the liquor should be sold to be consumed off the premises only. He thought the people of the Metropolis were prepared to accept shorter hours—namely, from 1 to 3, and from 7 to 10 o'clock, which would meet the requirements and wants of the Metropolis; and he would, in their case, allow the sale both on and off the premises during both terms. It was argued that as it was with London so it was with other large towns; but, even if it were, there were only some 14 or 15 very large towns representing a population of about 3,000,000; and if they excluded all the considerable towns they would only cover a population of about 6,000,000. There would thus be left 16,000,000, to whom they could deal out more stringent provisions. He was in favour of a similar reduction in hours to that which had been recommended by the Lords' Committee; and he would desire to put an end to the sale of spirits in the country on Sunday, so that in the restricted hours which he recommended the consumption would be limited to beer, cider, perry, and other similar drinks which would not keep fresh for any length of time, and for consumption off the premises only. His hon. Friend had received a letter from a South Durham clergyman. He had received letters from dozens of country clergymen, who had told him that the solution which he proposed of the question was the only practicable one, and those letters were from persons of both political Parties. It had been said that they could with safety follow the example of Ireland and Scotland in this matter. But there was a great difference between those countries and England. They were essentially spirit-drinking countries; whereas beer was the staple drink of England, and beer was a drink which it was essential to get fresh, and it could not be expected that people would like to keep it in stone jugs or in any other way. It would not be wise to drive people to keep stocks of beer in barrels at home; the cure might turn out worse than the disease. He believed his hon. Friend and those who thought with him had mistaken the feeling of the country. They had spoken of Petitions; but they had deduced no sound argument from those Petitions. Up to the 18th of June there were 74 Petitions, signed by 167,000 persons, against the Resolution, and 1,500 signed by 174,000 in its favour. His hon. Friend had also spoken of the statistics that had been circulated throughout the House as to the results of a house-to-house canvass in several towns; but the canvass had been very imperfect. Of this he would give instances. In Aberdare 4,069 only out of a total of 6,500 houses had been canvassed; in Barrow 1,272 out of 2,700; in Bradford 6,191 out of 29,000; in Darlington 2,600 out of 4,631, and Darlington was known to be a very temperate place; in Canterbury 1,134 out of 4,171, and in Liverpool 44,000 out of 78,000. Besides, this was not a householders' question. It concerned rather that part of the population which was not composed of householders, but lived in lodgings, and were dependent upon the restaurants for their dinners who would most feel the inconvenience. What became, then, of that great consensus of opinion which had been spoken of? Those only who were least interested had been canvassed. It was fallacious, also, to speak of what worked well for Ireland and Scotland as being necessarily well adapted to England. The towns in those countries were not nearly so large as those of England. When the Sunday Closing Act for Ireland was passed, the five principal cities were exempted, and were called by some the five cities of the plain, or the five cities of refuge for the man-slayer; but the largest of those cities had smaller populations than most of the manufacturing towns in England. In Scotland—Edinburgh had only 169,000; Aberdeen 60,000; Dundee 108,000. Glasgow, with its 500,000, was the only town which compared with the largest towns in England. Nor was there absolute Sunday closing in those towns. Everyone who knew Glasgow and the working of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act was aware that the bond fide traveller could always obtain liquor on Sunday, and that every inn that had four bedrooms was a house of call for the bond fide traveller, and that there were many of them. On the Clyde steamers drinking went on with little or no regulation. And when once it was proved, as he had conclusively proved, that there could not be absolute Sunday closing, it became a question of degree, and they must draw a line somewhere. He thought that he had indicated that line in advocating the entire prevention of spirit drinking and the reduction of hours. Spirit drinking was the root of most of the evils which arose from intemperance; and it was the drinking which took place in the last hour or two which did the greatest mischief to public order. He thought the question was ripe for legislation; but it would not be wise to legislate against the feeling of the country. He thought the plans he had suggested would be backed by the country. They could not have complete Sunday closing, and he hoped the House would support the proposal of his hon. Friend, in order that he might amend it afterwards.

MR. BLAKE said, he was glad to bear his testimony to the beneficial effects of Sunday closing in Ireland. The arrests for Sunday drunkenness had gone down 70 per cent since the Act passed. The consumption of drink was less by £1,250,000 in 1879 than in 1878. And almost every Judge of Assize had referred to the decrease of crime and drunkenness since Sunday closing became the law. It was natural at first to connect these results with the distress; but in 1846-7-8, concurrently with distress, there was an increase of drunkenness. He could testify from his own experience to the happy results that had followed Sunday closing, and could well believe that a similar boon would be a great blessing to this country. During the agitation of the question he was frequently assured by many publicans that it would give them great satisfaction to be compelled to close. It was incumbent on Members who supported the closing of public-houses to do what they could to provide the working classes with other means of recreation than those furnished by the public-houses. They ought, therefore, to support the opening of museums, and to do what they could to promote working men's clubs, for in that way the people could be weaned from that which was their greatest curse.

MR. COURTAULD concurred in the remarks of the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease), and, in fact, he had taken the wind out of his sails. If total Sunday closing were carried, it would be essentially class legislation of the worst character, because it would interfere with the poor, while it would leave the rich alone. The rich man had his cellar to go to, and could always drink what and when he liked; but the poor man had, as it were, to buy his liquor from hand to mouth. The practical effect of this Resolution would be to prevent people drinking on Sunday what he considered to be, in moderation, a wholesome beverage. The staple drink of this country was beer, and beer bought on Saturday for Sunday drinking could not be kept in jugs and bottles as fresh and as wholesome as it ought to be. He could understand that indoor drinking was a temptation to the poor man on his leisure day, and that open public-houses might be sometimes a nuisance; but it was a perfectly distinct thing to open them for the sale of beer to be carried away for consumption. Then, what was the traveller to do if the public-houses were to be closed on Sunday? It was alleged that the working classes were in favour of total Sunday closing; but he was not sure that was borne out by the Petitions, which were signed in many cases by those whom Sunday closing would not affect. This Motion would be a great interference with what was called the liberty of the subject, and he was surprised to find that amongst the supporters of the Motion there were many Members who had always stood up for individual freedom. There were men who denounced the fining of a man for not having his children vaccinated as great tyranny; but who looked upon a Bill for total Sunday closing as mild and beneficent legislation, although it would deprive the poor man of his Sunday beer. He trusted that if the measure were carried one effect of it would be to stimulate the formation of working men's clubs. He had always done his best to help forward these institutions, because in them there were few inducements for men to drink more than they should. Men in working men's clubs could take as little liquor as they liked, or, if they preferred it, none at all, for they would be under no obligation to drink for the good of the house, as they were in the public-house. He should vote against the original Amendment, and should gladly support one to the effect suggested by the hon. Member for South Durham.

MR. STAVELEY HILL quite agreed with what had fallen from the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) that the country was not now ripe—if, indeed, it ever should be ripe—for legislation that went the length of total Sunday closing. Those who had conducted the temperance movement deserved all honour, especially the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), and those to whom the country was deeply indebted, for their efforts in making temperance a popular question. But popular as it was, and popular as he would ever hope it might be, he did not think that in this country they would ever reach the point at which they would enforce total abstinence upon those who might be unwilling to adopt it. When he had heard the Mover of the Resolution, the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson), speak on behalf of total Sunday closing, he had certainly expected to hear him carry the proposition to its full and logical conclusion, and to have done away with the reservation as to the bond fide traveller. What did the bond fide traveller mean? Simply that a person who was physically separated by distance from his own cellar should be enabled to make use of the cellar of a publican. What difference in principle was there between this man and the man who was physically separated by a want of money from keeping in his house what he might want? If the one should be allowed to have drink on Sunday, why should not the other? He understood that the hon. Member for South Durham wished, by his Amendment, rather to indicate the direction in which they ought to proceed than to bind them down to its exact terms; and to that extent he went entirely with that hon. Member. Having himself had to deal with the Licensed Victuallers, he could say that he had always found them to be generally a well-conducted body carrying on a difficult trade, and most willing to have their hours reasonably shortened. He felt convinced that some hour might be hit upon which should be suitable to the Licensed Victuallers, and conducive to the temperance of the public without putting them to any inconvenience. They had been told by an hon.

Member from Ireland (Mr. Blake) that the Act which had been passed for that country had been a success—that the arrests for drunkenness on Sunday were fewer; and he hoped they would succeed in fixing such an hour as would not inconvenience the Licensed Victuallers in this country, and would tend to further improve the habits of the people.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would have been glad if he could have been a silent listener to that interesting debate; but, from the Office he had the honour to hold, it was hardly possible for him to give a vote on that occasion without stating the reasons which actuated it. He had to look at the Resolution of his hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson); and it seemed to him that no one—and especially one who occupied any responsible position with reference to it—could vote for such a Resolution without being prepared to give immediate effect to it. The Resolution differed very materially from the one submitted to the House the other night by the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), which stated a general principle admitting of many interpretations, and capable of being applied in various ways—namely, the principle of Local Option. The present one was not such a Resolution, because it stated distinctly that a particular thing was to be done—namely, that every public-house in England should be closed on Sunday. It was an absolute and peremptory Resolution; it did not say that the law should be amended, that the hours should be further limited; but that all public-houses should be closed. His right hon. Friend at the head of the Government had the other night pointed out, in the discussion on the Resolution of the hon. Member for Carlisle, that that was, above all, a question on which public opinion ought to govern, and that Ministers were bound to follow, but could not lead public opinion on a matter of that kind. And, therefore, the question they had to consider was whether the public opinion of England demanded or justified the adoption of such a course as that now proposed? The Lords Committee, certainly in no spirit adverse to the end at which his hon. Friend aimed, had declared in their Report their precise opinion that the country was not yet ripe for entire Sunday closing. As far as he knew, that was an accurate statement. His hon. Friend the Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease), he might add, in his eminently judicial speech, had pointed out that the number of Petitions which had been presented to the House in favour of the Resolution was not much greater than that of those which had been presented against it. This, therefore, did not point to anything like an overwhelming preponderance of opinion. Now, the House well knew what was the case of the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. In almost every one of the numerous divisions on that Bill he had voted in its favour, because he was satisfied of the entire unanimity of Irish opinion on the subject. They had had evidence in every possible way—by Petitions, by representations from persons of all classes and opinions, and with a singular unanimity on the part of the Irish Members on both sides of the House—that the intervention of Parliament was justified, and, indeed, required. But could anybody say that anything like a similar unanimity of opinion on the subject prevailed in this country? He would confess that he himself was unable to come to that conclusion. He might also observe that the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for South Shields went further than the Irish Bill. Ireland, as the House was well aware, was not rich in great towns, yet five of the chief towns of that country were omitted from the operation of the Irish Bill; while his hon. Friend did not propose to make an exception even in favour of the Metropolis. The hon. Member for Carlisle had invited them to found temperance reform upon the corner stone of Local Option. Well, he (Sir William Harcourt) had voted, the other evening, in support of the principle of Local Option; but the proposal embodied in the present Resolution was absolutely inconsistent with that principle, for it was to be carried into effect whether a community desired that it should be so or not. There were, therefore, two principles of temperance reform; and he could not help feeling that, however excellent might be the object of a Motion such as that before the House, it was possible, by going too far, to defeat the object which they were all anxious to attain, and that any violent action in advance of public opinion, so far from promoting, might injure the cause of temperance. His hon. Friend the Member for South Durham, who seemed to him to have made a very good speech against the Resolution, was yet going to vote for it with a view to amending it after it had passed. He, however, did not feel himself able to take that course. He was expressing only his own views, and was not in any sense speaking for the Government as a whole, this being a subject upon which every man might vote according to his own views. There was some advantage in the form in which this Resolution was submitted, because it followed upon the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair; and, consequently, the Motion which would be put from the Chair practically amounted to the Previous Question. The hon. Member for South Shields had put his proposition in so absolute a form that he was unable to support it; and he did not see how the House could vote for such a Resolution, which was direct and precise, unless it really meant that it could be immediately carried into effect.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: There is no person in this House who does not wish to do all he can to promote the cause of temperance, and the only fault I find with persons who are naturally anxious upon such a subject as this is that they may make up their minds in what particular way the object is to be accomplished, and unless others agree with them in that particular way, they will not believe you are as anxious as they are to promote temperance. I make the greatest possible allowance for the conclusions at which people arrive, because no person who really has the interest of the community at heart can possibly see the crime, misery, and vice which come from drunkenness and not feel his heart stirred to do all in his power to alleviate that misery and put an end to that state of things. But when we feel how necessary it is to do something, we are often in danger of doing that something rashly, and bringing about a condition of affairs which cannot by any possibility last. With regard to the proposition before us, I think it is a fair sample of what I spoke about. If you could see that public opinion would carry you out in what you are going to do, I do not think there is a man on either side of the House who would not be for the total closing of public-houses on Sundays. I mean if it could be carried out in accordance with the reasonable wishes of the people. But the people really are not ready for such a change. There is a strong feeling in this country that something ought to be done to put a stop to drunkenness; but this particular step, if it were carried to-night and passed into a law, would not have any practical effect of that kind. If this Resolution became law to-night, you would have—I do not say before the end of this Session, but certainly the first thing next Session—to repeal it. You cannot legislate in this way in advance of public opinion; you cannot legislate even quite up to it. So far from effecting the object you have in view, you would do a great deal to check the public opinion in favour of temperance. I was not here to hear the speech of the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson), who moved this Resolution; but to my mind there is a great contrast between the hon. Member who introduced this Motion and the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease) who has spoken upon it, and I will tell the House where I think the difference lies. The hon. Member who has introduced this Motion has done it for the sole purpose of doing all he can to promote temperance by physical force. The hon. Member for South Durham has studied this question in all its bearings, as I know, because when I had the honour of holding the Office which is now held by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt), he came to me and asked me if I would give him facilities for obtaining information and forming an opinion on the subject. Let me take London for a moment. Can you imagine it would be any more possible to shut up public-houses now than when you stopped Sunday trading in London some years ago? It is a thing which is absolutely impossible. I am sure the Home Secretary would find before that law had been in force for a month that he would have the greatest possible difficulty in keeping the peace of the town. I said when I was in Office that if Sunday closing was carried I would not be responsible for the peace of London. I say the same now that I am out of Office; and I am certain if the Home Secretary looks into the matter he will come to the same conclusion. There are large numbers of

 Stevenson, J. C.

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. J. W. PEASE said, that inasmuch as he had already addressed the House with regard to the Amendment which stood in his name on the Paper, he should not then enter again upon an explanation of it. He begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To leave out all the words after the word "apply," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "as nearly as possible to the whole of that day, making such provision only for the sale during limited hours of beer, ale, porter, cider, or perry, for consumption off the premises in the country; and, for the requirements of the inhabitants of the Metropolitan district, as may be found needful to secure public co-operation in the alteration of the Law,"

—(Mr Pease,)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

MR. STEVENSON said, that as his Motion had then become the substantial one, he wished to say that the terms of it were precisely the same as those of the Motion on which the Sunday Closing Act for Ireland had been afterwards founded, with the exception of the simple alteration of the words "England and Wales" instead of Ireland. That Motion had been introduced by the late hon. Member for County Londonderry (Mr. Smyth), and was carried by a large majority, with which the present Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt) voted.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the Law which limits the hours of sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday in England and Wales should be amended so as to apply as early as possible to the whole of that day, making such provision only for the sale during limited hours of beer, ale, porter, cider, to speak for all the Members of the Cabinet.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Wait a moment, and you will see what I mean. On a question of this kind I do not think there ought to be a difference between Members of the same Government. You were discussing the other day the question as to Local Option, and the right hon. Gentleman said that he was in favour of Local Option on one part of the question, but that, in his opinion, Local Option on the other part of the question could not be sustained. That only makes my case stronger. We had the Secretary of State a promoter of Local Option, while the Prime Minister was against it. The suggestion of the Prime Minister was that it was a very grave question which required discussion. The right hon. Gentleman did not know whether there ought to be a restriction on the number of public-houses or free trade altogether. When the Government brought forward that great measure which they were pledged to do by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State this evening, I hope they will deal with the whole question and at an early period. But let the Government make up its mind. The Prime Minister says one thing, the Secretary of State another. The Government ought to make up its mind whether they will have free trade or restriction. I think the introducer of this Resolution has made a great mistake. I think it would check public opinion, and I hope it will not be pressed to a division. If it be, I must vote against it. I will follow the Secretary of State, who has said the proper course will be to move that the Speaker should leave the Chair, which is equivalent to the Previous Question. The Government has undertaken to deal with the whole question next Session. [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT dissented.] At all events, the Prime Minister has said so. Whenever that measure is brought in, I and my Colleagues will give it careful consideration. [A laugh.] Notwithstanding that laugh, I can honestly say that if it is calculated to promote temperance without breaking through the general principles of legislation, I and my Colleagues will give it careful consideration, not in a spirit of hostility, but with every desire to support and carry it into effect.

TELLERS.

Birley, H.
Stevenson, J. C.

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. J. W. PEASE said, that inasmuch as he had already addressed the House with regard to the Amendment which stood in his name on the Paper, he should not then enter again upon an explanation of it. He begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To leave out all the words after the word "apply," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "as nearly as possible to the whole of that day, making such provision only for the sale during limited hours of beer, ale, porter, cider, or perry, for consumption off the premises in the country; and, for the requirements of the inhabitants of the Metropolitan district, as may be found needful to secure public co-operation in the alteration of the Law," —(Mr Pease,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

MR. STEVENSON said, that as his Motion had then become the substantial one, he wished to say that the terms of it were precisely the same as those of the Motion on which the Sunday Closing Act for Ireland had been afterwards founded, with the exception of the simple alteration of the words "England and Wales" instead of Ireland. That Motion had been introduced by the late hon. Member for County Londonderry (Mr. Smyth), and was carried by a large majority, with which the present Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt) voted.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the Law which limits the hours of sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday in England and Wales should be amended so as to apply as early as possible to the whole of that day, making such provision only for the sale during limited hours of beer, ale, porter, cider, or perry, for consumption off the premises in the country; and, for the requirements of the inhabitants of the Metropolitan district, as may be found needful to secure public co-operation in any alteration of the Law.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he begged to move that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair in order to enable the Government to take a Vote on Account.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he wished to make a remark with regard to taking Votes on Account. They knew that the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who then occupied seats on the Treasury Bench did not always agree with taking such Votes. He did not wish to interfere with the proposal at all; but he desired to state that he thought if Supply had been arranged as it ought to have been such Votes would not have been required. He would not oppose the Motion of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish); but he wished to recall to their minds what was said on that subject when the late Government was in Office. He trusted they would not think he was placing obstacles in the way. He quite admitted that such a step as that proposed was rendered necessary this year from the somewhat peculiar position of the Government only having been in Office so short a time, and there being many measures which they wished to bring forward. He only rose to say that he hoped that that Motion would not be made a precedent, but that Government would follow the good advice which was tendered to them (the preceding Government) when the present Government were in Opposition—namely, that Supply should not be put aside because certain measures of the Government had to be brought forward. He hoped that the proposed Vote on Account would be the last, and that the Government would take care that before the Vote now asked for was expended to put Supply down in such a manner as that it might be unnecessary to take any more such Votes during the present Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that he did not think it possible for anything that was done in that matter that Session to be taken as a precedent hereafter, because of the peculiar circumstances of the case. The late Government had thought it necessary to have a Dissolution of Parliament in the middle of the Session, and in consequence of the change of Government there had necessarily been to a very great extent disorganization of the Business of the House. Therefore, the proceedings in a late Session such as the present could hardly be taken to be usual. He felt bound to observe that the necessity of taking a Vote on Account did not arise from any undue pressure of the Government in bringing forward their own measures, for they had always arranged for Supply to come on in the usual course; but owing to the shortness of the Session they had had little or no opportunity of taking Committee of Supply. He did not think that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) would have anything different to propose with reference to propose with reference to that matter; but he wished it to be understood that the conduct of the late Government was not in the slightest degree reflected upon by the Motion then before the House.

MR. RYLANDS said, he had taken a great interest in the discussions on Votes on Account; and, although he disliked them, he thought they were necessary in the case of a late Session, such as the present. The right hon. Gentleman the late Home Secretary (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had recognized the peculiar circumstances of the present Session; the present Government had only been in Office for a very short time, and, of course, they were all aware that during two months of the Session it had been quite impossible to proceed with any Public Business whatever. He was glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman had referred to the course which had been taken in former Parliaments. He (Mr. Rylands) recollected having opposed the then Government for having brought forward Votes on Account at late periods of the year, and it should be remembered that the right hon. Gentleman who was then in Office justified the late Government in asking for Votes on Account. For his own part he thought there could be no defence made for dealing with matters of Supply in that way; but, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, he did not see how in this instance it was to be avoided. He considered that it was incumbent on them to assist the Government in that matter, inasmuch as it had been impossible to bring Supply on at an earlier period.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he did not wish to oppose the Motion for a Vote on Account; but, at the same time, he did not like the mode of procedure of that kind which had been in vogue for the last two or three years. It had been said that the circumstances of the case were peculiar; but if they were so it was nothing new, for they had been in a similar position often before, and he must say he objected to the Business of the country being done in that way. The fact of the matter was this—and he wished to tell the Government so—that there were too many Bills brought in, and in consequence the financial affairs of the nation were pushed into a corner, and in many cases voted without any notice being given. That was not the right way to do the Business of the House. He himself would probably never occupy a seat on the Front Bench, and he cared little what Party was in power so long as the Business of the nation was properly attended to. He had no wish to oppose the Motion; but he did hope that there would be a change in the mode of doing business.

MR. MAGNIAC said, no doubt the present circumstances were peculiar, and he did not see how the proposed course could be avoided. They were all aware that there had previously been as much as £4,000,000 absorbed, in providing for the debt of the country which had not been provided for out of Ways and Means. Under the circumstances existing last Session, he thought the House had afforded every facility to the then Government, and he had no doubt but that the House would acquiesce in the Motion then before them. The noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) must, however, expect that all the Estimates would receive, not only a severe, but a rigid examination when Votes on Account were taken in that manner. It was no more than right that the House should expect that when any Gentleman criticized the Estimates he should receive full explanation of the various Votes. He had observed, in the course of the discussion on the Estimates, that excuses had been given on account of the Estimates of the Predecessors of the present Government. He must say that he was of opinion that they had heard sufficient on that subject, when he came to consider the advantages which had accrued to hon. Gentlemen in Office from the change of Government. He had often heard it said, when a man came into a large estate, that he would have been much richer without it; but he never heard of any gentleman giving up the estate on account of the great trouble which it entailed. That was, he considered, the position of the Government. They had received a legacy, which was attended with considerable difficulty, no doubt, from their Predecessors; but, at the same time, they had received a legacy both of honour and responsibility, and he thought it was their bounden duty to fall in with the feeling prevalent in the country, and to give a full and fair explanation whenever anyone chose to criticize the Estimates. Under those circumstances, he felt sure that when the Estimates came on full criticism would be allowed and a full explanation given.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he wished to make a remark with reference to the time that Vote on Account was calculated to last. The sum of £100,000 put down for purposes of education—which was the subject with which he was most acquainted—would not last a fortnight. Of course, if there was a sum already voted which had not been spent, that might be added to the sums now asked for. It seemed to him, however, that the sum then applied for was not sufficient for a period of six weeks.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that if the Vote was carried the period at the expiration of six weeks would be rather a late one for the Estimates. He thought that it was most inconvenient that those Votes should be taken when the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was not present. The responsible Ministers were not then there, and he really thought that was not respectful to the House. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington) was really the only Minister of consequence that he saw on the Treasury Bench; and he really thought that it was not respectful to the House, when they were asked to give blind confidence to the Government in a Vote which would carry them on to the middle of August, that the Prime Minister, who was also Chancellor of the Exchequer, was not present to answer any questions that might be put.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that in reply to the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton), he wished to say that he believed that the sum now asked for for educational purposes would be found to be sufficient. With regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), he would only say he would do all in his power to bring forward the Estimates so that they might be properly discussed.

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to mention a matter for which he saw the Government proposed a vote of £190,000—namely, the Vote for the Irish Constabulary. It was a question that had never been sufficiently debated in that House; and yet there were important considerations connected with that Force, as at present constituted, which it would be necessary to bring before the House of Commons. By that custom of taking Votes on Account, the Irish Estimates were habitually pushed back to the end of the Session, when there were no adequate means for discussion. He knew there were excuses for the present Government in reference to the course proposed to be adopted. That was practically the first Vote on Account the present Government had taken, although he did not think that it was the first that had been taken under those Estimates, so there was some excuse. He hoped the noble Lord the manager of that Business in the House (Lord Frederick Cavendish) would be able to see his way to giving an assurance to the Irish Members that a fair opportunity would be afforded on a subsequent stage for discussing the Vote of the Irish Constabulary.

MR. FINIGAN said, he thought that if the noble Lord who had charge of those Estimates would give a definite assurance that the questions regarding the enormous sum of money which was then to be voted for purposes which partially referred to the maintenance of a Military Force would be allowed to be taken on some definite day, the Irish Members would really be quite content. Looking over the abstract of the Estimates which that Vote referred to, he found that there was no real work proposed to be done under them in regard to that part of the country with which he was himself connected. There was, in fact, only a sum of £2,500 asked for, which was for work to be done on the Shannon. That was really a small sum, considering the fact that that river ran through a district which really was very much in need of labour.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now discussing the Vote, and is out of Order.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. PARNELL said, he would now make the request to the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) to which he had already referred. He trusted that he would be able to give them an assurance that the Government would afford an opportunity for discussing the Vote as regards the Irish Constabulary.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he could not at present state the day on which it would be possible to take the Vote. The hon. Member might, however, be sure that it would be taken shortly.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he wished to ask a question of the noble Lord with regard to Class IV. (Ireland). He saw there was a Vote of £640 for the Endowed Schools Commissioners. There were, however, two sets of those in Ireland—there were, first, the Commissioners of Education, who were a permanent body; and then there was a temporary Commission of Inquiry into the condition of schools. Which Commissioners did the Vote affect? Secondly, he wished to say that the Endowed Schools Commissioners, appointed by the late Lord Lieutenant for a temporary purpose, of which he himself (Lord Randolph Churchill) was a Member, applied for an extension of time, as they found that they could not complete their task by the day fixed—namely, the 13th of June. They had applied for that extension, and up to the last few days, as far as he could hear, there had been no answer. It was of importance that there should be such an extension. A representation had been made to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and no definite answer had been received. If that Irish Vote referred to that body, he should be glad to know if the extension of time applied for would be granted.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that if the noble Lord would repeat his question on the Report of the Committee he would be happy to give him a reply; but he could not do so now.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that the Commission would have reported long ago had it not been for the dilatory proceedings of the Treasury. He believed that for three months there had been no answer.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he wished to ask a question with regard to acquiring the consular buildings in the several capitals of Europe. The Berlin Embassy House was hired at a very high rate; and he thought it would be economy to buy it. At Cairo, also, the house was hired at a very high rate; and it was perfectly clear that they would always require a considerable establishment to be kept there. He should like to know whether any progress had been made with regard to purchasing those houses. The house at Brussels, also, was hired at an enormous rate. He would not trouble the noble Lord to give a direct answer, if he would give an assurance that the Vote would be brought on in time for fair discussion, and that it would not be put off till the end of the Session, when no time would be at disposal for discussing it.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, with respect to the inquiry that had just been made by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), he would observe that, little as the Government liked those Votes on Account, they disliked Supplementary Votes still more. It was simply impossible to consider a larger Supplementary Vote at that time.

MR. P. MARTIN said, with regard to the remarks which had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), he must say that the operations of the Commission he had referred to were exceedingly slow. They were looking forward to the time when they should see that Commission brought to a close. He did trust that, having been in existence over two years, no extension of time would be given to it. He felt sure that when the Treasury had carefully inquired into the matter no such extension would be granted.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that with reference to Class III., referring to the Business of Ireland, he should like to ask the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish), or he and his brother were in precisely the same position as regarded duties. A promise had been held out for a very long time that something should be done to improve the condition of the Irish officials, and he hoped the Government would now carry it out.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH wished to suggest to the Committee that these matters might be much better discussed on the individual Votes. He might also observe that, although they always heard the Committee of Supply was for the object of checking the expenditure of the Government, yet the tendency throughout this debate had been to increase the expenditure. With reference to the question just raised, he would be very happy to talk it over with the hon. Member.

An hon. MEMBER pointed out, that while it was proposed to spend £20,000 for Shannon works, the Government only took £2,500 for the next six weeks, while those weeks were the very best of the whole year. If the Government acted in this way, the greatest possible distrust would be aroused in the minds of everybody along the banks of the river. The Government ought to utilize every means in their power to give relief. These works were one of the best means for that purpose; and, therefore, he hoped the noble Lord would explain why he had not spent more than this £2,500.

MAJOR NOLAN said, there was a reason why Irish Members should be more constant in discussing these finance questions than English Members, because the officials in the two countries were totally different. The English Members were able to go to the Departmental officers and discuss points of interest with them, and they always found those officials ready to pay great attention; but Irish Members had no means of communicating with those Boards in Ireland, or using any influence on them except through debates in the House of Commons. That was a misfortune; but it was, nevertheless, a fact that they had no opportunity of getting anything done from influence brought to bear, except through debates in that House. They were not, therefore, doing their duty to the constituents if they did not press these matters on the Government on every conceivable occasion. On the Report, he hoped the noble Lord would give them an answer as to convict establishments. That question had been reported on several times, and the late Government were very much in favour of the proposal. He also wished to call attention to the question of training schools. There were certain training establishments for teachers, the instruction given in which was very good; but, on the other hand, there was a strong dislike to sending children to be trained among persons who held certain denominational views, and it was held that the Government ought to deal with the question, so as to remove one great blot on their primary system. The change which had been recommended, also, would not cost any money—the only result being that more teachers might be trained.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH replied, that he could only repeat, what he had already said in reference to the Shannon works, that the contract had been entered into and the work begun. It was utterly impossible to say, however, how the work should be contracted. With respect to the convict establishments, he would be prepared to make a statement on the Report; and he did not think the hon. and gallant Gentleman would expect him to deal with the question fully at that moment.

MR. FINIGAN said, he did not blame this Government or the late Government, but he did blame the Irish Board of Works which was a resident body. He had been given to understand that this Board of Works was to be re-constituted and made really a responsible body. Until this was done, he must quite agree with his hon. and gallant Friend opposite that they must appeal to the Government here. He might also add that the Clare Castle Harbour works were connected with the Shannon works. All that the place wanted was re-building, it having fallen out of repair for want of proper attention by the Irish Board of Works.

neglect of the Liberal Government which refused to make proper provision in order to secure proper precautions. The present Embassy was a very cheap house, for the land was presented by the Sultan. It was built at a very cheap rate, and the cost of hire would be a very good interest on money expended. He did not usually agree with his hon. Friend opposite; but on this occasion he agreed with him, as he thought, rather less than usual. He hoped the noble Lord would consider this question carefully, because it was a very great economy to the country; and by judicious building they would save much expense.

LORD HENRY SCOTT hoped that he would be pardoned for rising to address a few words to the Committee, but he happened to know something about this Embassy house; and, although a great sum of money had been laid out on it, he was able to say that it had been built very well, and of substantial materials. As to the fire, that was a matter of pure accident which might happen to any house. He merely wished to support the statement of his hon. Friend, that the money was very well invested in this way, and it was better to pay a reasonable sum for building an Embassy house, than to pay large yearly sums for hiring one.

MR. FINIGAN wished to ask some Questions about works on the Shannon, in Ennis, at a place called Clare Castle. About six months back he was told by the Treasury that those works would be at once proceeded with, and he was innocent enough to believe them. Since then he had found that those promises were untrustworthy; and, on the other hand, he was much troubled by questions from his constituents why the Liberal Government did not carry out what the Conservative Government had promised, but had refused to do? This money was not money given by the Treasury at all, but it was simply money obtained from shipping coming into harbour. Therefore, he could not at all understand why the Treasury did not keep these promises and carry out these works. If he received a definite promise that that should be done, he would be very happy not to oppose the Vote; but in the meantime he should certainly feel obliged to do so. These works were in a distressed district, and, therefore, they ought to be conceded for the benefit of the population.

MR. NORTHCOTE rose to support the statement made by his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth in regard to the accommodation at the Embassies. With regard to that at Constantinople, he might be allowed to confirm the statement; and, for his part, he believed it to be a real economy of expenditure if the Government would see their way to purchase a permanent residence at most of the capitals. As an ex-diplomatist himself, he ventured to make an appeal to the noble Lord opposite to see if some scheme of this kind could not be carried out.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, for his part, he believed these proposals might better be supported as a matter of generosity to the Diplomatic Service than as a matter of economy. He believed the erection of buildings for the Embassies had not, as a rule, been found economical. There were certain cases, of course, in which it was almost necessary, or, at any rate, certainly desirable. Those cases were, from day to day, coming before the Treasury, and he had already had one or two laid before him, and he could assure hon. Members they had received the most careful consideration. At the same time, he could not see that it was the most economical way of providing Embassy houses. As to the Shannon works, they were being proceeded with as rapidly as possible; but from the nature of the work it was impossible to go on fast, because they were begun below and worked up the river. He could assure the hon. Member that the Board of Works were working very energetically at these works, and others similar.

MR. BLAKE called attention to the fact that the Irish officials were paid considerably less than those in England for the same work, although provisions, clothing, lodging, and other expenses of the same kind were quite as heavy in Ireland as in England. At this moment there was an Irishman acting as warder in an English prison who had a brother filling the same post in Ireland, yet the English official had a much larger salary than his brother in Ireland; though he was assured only the other day that both

That was an inequality, he admitted, which he regretted very much. He should have liked to omit such towns altogether from his Bill, and to allow the rate to apply to the main roads only, paid for out of the county rates; but then there were some towns which had their own quarter sessions, and for which no contribution was made to the county rates, so that would have raised another difficulty. He thought, therefore, there was no alternative but to leave the Bill as drawn; and though the rural districts would not, for the reasons stated, benefit under the Bill in equal proportion with such towns, still they would not be injured by the extra advantage which those towns would get. They would, at any rate, gather a large amount of money into the fund for the maintenance of the roads, and be able to use it in their own districts in a way in which they were not now able or empowered to use it. He believed that the principle of the Bill was sound. It was simply that a rate should be levied locally and expended locally in the maintenance of the roads, taking the place of the old horse duty. He believed that the application of that principle, as provided in the Bill, would injure no one, while, in his opinion, those who kept horses were perfectly willing and able to pay for the advantage or amusement which they derived from them.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Sotherton Estcourt.)

MR. MAGNIAC said, he could entirely sympathize with the hon. Member who had moved the second reading of this Bill, because it was, he thought, generally admitted not only in that House, but throughout the country, that the highway system was in a most unsatisfactory condition. Everybody knew and acknowledged that the increase of charge upon those who had to pay the cost of the highways had become intolerable. He could cordially support any measure which might be brought in for dealing with that matter, and had himself endeavoured to get a Committee appointed for the purpose, because he believed it would be impossible to deal with it satisfactorily without a full knowledge of facts. The hon. Member had said that the principle of the Bill was that those who used the roads should pay for them; and if the Bill were likely to obtain that object he should certainly have approved it. But, practically, that would not be the case. The 12th section of the Bill provided that the highway authority were to have power to apply the tax or charge which it was contemplated they should levy to their own purposes. But, in many cases, for instance, where a large number of horses or packs of hounds were kept, the district rates would not obtain any advantage from the tax which the highway authorities imposed. The whole levy might be collected for the sole advantage of one parish. The object was that the tax should take the place of the old turnpike tolls; but there was no reason why they should again recur to the old system of obstructing communications. The country had made a great sacrifice for the purpose of facilitating communications throughout the country; and, having freed the roads, they were now about to charge a tax upon their means of locomotion upon the roads. That, he thought, was not a system which the House would approve. It was impossible to deal with the question except by a much more general system than was proposed in the Bill. The subject was one which, he thought, could not be discussed at that hour of the morning (5 minutes past 1 o'clock), unless in a very perfunctory manner; and he, therefore, begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Magniac.)—put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Wednesday next.

HIGHWAYS (HORSE RATE) BILL.

(Mr. Sotheron Estcourt, Mr. Reginald Yorks, Mr. Chester Master, Mr. Heneage.)

[BILL 203.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, he did not propose by the measure which he now had the honour to submit to the House to disturb any present arrangements with respect to the funds by which highways were now maintained. His Bill was simply based upon the principle that those who used the roads should pay for their maintenance; whereas, under the present system, many people by reason of not being rated at all, or not being sufficiently rated, were able to use the highways far more frequently than they were entitled to do. It was proposed by this Bill, which he hoped the House would approve, that Highway Boards should be able to levy a rate of 10s. on every horse within their district, and the amount so raised was to be expended by them on the highways of the district. This rate was not at all intended as an interference with the present system, but merely as a rate in aid of it. He believed it would be very much preferable to any Imperial tax, because, if subventions were given by the Government to the rates, that necessitated Government control and inspection; and, for his part, he believed that it was very much to the public advantage that that sort of control should be as limited as possible. There had been, however, large additions to the rates of late years, and he might mention particularly three as weighing very considerably on the local taxpayers—namely, sanitary matters, education, and roads. Of all these, he believed the highway rate was that which was most particularly felt by all classes of the unfortunate ratepayers. His Bill would not, of course, be necessary if turnpikes had not been done away with; but as those modes of raising funds had now been nearly abolished, this Bill was proposed in order to some extent to take their places. The system of turnpikes had many drawbacks, because a large sum was always wasted in establishment charges; but it also had this merit, that it did carry out the fair and equal principle that those who used roads should pay for them in proportion as they used them. When that system disappeared, extra rates and burdens were thrown upon the agricultural interest; while many, who for trade or for pleasure used the roads, escaped money payment at all through not being rated, or, at any rate, did not pay anything like a fair amount. The late Government in 1874 abolished the horse tax, and then the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in explaining his statement on the subject, gave the House the figures of the duty at that time. It appeared that the horse tax brought in £410,000 a-year, and the horse dealers' duty and the race-horse duty £70,000 in addition, or, in all, £480,000. The hon. Baronet who had been his (Mr. Estcourt's) Colleague in the last Parliament, commenting at the time on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech, said—

“With regard to the remission of the horse duty, he thought some of those who benefited most would be among the richer classes. Local taxation was very heavy, and in danger of being increased, and this was one item which might have helped in its reduction by providing for the expenses of turnpike roads after the trusts had expired.”

His own proposal by this Bill was to attain somewhat of the same end. If the Bill he now proposed were passed, and the tax re-imposed in the shape of a local rate, the sum raised from it, whatever it was, would be expended in the local districts, and would be a real relief of a burden which of late had become almost too heavy for some of the ratepayers. It did not, of course, rest with him to meet by anticipation the objections of the opponents of this Bill; but still he did feel himself bound to look at it fairly, and it certainly was an objection to it that in some respects inequality would result. His proposal was that each Highway Board should have the power of levying this rate. Money should be expended in each highway district. There was, then, this difficulty—namely, that towns having a mayor and corporation, or a local board of their own, were a highway district of themselves. It might happen, of course, in that way, that where horses were kept, for instance, in a hunting town, the money would not go to the relief of the rates of the extended district around, but to the relief of the rates in that town and in that town only.

and that, as it were, irritated by the impression, they appeared to have resolved on a victim—namely, the sitting Member for Gloucester. Now, he could not conceive a more serious charge to bring against a Member of that House than to accuse him of having been a party to a corrupt transaction of a pecuniary nature in order to compound practices which were illegal and even criminal, and also to prevent the House of which he was a Member being placed in possession of the actual facts and circumstances of a contested Election, concerning which the Judges were endeavouring to arrive at the truth. He thought it would be agreed, that if such devices were to be connived at by the House the trial of Election Petitions would become a mere form, and that the constituencies would gradually relapse into that corrupt condition from which recent legislation had endeavoured to rescue them. For that reason—if such an arrangement as was imputed in the Report were proved against a Member—it would be difficult for the House to mark its sense of the evil of such a contract too severely; otherwise, he affirmed that the character of the House would be seriously affected. On the other hand, viewing as he did, and as he thought all hon. Members must view, matters in that light, he could imagine nothing more unjust and nothing more intolerable than that the Judges should, upon grounds of mere suspicion, arising from some cause or other in their own minds, and unsupported by any clear evidence, have imputed a transaction of so corrupt a nature against a Member of the House of Commons, whom they were obliged to declare duly elected, and stigmatize in that marked and permanent manner the character of a Member in a special Report which must ever remain upon the Journals of the House. Therefore, he had brought the Report under the Notice of the House in the interest of Members and in the interest of the House, and, as he had endeavoured to explain, in no sense hostile to the hon. Member for Gloucester, for whom he had a great respect, and who, he was convinced, was incapable of such transactions as were imputed in the Report. He thought the Government had acted rightly in signifying their intention to agree to his Motion for the appointment of a Committee, and that the hon. Member had done wisely in giving it his support. Should it turn out, as he had no doubt it would, that the Committee reported there was no foundation for the charges made by the Judges, then he thought it would be the duty of the House to pass a Resolution, not indeed of censure, but of protest and strong remonstrance against judicial aspersions which would have been proved to have been far too lightly and too hastily made. He need only further remark generally that the position of a Member of Parliament was at no time a very easy one. It was a position full of difficulties, anxieties, and responsibilities. The risks which candidates had to run at Elections, without their knowledge and absolutely without their consent, were very great; and whilst it was undoubtedly the duty of the House to insist that Parliamentary Elections should be conducted with a strict and rigid adherence to the dictates of legality, morality, and purity, he ventured to suggest that it was equally the duty of the House, when those conditions had been complied with, to protect its Members from additional anxieties and unnecessary dangers, arising out of Election Petitions, which were calculated seriously to damage their reputation and character, and weaken, if not destroy, their influence for the good of their country. He, therefore, begged to move for the Select Committee of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the matter contained in the last paragraph of the Judges' Report on the Gloucester Election Petition, and the circumstances under which the abandonment of the Petition against the return of Mr. Monk took place.”—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

MR. MONK said, he had no objection to the noble Lord, or to any other Member of the House, calling attention to what he fully admitted with the noble Lord to be the very remarkable, not to say extraordinary, Report submitted to the House by the learned Judges whose names were appended to it. But the noble Lord, who must have seen him in his place last Thursday week, had given him no Notice that it was his intention to call the attention of the House on a future day to the Report of the Judges. Had the noble Lord done so, he might have deemed it right at the time to offer some explanation to the House, or, at striking passages contained in the Report which had been presented to the House by Mr. Justice Hawkins and Mr. Baron Pollock in reference to the Gloucester Election. The last paragraph of the Report was as follows:—

“Under these circumstances, we are not satisfied that the abandonment of the charge against Mr. Monk was not the result of an arrangement made with the view of withholding from us the evidence of the extensive corrupt practices which there is reason to believe have taken place at the Election.”

It was necessary to take the paragraph in connection with the preceding paragraphs of the Report, which was of a very remarkable character. The Judges having reported generally on the Gloucester Election, went on to say—

“And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, we especially report the following matters which arose in the course of the trial, an account of which, in our judgment, ought to be submitted to the House of Commons. The Petition was presented against the said Thomas Robinson and Charles James Monk jointly, and charged them, jointly and severally, with bribery, treating, and intimidation, and undue influence, before, during, and after the said Election.”

“On the day before the trial”—[And here he would observe that the Report had evidently been drawn up with the greatest possible care.]—“the Respondent, Thomas Robinson, by a notice under his hand, signified his intention not to oppose the Petition. At the trial, the Respondent, Thomas Robinson, did not appear either in person or by counsel, or otherwise, to oppose the Petition. The Respondent, Charles James Monk, did appear by counsel. The evidence of Joseph Stoddart and John Clement Morris—shorthand notes of which accompany our Report—was abundantly sufficient to satisfy us that bribery had been committed by John Clement Morris, an agent of the said Thomas Robinson; and that he bribed Joseph Stoddart, Thomas Meadows, and a third man whose name was unknown, to vote.”

It was curious that the Judges should have stated that the sitting Member for Gloucester appeared by counsel; and it, no doubt, meant to imply that the appearance by counsel of the sitting Member was one part of the arrangement by which the Judges suspected that the facts had been glossed over. They then proceeded to allude to the evidence of Stoddart, the first witness examined, who said he was asked by Morris to vote for Monk and Robinson. It was also curious that this should have been mentioned, unless there were other circumstances which lent a peculiar strength to it, because it showed that Morris had acted for both parties, and made a joint canvass. The Judges then say—

“This witness was allowed to leave the box unquestioned by Mr. Monk's counsel. It is due to Mr. Monk to say that Morris, who was afterwards called, denied that he had mentioned Mr. Monk's name; but this was after Stoddart had left the box.”

It would be seen that the Judges qualified that last statement in a way which rather destroyed its value. The Report continued—

“No other evidence was offered with respect to any one of the other cases mentioned in the particulars, and there was no attempt made to establish any one of the charges made against Mr. Monk or his agents. We have no reason to suppose that in delivering the particulars the petitioners acted otherwise than under a belief that they would be in a condition to affect both seats.”

It would appear from this that the learned Judges wished it to be understood that the charges were intended to be brought against both Members. And then they say—

“Before the trial, we believe that the charges of present bribery against Mr. Monk were abandoned, but no application was made to withdraw the charges of corrupt practices through his alleged agents, and his counsel appeared in Court as if those charges were to be persisted in.”

He did not wish the House to be under the impression that he committed himself to the truth of these statements, or to the inferences to be derived from them. He simply pointed out the inferences which arose on the Report. The next paragraphs were as follows:—

“No explanation was offered to us as to the reasons why no attempt even to prove those charges was made, notwithstanding they had never been withdrawn, and no observation was addressed to us by Mr. Monk's counsel which indicated to our minds that he was surprised at the course adopted, and at the sudden abandonment of the Petition so far as it affected Mr. Monk. Moreover, after our judgment was given declaring Mr. Monk to have been duly elected, Mr. Monk's counsel made no application for his costs, which we were prepared to award him had he asked for them, as we intimated to him; but he declined to make any application upon the subject.”

That was the only passage in the Report which seemed to contain any direct evidence against the hon. Member for Gloucester. The Judges concluded with the statement which he had read on rising to address the House. By that statement it seemed to him that the Judges were under the impression that they had been baffled in their inquiry, wards called and questioned as to whether he had mentioned Mr. Monk's name. He denied having done so. The noble Lord drew the inference that this was a case of a man who went about bribing or offering to bribe persons to vote for himself and Mr. Robinson, and who offered no explanation of his conduct. When the noble Lord led the House to suppose that Morris had asked for votes for Monk as well as for Robinson, he evidently had not the evidence before him. Did the noble Lord know who Morris was? Mr. Robinson was a corn merchant in the city of Gloucester, and Morris had been for upwards of 10 years in his employment as traveller. When he went into the witness-box, the learned Judge asked him if he canvassed for Mr. Monk. He said no; he only wanted to see his employer returned. When, therefore, he gave three men sums of 10s. each, he admitted that he gave them to induce the recipients to vote for his employer, Mr. Robinson. It was never pretended by the counsel for the petitioners that this money was given on his account, and, indeed, Mr. Matthews opened no case whatever against him. Counsel on his behalf appealed to the Judges as to whether there was any case against him to answer, and one of the learned Judges replied, "Certainly not." He believed the evidence on this subject would be in the hands of hon. Members in the course of a day or two, and they would find that it confirmed the accuracy of the statements he had made. It had also been said by the Judges that no explanation was offered of the reason why no attempt was made to prove the charges against him, notwithstanding that they were never withdrawn. In his opening speech, Mr. Matthews spoke of him in much higher terms than he deserved, and referred to his services as an old Member of the House in a manner far more flattering than he had any right to expect. Mr. Matthews said that it was the opinion of the petitioners that any bribery that had taken place had not taken place with his cognizance, and he spoke doubtfully as to any responsibility attaching to his agents. When that was said, it was not for his counsel to insist upon the withdrawal of charges which were not brought forward against them in Court. There was another circumstance which he wished to bring under the notice of the House. The moment the trial of the Gloucester Petition was fixed, he instructed his agent to obtain an Order for particulars. He obtained an Order from Sir Henry Hawkins that particulars should be delivered 14 days before the trial. No such application was made at that time by his Colleague. But the day before that on which particulars ought to have been delivered, a summons was taken out by the petitioners against him to show cause why the particulars should not be delayed another six days. That motion was opposed by counsel on his behalf, and was dismissed with costs. If he had been a party to a compromise with regard to this Petition, was it not probable that he would have agreed to the proposal? But, in fact, it was out of the question for his counsel to assent to any postponement of the delivery of the particulars. He would ask the House, was it possible for any hon. Member who had sat so long in that House to allow charges of personal bribery to be made against him, and then, when an Order had been made for the delivery of particulars in respect to them, to consent to a second Order postponing the delivery of those particulars for a further time? When the particulars were delivered, there was not one charge of personal bribery, or undue influence, or intimidation brought against him. The summons which he read to the House was heard before Mr. Justice Hawkins, and every charge against him personally was ordered to be withdrawn. That brought him to the last point. The noble Lord drew attention to the fact that the Judges in the last paragraph of their Report said that Mr. Monk's counsel made no application for costs, which they were prepared to give if he had done so. He was in Court at the time, and he confessed that when his counsel did not apply for costs he was surprised. His counsel stated that he was not instructed to ask for costs. Had he been near the learned counsel at the time he would have insisted upon his asking for costs. He believed that his counsel, finding that the petitioners made no charges against him, and that they did not attempt to prove any of the cases of which they had given notice, took upon himself the responsibility of not asking for costs. The learned Judges were in error in saying that particulars were all events, he would have been prepared to state what course it was his intention to adopt. The noble Lord had now stated that he had called attention to the Report in the interests of Members of the House of Commons. He accepted the explanation of the noble Lord. He had before him the Report of which the noble Lord had read certain portions. The learned Judges stated that they made a special Report in this case, and said that the Petition was a joint Petition presented against his Colleague, Mr. Thomas Robinson, and himself, charging them jointly and severally with bribery, treating, intimidation, and undue influence before, during, and after the election. It was necessary for him to say that he thought the learned Judges must, through inadvertency, have stated—

“Before the trial we believe that the charges of personal bribery against Mr. Monk were abandoned”— for he held in his hand a Report of the proceedings which took place before Mr. Justice Hawkins, as Judge in Chambers, which he would read—

“On the 28th May in the present year, upon hearing counsel for the petitioners and for the respondent, Charles James Monk.”

The House would observe that this alone applied to himself, and had no reference to his Colleague—

“And it being stated to the said Sir Henry Hawkins by counsel on behalf of the petitioners that there was no intention to offer any evidence of personal bribery, treating, intimidation, or undue influence against the respondent, Charles James Monk, it is ordered that the Petition be amended accordingly on or before the 1st of June. And it is further ordered that the particulars be given in 24 hours; the said Sir Henry Hawkins having expressed his opinion that the particulars delivered by the petitioners are not in accordance with his Order dated 18th May, 1880.”

That Order was indorsed, as follows, in the handwriting of the learned Judge himself:—

“It being stated to me by counsel, on behalf of the petitioners, that there is no intention to offer any evidence of personal bribery, treating, intimidation, or undue influence against respondent Monk, I order that the Petition be amended accordingly.”

He thought it was remarkable that the learned Judges, one of whom must have had that Order in his mind, should have merely stated—

“We believe that the charges of personal bribery against Mr. Monk were abandoned.”

Mr. Monk

Those charges, as well as the charges of treating, intimidation, and undue influence, were ordered to be struck out of the Petition by one of those learned Judges himself. He also held in his hand another Order of the High Court of Justice which had been served upon him by the agent for the petitioners. It was as follows:—

“I hereby give you Notice that the Petition was this day amended by striking out the allegations of personal bribery, treating, intimidation, and undue influence.”

A Return had been ordered of the Orders made in Court and in Chambers in relation to the Petition, which would be laid before the Select Committee. But the noble Lord had laid some stress upon the fact that this was a Petition presented against both the sitting Members for Gloucester. That was perfectly true. But the statute enacted that such Petition shall be deemed to be a separate Petition against each respondent. And he begged to inform the House that his committee, his agent for election expenses, and his election agent, were entirely distinct from those of his late Colleague. Further, it had come to his knowledge, though the Petition was presented against the two sitting Members, that that Petition was presented against both, not in consequence of any desire, or in consequence of any intention, of attacking his seat; but because, as the petitioners had stated, they had been advised by counsel that it would weaken their case if they presented their Petition against Mr. Robinson alone. For that reason only, he had been given to understand, was the Petition presented against him as well as against Mr. Robinson. The Judges went on to say that—

“No application was made to withdraw the charges of corrupt practices through his alleged agents, and his counsel appeared in Court as though the charges were to be persisted in.”

He certainly attended in Court with his counsel, and he had no knowledge whatever whether any evidence would be offered with regard to those charges. His counsel was prepared to meet those charges if they had been brought forward. The noble Lord had drawn attention to a passage in the judgment to the effect that a witness deposed that he was asked by Morris to vote for Monk and Robinson. That statement was positively denied by Morris, who was after-

QUEEN'S ANSWER TO ADDRESS REPORTED.

The Queen's Answer to the Address of the 18th instant reported as follows:

"I have received your Address praying that the Fourth Schedule may be omitted from the new Code of Regulations issued by the Committee of the Privy Council on Education and now lying on the Table of the House of Lords:

"The matter on which you have expressed a wish shall be carefully considered, and if my Committee of Council on Education should be of opinion that in the due discharge of the duty entrusted to them by Parliament any alterations in those Regulations can be made by which they will be better adapted to meet the educational requirements of my people, such alterations will be duly laid before you."

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES' ACT, 1875.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

EARL NELSON said, that before he gave Notice of a Motion for Returns in reference to these Societies, he must state that no Registrar General's Return had been laid before the House since 1875, as required by the Act of that year, and he had been obliged to obtain the annual Report for 1878 from the other House of Parliament. Since his Notice, that state of things had been remedied, and the Return for 1878 had been presented to their Lordships' House, and he (Lord Nelson) hoped it would in future be always ordered to be printed. The making of annual Returns by Friendly Societies and their branches was of the greatest importance to the members. It was one of their greatest securities. It would appear from the Report that the annual Returns were not made with regularity; and in his Report for 1878, the Chief Registrar stated that for that year those Returns had been slightly fewer than in the previous year, and yet only one prosecution for failure to make Returns appeared to have been instituted. He, therefore, moved for the Returns for the year 1878, which would be sufficient to draw notice to the subject. He wished to ask how soon they might expect an abstract of the quinquennial Returns of sickness and mortality for the period of from 1870 to 1875, with a table of sickness and mortality founded upon those Returns, and referred to in the Report of the Registrar General of Friendly Societies of 1878, and promised in that Report as very nearly ready; also what progress had been made with the tables promised from those Returns, such tables being much wanted, as we now had only two—one made for the years from 1840 to 1845, and one based upon the Returns for the expenses of the Odd Fellows and Foresters; and, further, to ask whether any means had been taken to secure that the quinquennial valuations required to be made at the end of the present year should be made upon properly attested Schedules? If the Schedules were carelessly or fraudulently made, the valuations founded upon them tended only to mislead, as he had had practical experience. In conclusion, he would move for—

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, there was no objection to the production of the Returns, with a slight alteration, in the form proposed by his noble Friend, to which alteration he believed his noble Friend had no objection. He was, however, afraid it would be impossible to include the Returns for the year 1879 without causing considerable delay, as they were sent in only on the first day of the present month. The abstract quinquennial Returns of sickness and mortality for the period of 1870-75 were nearly completed. In them would be included Returns for the three previous quinquennial periods, which would make the Papers rather voluminous, as no less than 30,000 Returns had to be examined. A large staff was engaged on that work, which delivered to him in respect to 80 cases; 80 cases were included in the particulars with respect to his late Colleague, but only 61 were lodged against him. Had those cases been gone into at the trial it would have lasted five or six days, and the costs would have been very considerable. When he subsequently asked his counsel why he did not apply for costs, he stated that the agent had told him that if the case did not go on it would be better not to apply for costs. With regard to this matter he had no further explanation to give to the House; but he stated most distinctly that he had never at any time since the election, and until he was declared the duly elected Member for Gloucester by the learned Judges, entered into, or been a party to, a compromise enabling him to retain his seat. He begged to submit himself to the judgment of the House.

MR. J. R. YORKE said, he should like to learn from the Solicitor General whether the two Inquiries, the one before the Royal Commission and the other before the Select Committee, were not rather antagonistic? In the case of witnesses coming before the Royal Commission, an indemnity was given to those who came forward to give evidence. But with regard to the tribunal now proposed to be constituted, there would be no such privilege. There would, therefore, be the anomaly of witnesses coming one day to give evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons and having to give evidence without being indemnified, and a little later on having to repeat that evidence before the Royal Commission which had power to guarantee them against the consequences of what they said. It did appear to him that it was a very exceptional course to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into matters which would be investigated a little later on by another tribunal.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, that the matter into which the Committee would inquire would be different from that into which the Royal Commission would inquire. The object of the Commission was to inquire into the question of corrupt practices at the recent election, as well as at prior elections. The Committee was proposed to be appointed simply to inquire whether any imputation rested upon a Member of this House with regard to the settlement or compromise of an Election Petition.

MR. J. R. YORKE said, that it appeared to him that, according to the terms of the Reference, the province of the Royal Commission and of the Select Committee would not be distinct.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, it would be in the province of the Royal Commission to inquire into all matters connected with the election, but the sole question which the Select Committee would deal with was the reflection upon the conduct of a Member of that House. He had no doubt that the same question might to some extent be raised before the Royal Commission and the Committee; but, practically, the Committee would confine itself to inquire into the facts concerning the hon. Member now sitting for the City of Gloucester.

Question put, and agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the matter contained in the last paragraph of the Judges' Report on the Gloucester Election Petition, and the circumstances under which the abandonment of the Petition against the return of Mr. Monk took place."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

Since his Notice, that state of things had been remedied, and the Return for 1878 had been presented to their Lordships' House, and he (Lord Nelson) hoped it would in future be always ordered to be printed. The making of annual Returns by Friendly Societies and their branches was of the greatest importance to the members. It was one of their greatest securities. It would appear from the Report that the annual Returns were not made with regularity; and in his Report for 1878, the Chief Registrar stated that for that year those Returns had been slightly fewer than in the previous year, and yet only one prosecution for failure to make Returns appeared to have been instituted. He, therefore, moved for the Returns for the year 1878, which would be sufficient to draw notice to the subject. He wished to ask how soon they might expect an abstract of the quinquennial Returns of sickness and mortality for the period of from 1870 to 1875, with a table of sickness and mortality founded upon those Returns, and referred to in the Report of the Registrar General of Friendly Societies of 1878, and promised in that Report as very nearly ready; also what progress had been made with the tables promised from those Returns, such tables being much wanted, as we now had only two—one made for the years from 1840 to 1845, and one based upon the Returns for the expenses of the Odd Fellows and Foresters; and, further, to ask whether any means had been taken to secure that the quinquennial valuations required to be made at the end of the present year should be made upon properly attested Schedules? If the Schedules were carelessly or fraudulently made, the valuations founded upon them tended only to mislead, as he had had practical experience. In conclusion, he would move for—

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, there was no objection to the production of the Returns, with a slight alteration, in the form proposed by his noble Friend, to which alteration he believed his noble Friend had no objection. He was, however, afraid it would be impossible to include the Returns for the year 1879 without causing considerable delay, as they were sent in only on the first day of the present month. The abstract quinquennial Returns of sickness and mortality for the period of 1870-75 were nearly completed. In them would be included Returns for the three previous quinquennial periods, which would make the Papers rather voluminous, as no less than 30,000 Returns had to be examined. A large staff was engaged on that work, which would be completed as rapidly as possible. With regard to the valuations, every care had been taken that they were made upon properly attested Schedules. The Schedules were attested by the Secretaries of the Societies as to facts, and by the valuers as to valuation; and when they arrived at the Central Office they were carefully examined and signed by the Secretary.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

Return up to the present time of the names of the registered societies and registered branches of societies which have failed to make the annual returns as required by the Act, with a statement of the penalties enforced for non-compliance with the requirements of the Act under this particular.—(The Earl Nelson.)

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Baron Pollock and Mr. Justice Hawkins, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the City of New Sarum; and from Mr. Justice Lush and Mr. Justice Manisty, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of the same Act, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the Borough of Plymouth.

NEW SARUM ELECTION.

Westminster Hall,
June 28th, 1880.

We, Sir Charles Edward Pollock, knight, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and Sir Henry Hawkins, knight, one of the Justices of the High Court of Justice, two of the Judges for the time being for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, and The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1880, certify that upon the 21st day of June instant (1880), and the three following days, we duly held a Court at Salisbury, in the County of Wiltshire, for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the City of New Sarum, in the said county of Wiltshire, between Henry Rigden, John Rumbold, Joel William Newton, Augustine Dyer, and Samuel Garland, Petitioners; and John Passmore Edwards and William Henry Grenfell, Respondents.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, We certify that at the conclusion of the said trial we determined that the said John Passmore Edwards and William Henry Grenfell, being the Members whose Election and Return were complained of in the said Petition, were duly elected and returned, and we do hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

And whereas charges were made in the said Petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Act, report as follows:—

That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed at the said Election.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, we report that there is no reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the Election to which the Petition relates.

C. E. POLLOCK.
H. HAWKINS.

To the Right Honble.
The Speaker of the House of Commons.

PLYMOUTH ELECTION.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1879.

The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1880.

To the Right Honourable
The Speaker of the House of Commons.

We, the Right Honourable Sir Robert Lush, knight, and the Honourable Sir Henry Manisty, knight, Judges of the High Court of Justice, and two of the Judges for the time being for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Acts, certify that upon the 21st, 22nd, 23rd, 24th, and 25th days of June 1880, we duly held a Court at the Guildhall, in the Borough of Plymouth, in the County of Devon, for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the said Borough between Isaac Latimer and Francis Barratt, Petitioners; and Edward Bates, Respondent.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, We certify and report that at the conclusion of the said trial, We determined that the said Edward Bates, being the Member whose Election and Return were complained of in the said Petition, was not duly elected or returned, and that his Election and Return were and are wholly null and void on the ground of bribery by his Agent, and we do hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

And whereas charges were made of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Acts, report as follows:—

That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any Candidate at such Election.

That there is no reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the Election for the Borough of Plymouth to which the said Petition relates.

Dated this 25th day of June 1880.

And the said Certificates and Reports were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

FILEY HARBOUR BILL (by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, the Bill was one of the most extraordinary measures that had been brought before Parliament during the time he had had a seat in the House. The object of the Bill was to construct a harbour in a well known place on the Yorkshire coast.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member object to the Bill?

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR: Yes.

MR. SPEAKER: Then it must stand over until to-morrow.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR: I wish to call attention to the nature of the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER: As there is opposition the second reading in accordance with the Rules of the House must stand over.

Question put, and negatived.

Bill to be read a second time to-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

EVICTIONS (IRELAND).

LORD ELCHO gave Notice that on an early day he would ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, when he spoke of the increasing number of evictions in Ireland, he meant processes of ejectment or actual evictions from house and home; whether the figures which he gave applied to town or country; and how many of the evictions were for non-payment of rent?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I will answer that at once. They were evictions, not notices of ejectment. They were rural evictions. As to the details, I will give them on a future day if the noble Lord puts down Notice.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BELFAST WORKHOUSE.

MR. A. MOORE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the attention of the Local Government Board for Ireland has been called to the unsatisfactory state of Belfast workhouse, as evinced by the grave charges against the management and discipline of that house so frequently made, sometimes in the local press, at other times addressed to the Local Government Board itself; and, whether in the interests of the poor on the one hand, and the ratepayers on the other, the Local Government Board are prepared to take such steps, either by the dissolution of the existing board and the substitution in its stead of a board of paid guardians, or by other means, to put a stop to the existing state of things?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The subject of the management of Belfast Workhouse has been brought before the Local Government Board, and I have been informed of several charges against the management. An inquiry is still continuing; and I have great hopes that the Board of Guardians, aided by the Local Government authorities will come to a satisfactory settlement of the matters in dispute. As regards substituting paid Guardians for the existing Board, I see no reason for such a step, for the present, at least. In fact, I should almost despair of local government in Ireland if such a step became necessary in so large a town as Belfast.

MR. A. MOORE: I wish to give Notice, in consequence of representations made to me by a large number of ratepayers in the district, that I intend calling attention to the circumstances substantiating the grave charges I am quite aware to have been made.

POOR LAW—INSANE PERSONS—THE PORTSMOUTH UNION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether the insane child of a soldier in India, and a soldier's wife, have been brought from India to Portsmouth in Indian troopships and left chargeable on the rates of that borough; in the latter case the soldier having been sent on to his dépôt, leaving his wife destitute and chargeable; and, whether the mere fact of the Indian troopships coming to Portsmouth justifies the authorities in taking the course adopted in these cases?

MR. CHILDERS: It is the fact that a soldier's insane wife and the insane child of another soldier have been left chargeable—or, rather, I should say partially chargeable—to the rates of the Portsmouth Union; but the highest legal stoppages have in both cases been made from the soldiers' pay in aid of their maintenance. Under the Statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, the Union of Portsmouth is liable for the charge of these persons; and, considering the great advantages which Portsmouth derives from the Government establishments there, it will hardly be deemed unreasonable that the Union should be so chargeable. Perhaps I may add that every information in possession of the Department is given to the Union authorities to enable them to trace the proper place of settlement in such cases.

REGULATIONS, 1880.

MR. B. SAMUELSON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is not the case that the curriculum of instruction in the more important elementary schools of France, Germany, and Switzerland is at least as extensive as that authorised by the new Code; and, whether, under these circumstances, there is any intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to curtail the subjects in respect of which payment for results may be earned in England and Wales?

MR. BROADHURST asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is the intention of the Government to lower the standard of education in the public Elementary Schools of the Country by striking the specific subjects out of the Code?

MR. MUNDELLA: It is undoubtedly the case that in the more important elementary schools of France, Germany, and Switzerland, to which might be added Denmark, Holland, and some other countries, the curriculum of instruction is fully as extensive as that authorized by the new Code. The second part of the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury is substantially the same as the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke, and the answer I am about to give will, I hope, suffice for both my hon. Friends. It is not the intention of the Government to strike the specific subjects out of the Code for the school year 1880-81. But I wish it to be distinctly understood that we leave ourselves absolutely free to deal with the entire Code before the time comes to lay a new Code on the Table of the House. I may say, generally, that there is no intention on the part of the Government to lower the standard of elementary education, or to diminish reasonable opportunities for obtaining it. Our aim is to extend to the whole population a thoroughly sound and efficient elementary training.

Mr. B. SAMUELSON said, that in consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, and also of what had occurred elsewhere, he begged to give Notice that, on going into Committee on the Education Vote, he would move—

“That this House cordially approves of the determination of Her Majesty's Government not to withdraw the payments on results which are now granted to Elementary Schools in respect of the specific subjects in Schedule 4 of the New Code.”

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—THE RELIEF ROAD AT INCHIGEELA.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, As to the truth of the statement made at the meeting of the Macroom Board of Guardians on Saturday last, namely, that a relief road at Inchigeela had been stopped, owing to the insufficiency of the sum voted for it, thereby throwing over eighty persons out of employment; and, whether, if the statement be true, he will give directions for convening a special sessions without delay?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER: I find, Sir, that the relief works in question stopped passed through two baronies, and one barony made a presentment and the other did not do so. That created difficulties which stopped the works; but since then a presentment has been made in the barony which did not at first pass one, and the works will now be resumed.

NAVY—NAVAL ARTIFICERS.

Mr. GORST asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to the existing anomalies with respect to the rating, pay, and duties of the Naval artificers; and, whether the Admiralty will institute inquiries into the matter with the view of revising the present “non-progressive” system?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, that the attention of the Admiralty had not been directed to the subject referred to by the hon. and learned Member. The rates of pay depended on different circumstances, and it was not intended to make any change.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE BALTINGLASS POST OFFICE.

Mr. W. CORBET asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is true that the late post office keeper at Baltinglass, county Wicklow, has been dismissed, or compelled to resign, in consequence of misappropriation of moneys received by him in his capacity as post-office keeper; whether it is proposed, on the recommendation of certain magistrates, and of the Lord Lieutenant of the county Wicklow, to appoint a near relative of the late post office keeper, who was in fact acting as his assistant when the alleged misappropriation took place, to succeed him; and, whether such appointment has actually taken place; and, if so, whether he will lay the Papers connected therewith upon the Table of the House?

Mr. FAWCETT: In reply to the hon. Member for Wicklow county, I beg to say that it is true that the late post office keeper at Baltinglass was dismissed from his situation in consequence of being the individual who had misappropriated some money. The Treasury appointed to the situation a daughter of the late postmaster; and, following the usual practices in those cases, the character of the daughter and her general fitness for the office have been inquired into by the Post Office authorities. If it is found that her character and fitness are satisfactory, then the nomination will be confirmed; but I need scarcely say if they are otherwise it will not receive confirmation.

ARMY (INDIA)—COLONELS' ALLOWANCES.

Mr. TREVELYAN asked the Secretary of State for India, What is the amount of money paid yearly by the Indian Exchequer under the head of Colonels' Allowances, and what is the number of officers at present in receipt of those allowances?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The amount of money paid in the year 1879-80 by the Indian Exchequer under the head of Colonels' Allowances was £214,980. The number of officers in receipt of such allowances on the 1st of April, 1880, was 348.

ARMY—THE FIVE YEARS' RULE—THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would explain why the Commander in Chief of the Forces has been exempt from the rule limiting the tenure of Staff Appointments to a period of five years, in view of the fact that his appointment as a General Officer on the Staff of the Army dates from the 15th July 1856?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to the hon. and gallant Member, I have to state that when, in 1860, the late Lord Herbert brought the Headquarter Staff under the five years' rule, he exempted the Commander in Chief from its operation. This exception has been continued in all later Regulations, and is now embodied in Article 151 of the Royal Warrant of May, 1878.

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—SANITARY WORKS AT MOATE.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN (for Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that the Treasury have declined to sanction an additional loan of £100 to the Board of Guardians of the Athlone Union, to complete certain sanitary works in the town of Moate, on the special terms sanctioned by the Act 43 Vic. c. 4, although said loan has been recommended by the Local Government Board and the Board of Works; and, whether, having regard to the object for which the work was undertaken, namely, to provide employment for the poor in a distressed district, and the special circumstances which caused the application to be made subsequent to the 29th February last, the limit fixed for applications by the Board of Works, namely, that the estimate of the cost was insufficient, he will recommend the Treasury to accede to the application of the Board of Guardians and grant the additional loan on the same terms as the £300 already granted for said works?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, in reply, said, he had to state, in answer to the Question of the hon. and learned Member, that they had direct information that the loan in question was not referred to or recommended by the Board of Works, but it was recommended on the supposition that, being merely supplementary to a loan applied for and granted previously, it might be regarded as a part of that loan and not as a new application. The question was referred to the Board of Works in Ireland, and they gave an opinion that any supplementary application should have been made before the 29th of February, and that, consequently, a loan could not be sanctioned under the Relief of Distress Act. He had, therefore, no legal power to recommend an additional loan.

INDIA—PUNISHMENT OF FLOGGING.

MR. THOMPSON asked the Secretary of State for India, If he will lay upon the Table a Return of the offences for which 72,650 of our Indian fellow-subjects were punished with flogging in the year 1877?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The hon. Member has, no doubt, obtained his information from the Report on the Moral and Material Progress and Condition of India, from which it appears that the punishment of whipping was awarded, in addition to other punishment in 1877, to 6,203 persons; in lieu of other punishment, to 66,447, of whom 28,127 were sentenced in the Madras Presidency. I am sorry that the Return asked for cannot be given, because the judicial statistics do not classify the punishments under the offences, but merely give separately the totals of the various offences and the totals of the various punishments. The required information is, however, contained in the Act VI. of 1864, which will be found in the Library of the House of Commons. The chief provisions of that law are as follows:—For theft, receiving stolen property, house-breaking, and extortion, the offender may, at the discretion of the Judge or magistrate, be punished with whipping in lieu of any punishment to which he may be liable under the Penal Code. On a second conviction for the above offences, the offender may be whipped in lieu of, or in addition to, other punishment. On a second conviction for false evidence, false accusation, criminal assaults on women, indecent offences, robbery, or dacoity, forgery, and habitually dealing in stolen property the offender may be whipped in addition to other punishment. For any offence a juvenile offender may be whipped in lieu of any punishment except death. No female is to be punished by whipping. First class magistrates only are empowered to sentence to whipping. Whipping is to be inflicted with due regard to the health of the offender, and, if practicable, in the presence of a medical man. I do not know how much importance the House will attach to the distinction; but the punishment is termed by the law whipping, and not flogging. The reason why so many sentences of whipping were passed during the year 1877 was that, owing to distress among the people, petty crimes increased greatly, and the magistrates exercised largely their discretionary power of inflicting whipping instead of fine and imprisonment. If a sentence of fine was passed, it would have been equivalent to imprisonment, as people in distress could not pay, and must have gone to prison in default. I am sorry to be compelled to add that the rate of mortality in the prisons increased so very largely in that year that a sentence of imprisonment necessarily carried with it considerable risk of life. I have inquired into the cause of this increased mortality, and I find that it was due to the low and emaciated condition to which a large number of persons who were convicted of petty crimes were reduced by the distress.

Mr. A. M. SULLIVAN asked whether the noble Marquess could inform the House exactly what the distinction was between flogging and whipping; secondly, whether people in an emaciated condition were considered fit subjects for flogging; and, thirdly, whether the Government intended, seeing that in deference to the public opinion of this country flogging in the Public Service was to be abolished, the Government would take steps to abolish the use of the lash among our Indian fellow-subjects?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Perhaps the hon. and learned Member would give Notice of his Question. I may say, however, that I have inquired, but have not been able to obtain as yet a satisfactory answer as to the precise distinction between whipping and flogging. But the punishment in India is not usually inflicted with the "cat," and is a milder punishment than what is known as flogging in this country.

MERCHANT SEAMEN—THE CATTLEMAN, CROSSLEY.

Mr. MACDONALD asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the report of an investigation which appeared in the "Bristol Mercury and Daily Post," of the 22nd instant, in respect to the death of a cattleman named Crossley, on board the steam ship "Gloucester," on the passage from New York to Bristol, and also to a further charge against the Captain and the Mate for making a fraudulent entry into the log-book of the ship; and, whether it is customary for the Board of Trade to appoint a legal gentleman to watch such proceedings, and will he direct one to attend at any future diet of the inquiry?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: My attention has been called to the case referred to, which is that of a cattleman named Crossley, who appears to have died during the voyage from New York from the effects of delirium tremens, and was buried at sea. The master and mate were charged with manslaughter, and, after careful investigation, the magistrates dismissed the case. As regards the entries in the log, the magistrates found that a technical offence had been committed; but they did not inflict any penalty. As regards inquiry, I have to inform the hon. Member that full and special inquiry has been made by the Registrar General of Seamen, whose general duty it is to report upon all cases of death amongst crews at sea.

In reply to a further Question,

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN said, that it was alleged in evidence, and not disproved, that Crossley had remained on deck during a great part of the voyage. The medical man who saw him did not think it necessary to make any special provision for him.

THE EDUCATION CODE, 1879-80—ARTICLE 29 — DAY AND EVENING SCHOOLS.

MR. J. HOWARD asked the Vice President of the Council, If Article 29, Code 1879-80, applies to day and evening schools alike; if not, what rule provides for the examination of evening schools; if the Article does apply, on what ground the Committee of Council on Education maintain that the exception provided in Article 29 does not apply to evening schools; and, whether an overpayment having been made to a school and such overpayment has been due to an error of the Education Department in estimating the grant due to the school, are the Committee justified in demanding repayment of the sum overpaid when more than a year has elapsed from the time when such overpayment was made?

MR. MUNDELLA: Article 29 of the Code, which provides, generally, that scholars may not be presented a second time for examination under a lower or under the same Standard, applies to day and evening schools alike; but the exception stated in that Article (29b) is not applicable to evening schools, because in an evening school payment is made for a child who passes only in one of the three subjects of reading, writing, and arithmetic; while in a day school (by Article 19 B 3) no grant is allowed for a child unless he passes in two out of the three subjects. With regard to the second part of the hon. Member's Question, I have to say that under the system by which public accounts are audited over-payments made by the Education Department to managers of schools may be detected by the Audit Office and re-payment required many months after the grants have been made; but, as my hon. Friend knows, the repayments are not enforced upon merely technical grounds, but only when there has been a breach of the spirit of the Code.

THE ZULU WAR—BATTA OR EXTRA PAY.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in pursuance of the precedents of the Abyssinian and Ashantee Wars, Her Majesty's Government intend to grant to the troops engaged in the late campaign in Zululand any batta or extra pay as compensation for the expenses and losses incurred while on that service; and, if it is the intention of the Government to give prize money for cattle captured from the enemy during the Zulu War, according to the values assessed by military Boards at the time of capture?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that I have carefully looked into the decisions of my Predecessors on this subject, and I find that the precedents of the Abyssinian and Ashantee Wars were not considered in point. In the case of the Abyssinian War, batta, which is an allowance granted under Indian regulations, was only given to the troops because the expedition was organized in India, and the troops were on Indian pay and under Indian regulations, and it was only given in that instance because no previous notice had been given to the troops that it would not be granted. In Ashantee the prize was inconsiderable, and to avoid the expense and delay in its distribution a gratuity of a month's pay, which could be immediately issued, was given in lieu. I am not aware what the expenses and losses are to which the Question refers. As the troops received free rations of every sort, the only expense would, I presume, be on account of the wear and tear of clothing; but on this point I find that large supplies of clothing, necessaries, and boots were sent out to replace losses, &c., on purpose to obviate claims for compensation. Officers received extraordinary field allowance. Any losses incurred by them have been dealt with under Royal Warrant. I should mention that in 1878 the Treasury approved of a full ration being issued to troops on field service, free of stoppage, the main reason for this concession being that it would obviate the necessity for grants of boon pay. As regards the captured cattle, I find that what took place was this:—Up to a certain date the captured cattle were sold on the spot, and the money realized irregularly distributed among the troops. In May, 1878, my Predecessor instructed Lord Chelmsford to cease distributing the profits of sales of captured cattle, as it was open to grave political and military objections, offering as it did great temptation, especially to Colonial levies, to make predatory attacks, and to make the captured cattle their first consideration, instead of devoting their whole energies to inflicting loss on the enemy. He was, therefore, instructed either to slaughter them or hand them over to the Commissariat. There is no record in the War Office of any assessment by Military Boards of the value of cattle so captured. They were, whenever possible, given to the troops as extra meat ration. After the advance of the troops into Zululand the money value of these captures could have been little or nothing in an enemy's country, as there were naturally no purchasers; and the contractor was bound to have his own supply, regardless of any casual augmentation of this nature. Under these circumstances, I cannot hold out any hope of the decision of my Predecessor, either as to extra pay or prize money, being re-considered.

PARLIAMENTARY OATHS ACT, 1866— AFFIRMATION.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government will bring in a Bill to remove all doubts as to the legal right of a Member to claim to make a solemn Affirmation, instead of taking the Parliamentary Oath, on taking his seat?

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not propose to bring in any Bill of that description. When the Questions are concluded I will give Notice on the subject.

INLAND REVENUE—THE INCOME TAX.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to a Letter of the Inland Revenue Department, stating that dividends payable on the 1st of next month should have Income Tax deducted at the rate of sixpence in the pound; and, whether he could state by whose authority such instructions were given?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have seen the letter to which the hon. Gentleman refers, and on inquiry I find that it is not a Circular intended to give authoritative directions, but that it is intended rather as a recommendation to parties as to the course which it is hoped will be most convenient. I am assured by the Board of Inland Revenue that they have always taken upon themselves the responsibility of advising persons who have to make payments subject to deduction for Income Tax—of course, they cannot compel them—to act on the Resolution of the House of Commons, and thereby save trouble to themselves and others. The course now taken is in strict conformity with the practice on former occasions; but I am also informed that it is not practicable to make the rule uniform; and I believe it is certain no deductions will be made on the dividend on the public funds due on the 5th of July in conformity with the practice of the Inland Revenue Department.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) —EVICTION IN KERRY.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will cause inquiry to be made into a case of eviction which has, within the last few days, taken place in the barony of Irraghticonnor and townland of Moybella, county of Kerry, in which Patrick Macnamara, wife, and nine children, were evicted and cast upon the roadside; and, if it be not true that since the eviction Patrick Macnamara has died on the road and left his family in a starving and dying state?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have received a Report, Sir, from the Constabulary, from which it appears that Patrick Macnamara and his family, consisting of his wife and seven—not nine—of his children were evicted on the 22nd instant. Macnamara, I am told, had several friends in the neighbourhood who would have taken him in. He erected a shelter on the roadside near his late farm, where he keeps his family. I received a telegram this morning to say that there is no truth in the rumour that he is dead; but within the last hour I have received a telegram stating that last night about 10 o'clock he was put back in the tenancy by a large party of men with blackened faces, some of them armed, and the two men in charge of the place were assaulted.

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—REMOVAL OF NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there is any rule of the Legal Advisers of the Crown on the subject. Under these circumstances, I think that my hon. Friends would see that it will not be possible to immediately circulate the Papers promised on this subject.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £84,831, to complete the sum for the Scientific Branch.

MR. GORST said, that when he moved that the Committee do report Progress some weeks ago, two questions were suggested, which, he thought, required examination. The first question was, were the Lords of the Admiralty just in charging themselves with rent at the rate of £100 a-year only for Greenwich Hospital, and the other question was as to the expenses of the Briannia training ship. He proposed, in the few remarks he should now make to the Committee, to confine himself exclusively to the first of those questions, as he did not wish to confuse that matter by mixing up other questions with it. The question was a very short and simple one. The sum placed upon the Estimates—namely, £100—was entirely inadequate, and the Admiralty ought to increase that amount. He was afraid, however, that there was no way now in which the question could be submitted to the test of a division, owing to the Sessional Order which prevented Members making Motions on going into Committee, so that private Members, who wished to raise a question of that sort were now unable to do so. It would be quite different if private Members were in possession of the privileges they formerly possessed. Therefore, it was not his fault if he delayed the Committee by a discussion upon which no division could be taken, but that of the Sessional Order by which private Members were now bound. The simple question was then,

whether £100 a-year was an adequate sum to pay as rent for Greenwich Hospital? The Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. T. Brassey) had told them that the amount of the assessment upon which a contribution in lieu of rates was paid to the local authorities at Greenwich for the Hospital and School and other buildings was £8,000 a-year; and he thought it would not be an extravagant supposition that the value of Greenwich Hospital alone was, at least, as high as £4,000 a-year. They had thus the fact before them that the Government—that was, the Lords of the Admiralty—were giving a rent of £100 a-year for a building the rent of which ought to be £4,000 a-year; they ought in fact, to pay a rent 40 times greater than what they now paid. The only answer to this was that an Act of Parliament had conferred on the Board of Admiralty power to dispose of the property in that way. But that was not the question. The real question was, whether they had the power, but whether they had a right to exercise the power in that particular manner. He had looked into the Acts of Parliament which regulated the powers of the Admiralty with reference to Greenwich Hospital, and throughout those Acts appeared that the Lords of the Admiralty were trustees of a charitable fund, which charity partly resulted from grants made by the nation, and partly from private benefactors, and consisted both of lands and personal property. It was vested in the hands of the Admiralty as trustees, for the exclusive use and benefit of Greenwich Hospital. In the Act of Parliament in which the trust of the former Commissioners was vested in the Lords of the Admiralty, he had found over and over again the expression—

"Vested in the Lords of the Admiralty trust for Majesty, her heirs, and successors the exclusive use and benefit of Greenwich Hospital."

When, by the Act of 1865, the Lords of the Admiralty became trustees of the charity they were bound to administer the trust in the same way as any other trustee, for the exclusive benefit of the seamen and marines who were entitled thereto. In 1869 another Act was passed, giving the Lords of the Admiralty additional powers. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the

for War (Mr. Childers) stated the other day that that Act was a bargain. For his part, he (Mr. Gorst) failed to see that, and he should be glad if the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) would point out how it was so. There must be two parties to every bargain, and he failed to see in the Act of 1869 anything given or taken upon the other side; therefore, it was not the result of a bargain, but a simple disposal on the part of the Government of the property of Greenwich Hospital. There had been, in fact, no bargain, and the Admiralty could not barter away the rights of the aged seamen and marines, who were entitled to have the charity administered for their use and benefit, unless some equivalent advantage or gain was acquired by them in lieu of the rights taken from them. He thought it was most unreasonable to speak of that Act as a bargain. By that Act, no doubt, the Admiralty were empowered to let the property, either with or without requiring a rent; but he denied their right to exercise those powers in any other way than for the benefit of the persons entitled. He found in the debate which took place when the Bill passed that Mr. Liddell took exception to dealing with the building in an off-hand way, and Sir John Hay objected to so much power being given to the Admiralty. For his own part, he saw no objection to the most absolute power being conferred, because they would always remain bound to exercise it for the exclusive use and benefit of Greenwich Hospital. The question was whether the Admiralty were fulfilling their trust and dealing fairly and equitably with those who were interested in these funds by letting the buildings to themselves as representing the naval authorities of the country at a paltry rent of £100 a-year. That was the whole question. Had they, as trustees, a right to do as they liked with the buildings, or were they not, as trustees, bound to use their powers to the best advantage in letting them for the benefit of those interested in the fund? That being so, were they letting the buildings to the best advantage by letting them to themselves as the naval authority of the country for the paltry rent of £100 a-year? It was idle to say that they were making the best use they could of the Greenwich Hospital buildings. If the Naval Service of the country required a College for the instruction of naval officers, the country was rich enough to pay a fair rent for the buildings it required. Was it worthy of a great and wealthy country like this to take buildings belonging to poor and aged seamen at the grossly inadequate rent of £100 a-year, in order to prevent the country paying a proper rent for the accommodation of a Naval College. He must apologize to the Committee for being so pertinacious in asking that Progress might be reported when the Vote was under discussion on the last occasion; but he did so in order that he might fairly state the case on the present occasion. This was a question which could only be decided by bringing public opinion to bear upon it. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) was good enough to read them a lecture; he said he (Mr. Gorst) should have raised this question when the Conservative Government was in Office. He might state that he raised the question every year, while the late Government was in power, but could never do so except at 1 o'clock in the morning. Therefore, the ignorance of the hon. Member for Galway of his having raised it before was excusable, because the question was only brought on at a time when the hon. Member was not present. Any hon. Member who had been in the habit of attending while the Navy Estimates were under debate would know that the question had been raised before. He rejoiced, on that occasion, to be able to raise the question when their proceedings could be reported, and the public, by means of the newspapers, could know the truth with regard to this matter. He hoped that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty would give an answer to this straightforward demand on the part of aged seamen and marines on the present occasion, when full publicity would be given to the debate.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, that, as he was in Office at the time that the rent of £100 a-year was first fixed for the Hospital buildings, he should like to make a few observations. He never considered that £100 a-year was an adequate rent for these buildings. He considered that amount only a nominal annual acknowledgment for their temporary use for naval purposes. His reason for putting that rent on was this. Not only was the whole of the Hospital taken for naval purposes and used as a Naval College, but a house let at £65 a-year was also taken over for use as an infirmary, and the charity was, therefore, deprived of that amount of rent. Previous also to 1873, when this arrangement was made, the cashier lived in the Hospital, and enjoyed the use of the buildings. When the whole of the buildings were utilized as a College, that man was turned out, and the Hospital had to find him another house. He had to be accommodated with a house rented at £45 a-year. Therefore, as the Hospital directly lost £60 a-year, and had to pay £45 a-year, through having to find accommodation outside for their officer, he thought it only just that the country should pay an additional £100 a-year to Greenwich Hospital funds. In making that arrangement, he never contemplated that the £100 a-year was an adequate rental for the use of the whole of the College buildings. It had been stated that the sum expended by the country for repairs upon the Hospital buildings was equivalent to a rental, and that statement was attributed to him. He certainly did not say so. The annual expenditure upon repairs might be put at £2,000 a-year; but it was spent not only in repairs, but upon internal alterations for the purposes of the College. The rental of £100 a-year was only given as an equivalent for annual rents of which the Hospital had been deprived. He must say, so far as the general question was concerned, that if the Naval College had the use of these buildings, the Hospital was receiving no money from the State in lieu of them. He thought, however, it should not be forgotten that these buildings belonged to the Charity, and not to the State.

MR. MAGNIAC said, with regard to the rent which had been paid for the use of the Hospital buildings, or rather the equivalent for rent, the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gorst) had informed the Committee that the Trustees had the power to do as they liked with the buildings. But that was not so; the right of the Trustees to deal with the buildings was absolutely and precisely regulated by the original grant of that Charity and by the Act of 1869. It would be found stated in the Report of the Committee of 1868 that originally these buildings were a donation to the sailors of this country. They were given on the terms that the buildings were to be used wholly and solely for the reception of sailors unable to follow their calling. There was no right in anyone to let the buildings; they were absolutely and strictly limited to the receiving of disabled seamen. When it was found that the Hospital no longer served its purpose by giving sailors the benefit which in olden times they received from it, it was considered by the Government of the day that a re-arrangement of these buildings might be made. The Government accordingly brought in a Bill laying down the terms on which the buildings were to be used; and, for the first time, the right of leasing them was granted. The Bill, as originally brought in, power was given to the Government to make any use of the buildings; and it was contemplated that they should be used for public, charitable, or any use connected with the Public Service. When the question was discussed in the House some hon. Members took considerable interest in the question; and the result of their efforts was that words were inserted in the Act which limited the use of the buildings to the Naval Service, the country or any Department of the Government, or to any person who had been engaged in the Naval Service of the country. That was the outside limit of the power of the Government given by the Act. It had been stated in the debate that the Government were bound to procure the best terms that could be got in the market for these buildings. Everyone knew that trustees were bound by the terms of their trust, and that they was, consequently, no power in the Government to go into the open market and let these buildings to the first-comer. The rent was stated in the House to have been fixed upon that basis. The buildings were of a very extensive character. They were a great architectural ornament to the River; and it was evident that if the Government had provided for a Naval College only, they would not have erected an edifice which cost between £3,000 and £5,000 a-year for rent. The amount spent for repairs alone on Greenwich Hospital was very large. If the buildings had been occupied, and had been applied to any other purpose, the cost of the repairs

would have fallen upon the Charity; and the funds of the Charity would, therefore, have been diminished by the sum of £2,000 to £4,000 a-year. The Act dealing with Greenwich Hospital was debated very strenuously in the House, and great stress was laid by Gentlemen interested in the question upon the necessity of the buildings being always available for the use of the Navy at any moment. It was, therefore, provided by the Act that if the Government chose to call upon the occupants of the Hospital buildings to turn out, they must do so, in order that accommodation might be provided for sailors on the occurrence of an emergency. [Laughter.] The necessity for that provision was felt at the time because, shortly before, owing to a calamity, there was no place for the accommodation of a number of disabled seamen. It might be proved that the rateable value of the Hospital buildings was £8,000 a-year, while the real rent of the premises might not exceed £4,000 a-year. The rateable value was the value of the building well let, and with security of occupation from year to year unfurnished. But the rent of a building well let from year to year, unfurnished, was very different from the rent of buildings the occupants of which might be turned out at a moment's notice. The Government did not occupy these buildings unfurnished from year to year; but their occupation was strictly limited to the terms of the Act, which were that the whole of the buildings of the Hospital and their appurtenances should be available for the reception of sailors, if the Government should consider it necessary. The Act of Parliament was carefully considered, and in a case of great emergency power was given to re-occupy them at once for the purpose of sailors. The point which he wished particularly to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was this—that in connection with the arrangements for Greenwich Hospital the sum of £4,000 was given as compensation to merchant seamen for the Greenwich Sixpence. The diversion of the Greenwich Sixpence Fund was the greatest hardship ever inflicted on any body of men. Seamen were made to contribute through their wages to it; and when they wanted relief they were told that they had contributed their money for the purpose of seamen engaged not in the Merchant

Service, but in the Naval Service of the country. If the hon. Gentleman would increase the amount granted for that purpose, he (Mr. Magniac) should be very glad. If the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) could manage to get that amount increased, he would be doing a great service to the unfortunate contributors to that fund, many of whom were still living. In regard to the rent paid by Government for the use of the Greenwich Hospital buildings, taking into consideration the terms of the trust and the large expenditure which was paid for repairs, and that they could be turned out at a moment's notice, he did not think that the terms they were at present holding were unfair to the Charity.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that the hon. Member who had last spoken (Mr. Magniac) had proved that the Admiralty had, as trustees of the Hospital, let the buildings worth £4,000 for £100 a-year. It was said, when the bargain was examined, it would not be found that such was the case. But here were buildings, which it must be allowed were worth £4,000 a-year, and for them the magnificent sum of £100, and £6 additional a-year was paid, and which were used for the purpose of instruction in fortification. He did not hear from the hon. Member for Bedford one word which militated against the position they had assumed upon this question. He should like to hear from the Government who made this bargain which was spoken of. What were its terms? Did they make it as Trustees, or as First Lords of the Admiralty, or in what position were they when they made it? What right had they to make any bargain? A powerful Government forced this confiscation upon the seamen and marines, and upon the country. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), like every other hon. Member representing a Dockyard constituency, felt very strongly upon the subject; for the Naval Service at the present moment considered that it had been defrauded of its rights. If the Act of Parliament prevented the Admiralty from letting the property advantageously, then let the Trustees apply for further powers as other Trustees would do; but so long as it occupied buildings worth £4,000 a-year for a rent of £100, it would be committing a very great iniquity. £4,000

the Education Office (Ireland) which makes all Reports of their Inspectors, upon which masters are removed from their schools, &c., considered confidential?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he was afraid he must tell his hon. Friend that they could not conduct the inspection satisfactorily if the Reports were not confidential.

ARMY—MAGAZINE AND REPEATING ARMS.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can lay upon the Table any information respecting the experiments which it is understood have been recently carried on in Austria and Germany with magazine and repeating arms; and, if not, if he will call for reports upon the subject, with a view to their publication?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my noble Friend, I have to say that the information respecting these experiments now before the Office is very imperfect. When I receive fuller details I will consider whether they can be laid on the Table.

INLAND REVENUE—INTOXICANTS.

SIR CHARLES REED asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether beverages slightly fermented but made without malt, such as ginger beer, &c., are intended to be included in the list of intoxicants; and, whether instructions have been given to the officers of Excise to compel the manufacturers and sellers of such drinks to take out licences as brewers?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: I have been requested by my right hon. and learned Friend to answer this Question. I have little to add to an answer that was given by my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government a week ago. He then stated that it was the rule of the Inland Revenue authorities not to prosecute manufacturers of so-called non-intoxicating beverages which contained less than 3 per cent of alcohol. But it must be remembered that these drinks are generally made of sugar, and that a large quantity of beer is brewed from the same material. Indeed, it has recently been found that a considerable quantity of non-intoxicating drinks were just as strong as mild table beer. In the present state of legislation, with respect to Beer and Malt Duties, there has been a suspension of proceedings in the case of these drinks, and no special instructions have been issued to compel manufacturers to take out licences as brewers.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS—BOROUGH OF EVESHAM.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he is able to say how long it will be before the Notes of the Shorthand Writer, taken at the trial of the late Petition on the Election for the Borough of Evesham, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, it was intended to lay the evidence, together with the judgments of the learned Judges who had tried the Petition, upon the Table. The judgments had been forwarded to the learned Judges, who were now engaged in discharging other public duties, for their revision, and as soon as they returned them the full proceedings would be printed. Care would be taken that there should be no unnecessary delay.

RAILWAY (INDIA) BRIDGES.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Report on Indian Railways for 1877 correctly states the name of the firm who contracted for the Railway Bridge across the Nerbudda River; whether that firm were not also contractors for the principal iron work of the Tay Bridge; and, whether, under these circumstances, he has considered the desirability of providing that the Indian Government should institute an investigation as to the quality and kind of iron used for the Nerbudda Bridge, and also extend their inquiry to the Indus Bridge and other bridges built or being built on the Guaranteed and State Railways of India?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In the Report on Indian Railways for 1877 the name of the firm who contracted for the railway bridge across the Nerbudda River is correctly given, and the firm mentioned is the same as that which is stated to have been connected with the supply of the principal iron work of the receive anything from the funds of Greenwich Hospital. This was felt to be a great hardship, because seamen considered that Greenwich Hospital was instituted for their benefit, and that the Admiralty were only trustees of its funds for them, and that they ought to do the best they could with it by getting as much money out of it as possible, and by distributing it in an equitable way. And he submitted that it was inequitable to withhold these age pensions from those men who had served the best, and give them to others who had not served so well; because it must be remembered that it was only men who had served extremely well who became entitled to such a large pension from the Navy as 2s. 6d. a-day. Thus the best men were deprived of what they had expected, and what they had been led to suppose they would have; while, on the other hand, a man who had not done so well, and who had earned the pension of, say, 1s. 6d. only, at the age of 55, would reap the full benefit of the Greenwich Hospital pension, and would then get 5d. a-day; and, at 65, the extra 4d., making 9d. altogether. It was true that they were in a difficulty in this matter. The funds were not large enough to provide for all these pensions, and the reason of that was that the number of men had rapidly increased who were entitled to them; but all that ought to have been foreseen many years ago. In 1865 an Act was passed, for which the now Secretary of State for War was made responsible. At that time the right hon. Gentleman said a bargain was made. The hon. Member for Bedford had called it an arrangement; while the right hon. Gentleman had called it an adjustment. But, whether it was a bargain, or arrangement, or an adjustment, it was a very one-sided arrangement, by which only the taxpayers benefited, and one which was made at the expense of the recipients of the Greenwich Hospital pension. His contention was that this arrangement was made by the Government without looking forward to the future. He did not say that the men who, at that time, were allotted pensions, were unjustly treated; but he complained that the Government did not look forward and see that there were a large number coming in to claim those pensions, but who would necessarily be deprived of them; and, therefore, the arrangement which they had made was unjust. The Government, finding they had made that mistake, from motives of generosity and justice, should now come forward and help the fund to meet this difficulty. He did not think they were asking too much to expect that. The fact was that the Greenwich Hospital Pension Funds had been made to supplement and assist the Imperial Funds. He could prove that by several instances. In 1865, for instance, the Secretary of State inaugurated what was called the Pensioners' Reserve. That was, to all intents and purposes, a part of our Naval Reserve, and it was raised by offering certain men the Greenwich Hospital pensions at an earlier age—at 50, instead of 55. It was said that this Naval Reserve had not caused a great strain on the funds of Greenwich up to the present time; but when the right hon. Gentleman inaugurated the Reserve, it was contemplated that this should become a Force of 5,000 men; and if that had been raised, it would have imposed upon the funds of Greenwich a strain of £19,000 a-year. That was a sum sufficient to provide pensions for 1,500 men. The right hon. Gentleman might reply that, as a matter of fact, no very great strain had been so imposed, because the Pensioners Reserve had not come up to the numbers contemplated; but he saw that Admiral Phillimore, in his last Report, said that, while in 1867 the number of Pensioners Reserve was 511, in 1879 it numbered 1,166; and the Admiral went on to assert that he thought the present system might be considered a successful experiment. If that was so, they might in a very few years expect that the whole number of men contemplated by the scheme of 1865 would be raised, and they would then be drawing from the funds of Greenwich £19,000 a-year as an inducement for these men to enter this Reserve. He must complain of this, and repeat what he had already said, that by this means the Greenwich Fund had been made to supplement and assist the Imperial Funds, not only in this respect, but in others; and it was, therefore, not too much to ask the Government to come forward and supplement the fund, so as to stave off this difficulty. He would say—"By all means make any legislation prospective, but do not, in any case, make it retrospective. Let on behalf of my noble Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, that upon a consideration of the number of piers which could be advantageously made, and from the great wish we have to obtain the full advantage of the generous grants made from the Dominion of Canada, he has come to the conclusion to give Notice to increase the grant from £30,000 to £45,000. I will put these clauses on the Paper to-morrow; and, under these circumstances, I hope that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork will not proceed with the second reading of his Bill to-night. If he does, I shall feel it my duty to oppose it.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will kindly say whether he has received any additional information in reference to the existence of famine fever in the County Mayo?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Yes; I have received information. The House can hardly doubt that I receive constant information with regard to it. So far as I can learn, it is not what is generally called famine fever. That is to say, it is not that mesenteric fever which was the great cause of death in the last famine. It is a kind of typhus, and I hear different accounts of it. In one or two cases it appears to be severe, while in others it appears to be passing away. As far as I can make out, it is not caused by want of food, though I think the change to a low class of food may have made it easier to be taken. In some cases persons were attacked who were not in great distress; but in others, no doubt, the persons taking it were in distress. I think it is a very serious matter. We are meeting it to the very best of our power; and I believe we can meet it, as far as human agency is able to do so, by the best medical inspection, by taking them into the hospitals, and by ordering such better food as may seem suitable. I should like to know what course the hon. Member means to adopt with regard to his Bill to-night?

MR. PARNELL: As it would not be convenient to proceed with the Motion for the second reading of my Bill until the House has had an opportunity of seeing the clauses which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to place on the Paper, I beg to say that I will defer that Motion until these clauses have been circulated amongst hon. Members.

PARLIAMENTARY AFFIRMATION—

MR. BRADLAUGH.

NOTICE OF RESOLUTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: I may remind the House that on Friday evening I expressed an opinion to the effect that we ought to proceed to consider the case of Mr. Bradlaugh to-morrow. Since that time, however, the Government have framed a Resolution which they intend to submit to the House. As, however, we think it desirable that the House should have rather more time to consider it, and as we cannot interfere with the proceedings of private Members on Wednesday, I propose, at the opening of Business on Thursday, to submit the following Resolution:—

“That every person returned as a Member of this House, who may claim to be a person for the time being by Law permitted to make a solemn Affirmation or Declaration instead of taking an Oath, shall henceforth (notwithstanding so much of the Resolution adopted by this House on the 22nd day of June last as relates to Affirmation) be permitted, without question, to make and subscribe a solemn Affirmation in the form prescribed by ‘The Parliamentary Oaths Act, 1866,’ as altered by ‘The Promissory Oaths Act, 1868,’ subject to any liability by statute; and, secondly, that this Resolution be a Standing Order of this House.”

I may, perhaps, venture to say that in submitting this Resolution I shall endeavour to confine myself to what I think will be a description of the situation, and shall not think it necessary, as far as I am concerned, to revive the general argument on which I and many other hon. Members have had an opportunity of stating our views; and, perhaps, if the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) be in the House, I may venture to express a hope that as the question will be raised, in the view of the Government, in the most convenient manner by this Resolution, he will not think it necessary to proceed with any Motion, or ask leave to proceed with any Motion, to-morrow.

MR. LABOUCHERE: After the very satisfactory Notice which has just been given by the Prime Minister, I beg to give Notice that I shall withdraw the Resolution of which I have given Notice for to-morrow.

MR. GORST: I should like to ask whether the Resolution of which the Prime Minister has given Notice will raise a Question of Privilege; and whether, therefore, if the debate should be adjourned on Thursday, it would come on before the other Business on Friday, or upon any other day for which it may be fixed.

MR. SPEAKER: I have already stated in reference to this matter that the question is not one of Privilege.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I think it would be for the convenience of the House if I venture to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, and if he will condescend to answer it. It is, what course he intends to adopt in reference to the Notice of Motion which has just been given by the Prime Minister?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE did not make any reply.

MR. CALLAN: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister will say whether he purposes that the Resolution should have a retrospective effect?

MR. GLADSTONE: Of course, my intention with regard to that matter would have no effect whatever; but I believe with regard to the force of the words, drawn as the Resolution is with reference to the recent Resolution of the House of Commons, it would have a retrospective effect in the case of Mr. Bradlaugh.

MR. MACDONALD asked whether, in consequence of the Resolution of which the Prime Minister had given Notice for Thursday, the consideration of the Employers' Liability Bill would not have to be deferred?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I beg to give Notice that on to-morrow I shall put to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon the Question which I just now put to him.

MR. GORST: I should like to know whether the hon. Member would be in Order in putting such a Question?

MR. GLADSTONE: In answer to the Question put from below the Gangway, I am not aware how far it will be the pleasure of the House to enter into a general discussion; and unless it does so, I see no reason why the question should not be disposed of in a very limited time. At all events, we do not propose to postpone the Employers' Liability Bill.

MR. GORST: I want to know whether it is in Order for the hon. Member for Mayo to give Notice to ask a Question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon, as to what course he intends to pursue with respect to the Resolution of which Notice has been given by the Prime Minister?

MR. SPEAKER: The terms of the Notice of the hon. Member for Mayo did not reach me. At the same time, I may say that unless they relate to some Bill or Motion before the House that Question would not be regular.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: To prevent any misunderstanding, and owing to the difficulty of discovering to whom the title of the Leader of the Opposition may be applied, I wish to give Notice that, as the Motion of the Prime Minister will be on the Paper to-morrow, and as it, therefore, comes within the description which you, Sir, have just given, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon what course he intends to pursue on Thursday with reference to that Resolution?

MR. CALLAN: I beg also to give Notice that I shall, at the same time, ask the hon. Member for Mayo, what course he and those acting with him intend to pursue in this matter?

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I wish to ask whether it is competent for one private Member of this House to ask another private Member what course he intends to pursue in regard to an Order of the Day, or a Motion for which he is not responsible?

MR. SPEAKER: Such a Question as that indicated by the hon. Member for Mayo would not be in Order. It does not relate to any Bill or Motion before the House for which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon is himself responsible.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON—THE FISHERY QUESTION—THE FORTUNE BAY PAPERS.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In reference to the Questions recently addressed to me by the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) and the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Cork (Colonel Colthurst), I should like to say that communications are passing between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States in regard to the Fortune Bay question, and that communications are also passing with the Legal Advisers of the Crown on the subject. Under these circumstances, I think that my hon. Friends would see that it will not be possible to immediately circulate the Papers promised on this subject.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £84,831, to complete the sum for the Scientific Branch.

MR. GORST said, that when he moved that the Committee do report Progress some weeks ago, two questions were suggested, which, he thought, required examination. The first question was, were the Lords of the Admiralty just in charging themselves with rent at the rate of £100 a-year only for Greenwich Hospital, and the other question was as to the expenses of the Britannia training ship. He proposed, in the few remarks he should now make to the Committee, to confine himself exclusively to the first of those questions, as he did not wish to confuse that matter by mixing up other questions with it. The question was a very short and simple one. The sum placed upon the Estimates—namely, £100—was entirely inadequate, and the Admiralty ought to increase that amount. He was afraid, however, that there was no way now in which the question could be submitted to the test of a division, owing to the Sessional Order which prevented Members making Motions on going into Committee, so that private Members, who wished to raise a question of that sort were now unable to do so. It would be quite different if private Members were in possession of the privileges they formerly possessed. Therefore, it was not his fault if he delayed the Committee by a discussion upon which no division could be taken, but that of the Sessional Order by which private Members were now bound. The simple question was then,

whether £100 a-year was an adequate sum to pay as rent for Greenwich Hospital? The Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. T. Brassey) had told them that the amount of the assessment upon which a contribution in lieu of rates was paid to the local authorities at Greenwich for the Hospital and School and other buildings was £8,000 a-year; and he thought it would not be an extravagant supposition that the value of Greenwich Hospital alone was, at least, as high as £4,000 a-year. They had thus the fact before them that the Government—that was, the Lords of the Admiralty—were giving a rent of £100 a-year for a building the rent of which ought to be £4,000 a-year; they ought, in fact, to pay a rent 40 times greater than what they now paid. The only answer to this was that an Act of Parliament had conferred on the Board of Admiralty power to dispose of the property in that way. But that was not the question. The real question was, not whether they had the power, but whether they had a right to exercise their power in that particular manner. He had looked into the Acts of Parliament which regulated the powers of the Admiralty with reference to Greenwich Hospital, and throughout those Acts it appeared that the Lords of the Admiralty were trustees of a charitable fund, which charity partly resulted from grants made by the nation, and partly from private benefactors, and consisted both of lands and personal property. It was vested in the hands of the Admiralty, as trustees, for the exclusive use and benefit of Greenwich Hospital. In the Act of Parliament in which the trust of the former Commissioners was vested in the Lords of the Admiralty, he had found over and over again the expression—

"Vested in the Lords of the Admiralty in trust for Majesty, her heirs, and successors, for the exclusive use and benefit of Greenwich Hospital."

When, by the Act of 1865, the Lords of the Admiralty became trustees of that charity they were bound to administer the trust in the same way as anyone else, for the exclusive benefit of the aged seamen and marines who were entitled thereto. In 1869 another Act was passed, giving the Lords of the Admiralty additional powers. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for a private institution to have borne these heavy charges, and have paid a heavy rent in addition. The statement made by his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Magniac), that the buildings were taken over by the Naval College under an arrangement to surrender them at any time, was received with a smile by the Committee; but it was, nevertheless, a substantial condition. He would venture to say that it would be unwise on the part of the Government to let these buildings under any other condition, for they would certainly be required in the event of a war to provide hospital accommodation. No private institution under such a condition would be prepared to pay a heavy rent for these buildings. He only knew one way in which a private individual could have paid a rent of £4,000 a-year for the property. The only possible way of realizing a rateable value on the very extensive piece of ground now occupied by these noble national buildings at Greenwich would have been to pull them down and convert the site to some utilitarian or manufacturing purposes. Such a course necessarily was not open to the Government. It had been said it was inconsistent with the purposes of Greenwich that this building should be occupied as a Naval College; but in the original deed of gift he found that, among the various objects for which Greenwich was founded, the improvement of navigation was specifically mentioned. He ventured, therefore, to say that the location of a Naval College in Greenwich was not at all inconsistent with the original objects of the foundation. Perhaps he might be permitted to remind hon. Members who took a deep interest in seamen of the arrangement carried into effect since the year 1868. At that time the building bore a certain monastic character. It was not at all popular with seamen, and there were no less than 1,310 vacancies in the Hospital. New arrangements were then made. Those arrangements had been fully explained with reference to the aged pensioners, and he need not go into it again; but he must remind the Committee, after what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price), that it was originally intended that the number of out-pensions should be 5,000 with, he believed, a provision for the maintenance of 600 aged seamen in the Infirmary;

but under the arrangements made by the late Administration, which restricted the maximum amount of Greenwich pensions to 2s. 6d. per day, the number of out-pensions had been raised from 5,000 to 7,500. The sum of £20,000 had been especially devoted to an infirmary for helpless men, who were ineligible to Greenwich, and who preferred a special pension to hospital treatment. Again, he would remind the Committee that the age for the extra pension had been reduced from 70 to 65; and, further, that men eligible for Greenwich were accommodated in naval hospitals, Greenwich paying for their maintenance. Among other benefits lately conferred, 200 daughters of seamen and marines were now maintained in schools, and educational grants of £20 per year were made to 50 children of distressed and deceased non-commissioned officers. A year's pay was given to the widows of seamen who were actually killed in action or drowned, in addition, as he believed, to any charge which was borne by the Naval Estimates. The number of children of seamen and marines in the school had been increased from 800 to 1,000; while, with regard to the income, by judicious sales of estates and investments, it had been increased from £146,000 in 1865 to £159,000 in 1880. Practically, the whole expenditure from the funds of Greenwich was spent in favour of the seamen as distinguished from the officers of the Navy. He ventured to say every change which had been made in the administration of the Greenwich funds, and in the application of its income, had been changes entirely for the benefit of the seamen. He could only promise his hon. and learned Friend and those who had urged the subject on the consideration of the Government that attention should be assiduously given to the subject. They had every desire to make this naval monument of the national gratitude to seamen a source of still greater advantage.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he would not detain the Committee by going over the various details of this question; but, as it was one which greatly affected his own constituents, he must be pardoned for saying a few words upon it. He thought the arguments of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Magniac) showed conclusively how right his hon. and learned Friend (Mr.

reason for putting that rent on was this. Not only was the whole of the Hospital taken for naval purposes and used as a Naval College, but a house let at £65 a-year was also taken over for use as an infirmary, and the charity was, therefore, deprived of that amount of rent. Previous also to 1873, when this arrangement was made, the cashier lived in the Hospital, and enjoyed the use of the buildings. When the whole of the buildings were utilized as a College, that man was turned out, and the Hospital had to find him another house. He had to be accommodated with a house rented at £45 a-year. Therefore, as the Hospital directly lost £60 a-year, and had to pay £45 a-year, through having to find accommodation outside for their officer, he thought it only just that the country should pay an additional £100 a-year to Greenwich Hospital funds. In making that arrangement, he never contemplated that the £100 a-year was an adequate rental for the use of the whole of the College buildings. It had been stated that the sum expended by the country for repairs upon the Hospital buildings was equivalent to a rental, and that statement was attributed to him. He certainly did not say so. The annual expenditure upon repairs might be put at £2,000 a-year; but it was spent not only in repairs, but upon internal alterations for the purposes of the College. The rental of £100 a-year was only given as an equivalent for annual rents of which the Hospital had been deprived. He must say, so far as the general question was concerned, that if the Naval College had the use of these buildings, the Hospital was receiving no money from the State in lieu of them. He thought, however, it should not be forgotten that these buildings belonged to the Charity, and not to the State.

MR. MAGNIAC said, with regard to the rent which had been paid for the use of the Hospital buildings, or rather the equivalent for rent, the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gorst) had informed the Committee that the Trustees had the power to do as they liked with the buildings. But that was not so; the right of the Trustees to deal with the buildings was absolutely and precisely regulated by the original grant of that Charity and by the Act of 1869. It would be found stated in the Report of the Committee of 1868 that originally these buildings were a donation to the sailors of this country. They were given on the terms that the buildings were to be used wholly and solely for the reception of sailors unable to follow their calling. There was no right in anyone to let the buildings; they were absolutely and strictly limited to the receiving of disabled seamen. When it was found that the Hospital no longer served its purpose by giving sailors the benefit which in olden times they received from it, it was considered by the Government of the day that a re-arrangement of these buildings might be made. The Government accordingly brought in a Bill laying down the terms on which the buildings were to be used; and, for the first time, the right of leasing them was granted. In the Bill, as originally brought in, power was given to the Government to make any use of the buildings; and it was contemplated that they should be used for public, charitable, or any use connected with the Public Service. When the question was discussed in the House, some hon. Members took considerable interest in the question; and the result of their efforts was that words were inserted in the Act which limited the use of the buildings to the Naval Service of the country or any Department of the Government, or to any person who had been engaged in the Naval Service of the country. That was the outside limit of the power of the Government given by the Act. It had been stated in this debate that the Government were bound to procure the best terms that could be got in the market for these buildings. Everyone knew that trustees were bound by the terms of their trust, and that there was, consequently, no power in the Government to go into the open market and let these buildings to the first-comer. The rent was stated in the House to have been fixed upon that basis. These buildings were of a very extensive character. They were a great architectural ornament to the River; and it was self-evident that if the Government had to provide for a Naval College only, it would not have erected an edifice which cost between £3,000 and £5,000 a-year for rent. The amount spent for repairs alone on Greenwich Hospital was very large. If the buildings had been unoccupied, and had been applied to no other purpose, the cost of the repairs

would have fallen upon the Charity; and the funds of the Charity would, therefore, have been diminished by the sum of £2,000 to £4,000 a-year. The Act dealing with Greenwich Hospital was debated very strenuously in the House, and great stress was laid by Gentlemen interested in the question upon the necessity of the buildings being always available for the use of the Navy at any moment. It was, therefore, provided by the Act that if the Government chose to call upon the occupants of the Hospital buildings to turn out, they must do so, in order that accommodation might be provided for sailors on the occurrence of an emergency. [Laughter.] The necessity for that provision was felt at the time because, shortly before, owing to a calamity, there was no place for the accommodation of a number of disabled seamen. It might be proved that the rateable value of the Hospital buildings was £8,000 a-year, while the real rent of the premises might not exceed £4,000 a-year. The rateable value was the value of the building well let, and with security of occupation from year to year unfurnished. But the rent of a building well let from year to year, unfurnished, was very different from the rent of buildings the occupants of which might be turned out at a moment's notice. The Government did not occupy these buildings unfurnished from year to year; but their occupation was strictly limited to the terms of the Act, which were that the whole of the buildings of the Hospital and their appurtenances should be available for the reception of sailors, if the Government should consider it necessary. The Act of Parliament was carefully considered, and in a case of great emergency power was given to re-occupy them at once for the purpose of sailors. The point which he wished particularly to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was this—that in connection with the arrangements for Greenwich Hospital the sum of £4,000 was given as compensation to merchant seamen for the Greenwich Sixpence. The diversion of the Greenwich Sixpence Fund was the greatest hardship ever inflicted on any body of men. Seamen were made to contribute through their wages to it; and when they wanted relief they were told that they had contributed their money for the purpose of seamen engaged not in the Merchant

Service, but in the Naval Service of the country. If the hon. Gentleman would increase the amount granted for that purpose, he (Mr. Magniac) should be very glad. If the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) could manage to get that amount increased, he would be doing a great service to the unfortunate contributors to that fund, many of whom were still living. In regard to the rent paid by Government for the use of the Greenwich Hospital buildings, taking into consideration the terms of the trust and the large expenditure which was paid for repairs, and that they could be turned out at a moment's notice, he did not think that the terms they were at present holding were unfair to the Charity.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that the hon. Member who had last spoken (Mr. Magniac) had proved that the Admiralty had, as trustees of the Hospital, let the buildings worth £4,000 for £100 a-year. It was said, when the bargain was examined, it would not be found that such was the case. But here were buildings, which it must be allowed were worth £4,000 a-year, and for them the magnificent sum of £100, and £6 additional a-year was paid, and which were used for the purpose of instruction in fortification. He did not hear from the hon. Member for Bedford one word which militated against the position they had assumed upon this question. He should like to hear from the Government who made this bargain which was spoken of. What were its terms? Did they make it as Trustees, or as First Lords of the Admiralty, or in what position were they when they made it? What right had they to make any bargain? A powerful Government forced this confiscation upon the seamen and marines, and upon the country. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), like every other hon. Member representing a Dockyard constituency, felt very strongly upon the subject; for the Naval Service at the present moment considered that it had been defrauded of its rights. If the Act of Parliament prevented the Admiralty from letting the property advantageously, then let the Trustees apply for further powers as other Trustees would do; but so long as it occupied buildings worth £4,000 a-year for a rent of £100, it would be committing a very great iniquity. £4,000 would form a very large addition to the funds for the benefit of seamen and marines. It was not to be expected that the Government would increase the pensions—which were at present in many cases very inadequate—but he trusted that an end would be put to an arrangement that never ought to have taken place.

MR. CHILDERS said, that what happened in 1864 and 1865 was this—In 1864 Greenwich Hospital was in a most unsatisfactory condition. In that year an adjustment was proposed which was completed in 1865. A certain limited number of men were kept in a great monastery at an enormous expense; and it was thought that, instead of keeping up that unsatisfactory system, it would be better to give them the option of taking certain pensions, and to apply the balance of the funds of the Hospital, which increased from year to year, in age pensions to seamen commencing at the age of 55 and going on to the age of 70. That was the rough outline of the scheme. But after five or six years experience it was found to be so unsatisfactory that a second process was gone through. A large number of the people who were in the Hospital originally, had gone out, except some two or three pensioners who had not taken advantage of the arrangement, because they could not find their families. It was not right to say that the Act was forced through Parliament, for it was unanimously supported by both sides. It was decided to close Greenwich as a Hospital altogether, and some of the pensioners who were subject to disease were transported to the Naval Hospitals at Portsmouth and Devonport, and the rest left the Hospital under arrangements of a liberal character. The question then arose, what could be done with the buildings? In the arrangements with respect to the Hospital the public was put to a very large expense indeed. All the men in the Hospital received pensions from the funds of the country, and when they were turned out of the Hospital they received large pensions from the Hospital funds. As they died off all the funds of the Hospital were entirely applied to the ordinary pensions of seamen. The public had been charged, in consequence of the arrangement which had been made with regard to the Hospital, to the extent of from £15,000 to £20,000 a-year. In addition to that a sum was granted to merchant seamen. Those arrangements entailed a very large charge upon the public. The pensions of a large body of seamen who would have been in Greenwich Hospital were charged upon the public, and it was only fair that the arrangements should be in every respect carried out. On the one hand an adjustment was made of the payments by the public, and as a smaller sum was paid by the Charity it was arranged that the Hospital should be available for the purposes of the Government. It was provided by the Act that the Hospital buildings should be available for naval purposes without charge; but that if used for any other Government purpose the Government should pay rent for it. These were the terms that were made. The bargain was that the buildings should be absolutely at the disposal of the Government. There was no reason for saying that the arrangement which was made was unfair to Greenwich Hospital. His hon. Friend had stated that if some fair arrangement were made it would enable pensions and pay to be increased. That was not so, for the charge was entirely upon the funds of the nation. All he would say was this—that the bargain was intended to be a fair one between the public and the Hospital, and he thought he had correctly stated its nature.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, that perhaps hon. Members who were present were rather puzzled to discover why such a noise should be made about £100, the rent paid by Government for the Greenwich Hospital buildings. His hon. Friends were not able to take the advice of the hon. Member for Galway, and raise this question some years ago, because it was only within the last few years that circumstances had made it necessary to re-open the question of the administration of the affairs of Greenwich Hospital. The facts were that a large number of seamen had been deprived of the pension from Greenwich Hospital which they had been in the habit of looking forward to. Two years ago an Order in Council was passed limiting the amount of pension a man might receive to the sum of 2s. 6d. a-day from all sources, so that all seamen in receipt of a naval pension of 2s. 6d. a-day were henceforth not entitled to the original question. That was simply the sufficiency of the rent which appeared in the Estimates. The explanation given from the Treasury Bench as to the arrangements made with Greenwich Hospital, and the statements made as to the amount paid for rates and maintenance, seemed to him to show that this was a very fair sum; for besides the £100 in the Estimates there was paid in rates and in upholding the building, £4,500; the rates amounted to £2,000, and the expenditure in maintenance of the buildings to £2,500; so that virtually the rent was £4,600 a-year. That was a fairly adequate rental. They could not expect to get such a rent as would be a sufficient return on the capitalized value of these buildings. £20,000 a-year would not be sufficient for that. The question really was, what might it be supposed these buildings would produce in the market if put into it for any such purpose as the nation could offer them for? He could not conceive that if let for any purpose for which the country could allow the buildings to be used they would yield more than £4,600. He therefore thought the objection was untenable.

MR. GORST said, that the answers of the Members of the Government were not so satisfactory to him as they appeared to be to the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Dick-Peddie). Persons who had experience in Parliament could tell by the mode in which a Minister answered a question whether he himself was satisfied with the answer he was giving. He was sure that many hon. Members would have seen that the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. T. Brassey) knew he had a bad case, and was trying to make the most of it. He (Mr. Gorst) understood from the remarks of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Dick-Peddie) that he considered these magnificent buildings were only worth £100 a-year. Was it reasonable to suppose, for one moment, that they were not worth more than that? Because, if they were not, it would be the duty of the Lords of the Admiralty to bring in a Bill to enable the site to be sold, so that some use might be made of it, and that it might bring in more to the funds of the Hospital. He was unable to understand whether the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Magniac) was pleased with the present arrangement or not. If it was the hon. Member's desire to advance the interest of the seamen, he (Mr. Gorst) did not see how he could think the present use of the buildings satisfactory. The hon. Member seemed to be surprised that they, in 1880, were not acquainted with the understandings entered into by the House of Commons which sat in 1869. Of course, he (Mr. Gorst) was aware, in the Act there was a clause requiring that the buildings should be available for the purpose of a naval hospital when required. But the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Childers) really could not seriously suppose that there was the slightest chance of the Government being ever required to turn those buildings into a hospital again.

MR. CHILDERS said, that in the event of a great naval war, the first thing the Board of Admiralty would do would be to move in that matter and take possession of Greenwich Hospital.

MR. GORST said, he would then ask the Committee, whether the risk of a naval war, or of one or two naval actions, was really a practical consideration which should diminish the value annually of this building? For his part, he could not see how it could affect the value of the occupation of the building. He thought that the clause in the Act did not interfere with the real value of the property. Therefore, he felt sure that the Members of the Government considered that in that short discussion it had clearly been made out that the £100 was not an adequate rent, and that a much greater sum ought to be inserted in the Estimates of next year. He hoped that the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. T. Brassey) would look into the matter, and that he would be able to induce the Treasury to consent to an adequate sum being put down next year for Greenwich Hospital rent. If the Treasury did not consent to do that, he (Mr. Gorst) should next year bring forward the matter in such a form that he should be able to take the sense of the House upon it.

MR. E. J. REED said, that the present, he thought, was an opportune time for making the few remarks he had to make upon a slightly different subject. Therefore, he begged leave to call the attention of the Board of Admiralty to that subject for a moment. In the last debate on the Navy Estimates in the late the boys who are now entering the Service know that in future years they must not expect to get so large a sum from Greenwich as their predecessors, and tell them the reason; but do not deprive the men who have been expecting this as a right of the sum to which they are justly entitled." His right hon. Friend below him, in answering him on this subject a short time ago—and hon. Members of the present Government, he had no doubt, would make the same excuse—had said that these pensions were given at the discretion of the Admiralty. He did not like that phrase, "the discretion of the Admiralty" at all. Of course, they were given at the discretion of the Admiralty. No man could bring an action against the Government for deprivation of pension or anything of that sort; but, nevertheless, the men had just as much right to look forward to the receipt of the Greenwich pension as to the receipt of the naval pension. It was impossible to make a legal question of this at all. Probably some Members of the House had heard the old Arab story of the rich man, the pauper, and the Cadi. A pauper used to sit at the gate of the city, and every day a rich man, in passing him, dropped a coin into his hand. He did that for many years, until at last it became a regular pension for the beggar; but one fine day the rich man refused to give him the penny any more, and then the beggar went to the Cadi and an action was brought, and the Cadi said that as this sum had been given regularly to the beggar the rich man must continue to give it. He did not hold that there was an actual analogy between the two cases, because Greenwich Hospital was no longer to be looked on as a charity, and also because, as he had said, this could not be made a legal question; but still he did think that the Government should look at it in a spirit of equity. Greenwich Hospital was one of the grandest monuments of our naval greatness, and anything which might be done to tamper with the question and deprive the seamen of what they had justly earned, and always looked forward to, was not only to them a very great grievance, but would, he believed, be found a very great mistake.

MR. T. BRASSEY said, the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) and his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Devonport (Captain Price) had pleaded the cause of the seamen with great earnestness; but he (Mr. Brassey) yielded to no Member of that Committee in sympathy with the seamen, and he was quite sure that feeling was abundantly shared by every Naval Administration which had had to consider the question of pensions and the administration of the Greenwich Funds. He might remind the hon. and gallant Member who had last spoken that these subjects were under the consideration of his right hon. Friends opposite for more years than the present Government had passed weeks in Office; and the presumption therefore would be that the regulations enforced during that time were regulations which they deemed fair and considerate towards the seamen. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) challenged the arrangement which had been made with reference to the sum to be paid for the Naval College; but he (Mr. Brassey) might explain that the amount for the maintenance of those buildings when unoccupied was estimated at £2,500 per year, while when they were occupied under the old arrangements as an asylum for aged seamen the cost for maintenance was £6,000. He would further remind the Committee that, in former days, when the seamen were kept at Greenwich, the rates which were at that time paid for Government property were fixed upon a very low scale. If the seamen had remained in occupation of Greenwich Hospital as an asylum, the buildings would not have escaped the present rule as to contribution to the rates by way of bounty, and the Hospital, as distinct from the schools, would have paid £2,000 a-year towards the local rate of Greenwich. Therefore, the gain to the funds by the present arrangement was not less than about £9,000 a-year. His hon. and learned Friend had said that these buildings were worth at least £4,000 a-year. He would remind him that if those buildings were occupied as a private institution, or as a private establishment, there would be a charge for maintenance of at least £2,500, a contribution to the local rates of £2,000, and besides that an expenditure, as he understood, of about £600 a-year for gas. He would venture to say, therefore, that it would have been impossible

cerely trusted that the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) would bring that matter up in a forcible manner next year, and in such time as to have ample opportunity for discussing it, so that it should not be hurried over as it was that night, in order that the rights of seamen and marines might be less curtailed than they were at present with reference to that subject.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, he wished to ask, whether it was intended to bring on the Vote for Greenwich Hospital that night, because he intended to move a reduction of the Vote?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, it was his intention to bring on that Vote. He hoped the House would not think it necessary to prolong that discussion. The matter had been fully discussed, and the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had had full opportunity for placing his views upon the subject before them. He begged to observe that the hon. and learned Member could not move to increase the Vote; the only proper way would be for him to raise the question by Motion, and he had understood that the hon. and learned Member intended to do so next Session. He hoped he would be satisfied with the answers that had been given. He would only add, with reference to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), that when the arrangements were made in 1867 there was an understanding, as explained by the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), that if the buildings were required for naval purposes, there should be no rent chargeable to Naval Votes. Again, when the buildings were taken over for the purposes of a Naval College in 1872, the Greenwich Hospital Fund was relieved of the charges for repairing, which amounted to some £2,000 a-year; it was also relieved of rates of about £2,000 a-year, and charges for police of about £750. Therefore, practically, Greenwich Hospital was a gainer by the transaction to the extent of near £5,000 a-year. He would not go more into detail, as the whole question would, no doubt, be raised by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham next Session.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he thought the whole question might be well considered; but it had been pointed out that that consideration could not take place this year.

If hon. Gentlemen opposite thought they could get a larger rental for the use of Greenwich Hospital, as a contribution to the funds of that Hospital, he should not object; but he could not help feeling that a large charge was imposed upon the public funds under the present system. He was not satisfied that Greenwich Hospital would have been chosen as the site for a Naval College, had it not been for certain concurrent circumstances which induced the Government of the day to appropriate the building for that institution. For his own part, he was rather inclined to the belief that another site would have been better. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Cardiff (Mr. E. J. Reed) had referred to him (Mr. W. H. Smith) with reference to the engagements entered into last year with regard to Reports of the different departments of the Admiralty. He was glad to say that before he left Office those engagements had been carried out as far as he was able to do so. He fully concurred with the hon. Gentleman that the public should be informed of the operations of those several departments of the Service, and more especially in the case of such a department as the Hydrographic department.

MR. PULESTON said, he hoped the subject would not be discussed with any misunderstanding. Was he to understand that the Board of Admiralty had, at present, no intention whatever of altering the existing systems, and that the remarks which had fallen from the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. T. Brassey) were not the views of his Colleagues. He thanked the Civil Lord for his satisfactory speech, and still hoped the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) would be able to fall into the same groove. As far as he (Mr. Puleston) was concerned, he considered that both seamen and marines had been hardly and unjustly dealt with in more ways than one, and other matters relating to various classes in the Dockyards should receive attention. Therefore, he did hope that his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty would at least give an opportunity for discussing the question to those hon. Members who represented constituencies such as he did. More time should be given too for discussing the questions affecting the Engineers of the Gorst) was in going into this matter in Committee. If he (Baron Henry De Worms) understood him aright, Greenwich Hospital was exclusively established for the purpose of maintaining a certain number of sailors, whose services to their country entitled them to similar privileges to those enjoyed by the pensioners in Chelsea Hospital. Admitting that to be a fact, they could not have a stronger argument in favour of all that had been said by his hon. and learned Friend. If this institution had been established, as it undoubtedly was, for the purpose of affording an asylum for those who had served their country well, surely they were the only persons entitled to any benefits derived from it, and adequate provision ought to be made to keep the scale of pensions they would deserve at the full amount to which they were entitled. His hon. Friend the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. T. Brassey) said that extra pensions had been granted out of the fund to pensioners of the Naval Reserve and others; but if the fund was inadequate to meet the just claims of those to whom by right pensions were due, all such claims should unquestionably have been satisfied in full before the others were considered at all. It was simply an attempt to make a saving for the benefit of the Imperial Exchequer at the cost of these deserving men. He brought this question some time ago shortly before the House, and the answer the Government gave was that the funds were not sufficient to provide pensions for the whole of the pensioners; but he took it that was simply a matter of right. Either these men who would have lived in the Hospital had a right to live there, or they were clearly entitled to compensation if they did not live there. That was the question, divested of all technicality. When his hon. Friend said there were not sufficient funds, the answer was received with a considerable amount of dissatisfaction on the part of those who were entitled to receive the pensions. On this question it seemed to him that the statement of the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price) was strictly to the point. To withhold these pensions was simply to save money for the Imperial Exchequer.

MR. T. BRASSEY reminded the hon. Member that the number of pensioners had been increased from 5,000 to 7,500.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he could not help saying that these buildings were undoubtedly let at a very small and inadequate rental, and much smaller than would be easily obtainable. The fact, therefore, that a large number of pensions had been given fell to the ground; because if this increased rent was obtained there would be enough for increased pensions to the men who were entitled to them. This was really a most important question; because these men had passed their lives in the service of their country. A contract was made with them by which they were morally and legally entitled to live in Greenwich Hospital; or, failing that, they were entitled to a pension in compensation for not living there. He trusted Her Majesty's Government would see fit to introduce some measure by which this injustice and hardship to men who had done so well in the service of their country should be once and for ever put an end to.

MR. GOURLEY said, so far as he had heard anything of the debate, he wished to say a word on behalf of the seamen of the Mercantile Marine. They were deprived of what was known as the "Greenwich Sixpence," which amounted to something like £63,000 per annum. There was something like 40,000 of these seamen who considered they were entitled to receive a larger amount of pension than they were now receiving. What he asked was, that Government would consider the desirability of affording to all seamen the pension which was now awarded. ["Order, order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: I must direct the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that the Vote under discussion is the Scientific Vote, and the matter to which he is referring comes under a different Vote altogether—namely, that for Greenwich Hospital.

MR. GOURLEY said, he begged pardon; so far as he had heard the debate hon. Members had been discussing the question of pensions.

THE CHAIRMAN said, what had been discussed was the question of the rent for Greenwich Hospital, and the diminution caused to pensioners by the low rent paid.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE thought the Committee had wandered very much from

cerely trusted that the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) would bring that matter up in a forcible manner next year, and in such time as to have ample opportunity for discussing it, so that it should not be hurried over as it was that night, in order that the rights of seamen and marines might be less curtailed than they were at present with reference to that subject.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, he wished to ask, whether it was intended to bring on the Vote for Greenwich Hospital that night, because he intended to move a reduction of the Vote?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, it was his intention to bring on that Vote. He hoped the House would not think it necessary to prolong that discussion. The matter had been fully discussed, and the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had had full opportunity for placing his views upon the subject before them. He begged to observe that the hon. and learned Member could not move to increase the Vote; the only proper way would be for him to raise the question by Motion, and he had understood that the hon. and learned Member intended to do so next Session. He hoped he would be satisfied with the answers that had been given. He would only add, with reference to the remarks of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), that when the arrangements were made in 1867 there was an understanding, as explained by the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), that if the buildings were required for naval purposes, there should be no rent chargeable to Naval Votes. Again, when the buildings were taken over for the purposes of a Naval College in 1872, the Greenwich Hospital Fund was relieved of the charges for repairing, which amounted to some £2,000 a-year; it was also relieved of rates of about £2,000 a-year, and charges for police of about £750. Therefore, practically, Greenwich Hospital was a gainer by the transaction to the extent of near £5,000 a-year. He would not go more into detail, as the whole question would, no doubt, be raised by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham next Session.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he thought the whole question might be well considered; but it had been pointed out that that consideration could not take place this year.

If hon. Gentlemen opposite thought they could get a larger rental for the use of Greenwich Hospital, as a contribution to the funds of that Hospital, he should not object; but he could not help feeling that a large charge was imposed upon the public funds under the present system. He was not satisfied that Greenwich Hospital would have been chosen as the site for a Naval College, had it not been for certain concurrent circumstances which induced the Government of the day to appropriate the building for that institution. For his own part, he was rather inclined to the belief that another site would have been better. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Cardiff (Mr. E. J. Reed) had referred to him (Mr. W. H. Smith) with reference to the engagements entered into last year with regard to Reports of the different departments of the Admiralty. He was glad to say that before he left Office those engagements had been carried out as far as he was able to do so. He fully concurred with the hon. Gentleman that the public should be informed of the operations of those several departments of the Service, and more especially in the case of such a department as the Hydrographic department.

MR. PULESTON said, he hoped the subject would not be discussed with any misunderstanding. Members who represented constituencies such as he did. More time should be given too for discussing the questions affecting the Engineers of the Parliament, he drew the attention of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith), then First Lord of the Admiralty, to the disadvantages they were under in not being furnished periodically with the results of the operations of the several departments of the Admiralty. He would take, for example, the Hydrographic department. As far as that House was concerned it was in utter ignorance of the proceedings of that department. He was glad to receive an assurance last year from the right hon. Gentleman, who was good enough to say, in reply to his appeal, that he would take into consideration the propriety of giving annual Reports of those several departments. He would now take the opportunity of asking whether the present Government intended to carry out the promise made by their Predecessors, and furnish the House with the operations of those departments. He felt sure, if they would do so, more confidence would be placed in those who had the administration of those departments; because, since remarks had been made on that subject in the House, there had been a discussion in the public Press, attacking the proceedings of the steam and hydrographic departments; and it was probable that those departments would be brought into disrepute, simply because that House was kept in total ignorance of their operations. An officer lately in the employ of the Government read a Paper not long ago, and in that Paper he pointed out certain deficiencies in our Service. He (Mr. E. J. Reed) would like to ask the Government, instead of giving the results of the operations of the Hydrographic department to officers, representatives of societies, and representatives of periodicals, to enable them to earn money by writing articles out of information required by that House, whether they would not give to the House an annual Report of the Hydrographic and other minor departments? He asked the question, because he believed that would bring such a department as the Hydrographic department into better relations with that House and the country, by exhibiting the valuable work which they did. He did not wish for a debate to be raised upon the point; but he hoped that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty would take it into consideration, as he was sure that such annual Reports would be of material advantage to that House.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he did not recollect what passed last year. Perhaps, however, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith) would remember. For his own part, he would endeavour to carry out the wishes of his hon. Friend (Mr. E. J. Reed) as far as possible, inasmuch as they were most reasonable. Instructions had been given for those Reports to be laid on the Table in future, and he should be happy to give every facility, so that the fullest information should be afforded.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he was sorry the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. E. J. Reed) had referred to the Reports of departments, as he did not think himself that the question of Greenwich Hospital was exhausted. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Childers) really could never wish them, in any way, to rely on the bargain of which he spoke. The right hon. Gentleman asked them to take that speech as a standard to apply to the compromise that had been effected. But the speech to which he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) referred seemed to have been delivered several years ago, and which nobody, so far as he was aware, recollected, and which did not appear to have been reported. He would call their attention to the fact that since that time the right hon. Gentleman had not only been in Opposition, but had also been in other departments of the Service; and it appeared to him rather unreasonable to refer to that to explain the reasons why seamen and marines were deprived of a fair revenue for that valuable property. The question was, in fact, greater than many hon. Members supposed. They had, in fact, the Lords of the Admiralty acting in two capacities—as trustees for the aged seamen and marines on the one hand, and as Lords of the Admiralty on the other. They took the money of their cœtui que trustant and put it into the pockets of the Admiralty. £100 a-year was clearly an inadequate rent: the buildings were assessed at from £4,000 to £5,000 a-year, and they were asked to say they considered £100 sufficient rent. He thought that was unworthy of the Admiralty, acting in their capacity of Lords of the Admiralty, to make a profit out of that property. He sincerely trusted that the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) would bring that matter up in a forcible manner next year, and in such time as to have ample opportunity for discussing it, so that it should not be hurried over as it was that night, in order that the rights of seamen and marines might be less curtailed than they were at present with reference to that subject.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, he wished to ask, whether it was intended to bring on the Vote for Greenwich Hospital that night, because he intended to move a reduction of the Vote?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, it was his intention to bring on that Vote. He hoped the House would not think it necessary to prolong that discussion. The matter had been fully discussed, and the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had had full opportunity for placing his views upon the subject before them. Therefore, he did hope that his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty would at least give an opportunity for discussing the question to those hon. Members who represented constituencies such as he did. More time should be given too for discussing the questions affecting the Engineers of the Royal Navy to which he had already referred.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that his hon. Friend the Civil Lord of the Admiralty had given assurance that the matter should receive consideration, but that he could not hold out any expectation of a higher rent being given. The whole question would be raised next year, and, no doubt, there would then be ample opportunity for discussion. He could not, of course, say what would ultimately be done in the matter.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, that inasmuch as the question of rent of Greenwich Hospital could not be discussed fully this year, he should defer his remarks on the subject. But he thought the grievances of Greenwich pensioners were such that they ought to be considered immediately. He should, therefore, move to reduce the Vote by £1,500 when it came on.

MR. GORST said, he understood the hon. Gentleman the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. T. Brassey) to say that the question, whether or no the rent paid for the use of the Hospital was or was not adequate, would be carefully considered by the Board of Admiralty. Did he rightly understand that the Board of Admiralty would abide by that adequacy which had been the subject of discussion there for the last hour?

MR. MAGNIAC said, that the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken had reminded him that he (Mr. Magniac) was a Member for an inland town. He was quite aware of that, and, as a Member for an inland town, he had to consider how much rent should be paid for a Naval College as well as other hon. Gentlemen, and also to consider whether the country might not, perhaps, be paying—although the rent might be inadequate in a given instance—too large a sum for the purpose. There were, no doubt, other Colleges that might be at the disposal of the country for a similar or even a less figure. When the hon. and learned Member said that the rent was only £100 a-year, he (Mr. Magniac) did not quite see how he made that out. If the actual rent paid was £100, the charges connected with the place were so heavy that it brought the sum up to £4,000. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members said "Oh, oh!" but if they examined his statement, they would see that if £2,000 was required for repairs, and

£2,000 for rates, and another £100 for rent, the total was over the sum he had named. His conviction was that the public were paying, at least, £6,000 practically for that building—he was certain that it was not a great deal less than that—when for a third of that sum he was sure they might get a more suitable place for the purposes of a Naval College. He thought it was doing no good service to make such statements as he had heard that night, that seamen were defrauded of their rights. Such misrepresentations would, on the other hand, he was convinced, do an infinite dis-service to those men. There could be no doubt that whatever had been done by that House had been done to their benefit and advantage. An hon. Member opposite had complained of the withholding of pensions for want of funds; but he must know that pensions to 7,500 men were now given, 2,000 of which had recently been added, principally, he believed, because Greenwich Hospital was closed. It could not be denied that there had been a very considerable increase during the last 18 years. Hon. Gentlemen should remember that, in doing service to their constituents, they ought not to do injustice to other taxpayers of the country. He was fully convinced that the rent paid for the building, taking into consideration the taxes and incidental charges, was excessive; and, setting aside other considerations, he believed that a more suitable place could be obtained for a less expenditure.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he should like to explain to the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Magniac) that the question was not one of charges on the property, but of rent. Inasmuch as the Government occupied a large building which belonged to seamen and marines, they surely ought to give a fair value for it. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had stated that there had been an understanding between the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War and that House with reference to that question; but they were unable to tax their memory with it, and it must be obvious that they could not accept a speech made many years ago as if it were a legal document. There had been, in fact, no understanding between the Admiralty and the House, but only between the Lords of the Admiralty as trustees and as administrators. Notwithstanding the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Magniac), he must say that there had been great hardship in depriving the men entitled of what was their due. He did trust that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty would give them an assurance that the most serious consideration would be given to the question. He, unfortunately, was not able to be present when the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. T. Brassey) had made his speech. It appeared that he had said the whole question would be considered, whereas the Secretary to the Admiralty had stated that the question of rent only would be taken into consideration. He should like to have a clear understanding upon that to place before his constituents, who had been run down by the hon. Member for Bedford, so that they might understand what they had to look to from the Board of Admiralty—that was, whether the whole question would be considered by them or not.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, he should like to make a few remarks in reply to those which fell from the hon. Member for Bedford.

THE CHAIRMAN: Do they relate to the Scientific Branch of the Navy?

CAPTAIN PRICE said, they would incidentally relate to that branch. The hon. Member had stated that the number of pensioners having been lately increased, the pensioners had little to complain of, and that that number now stood at 7,500. He (Captain Price) did not see how that affected the matter. All the men that received pensions were, of course, entitled to them; and he believed that not one of the seamen who had fulfilled the conditions which entitled them to receive the benefits of Greenwich Hospital had, until now, been debarred from receiving his pension when he reached the age of 55. The number of men having increased, the number of pensions was, of course, proportionately raised to 7,500 from 6,000, the number at which it stood previously. He wished it to be distinctly understood that the pensions had hitherto been invariably given to men who were actually entitled. He did not see, therefore, how that affected the matter they were discussing.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member seems to be referring to Pensions generally. The question before the Committee is for the Scientific Branch, and the question of pensions would properly be considered under the Vote for Greenwich Hospital.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, it appeared to him that the Government, by increasing that rent, would be only doing what was just in that matter.

LORD RAMSAY said, he trusted the Committee would pardon him for rising in order to call attention to the subject of the Britannia training ship.

MR. GORST said, he should like an answer to the question which had been put to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty.

LORD RAMSAY having risen to continue his remarks—

MR. GORST said, he rose to Order. He wished to know whether the noble Lord was in Order in then addressing the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price) had spoken on one side, and then the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Lord Ramsay) rose on the other. I called upon the noble Lord, who is perfectly in Order.

LORD RAMSAY said, that he trusted the Committee would pardon him if he rose before the Vote was taken, in order to call attention to the present system of entering and training officers in the Navy, of which the educational establishment on board H.M.S. Britannia formed only a part. He did so because, although the officers themselves, or, at least, a very large number of them, especially the best officers of the rising generation, were keenly alive to the defects of that system, it was not generally known to the outside world how thoroughly ill-conceived and badly organized that system was. Still less was it generally known how inferior in point of general education, and of professional training, especially as to the practical part of their profession, were the opportunities afforded to our own naval officers as compared with those enjoyed by the officers of the French, of the Russian, and especially of the American Navies. He must say that this was a matter about which he felt very strongly—very strongly indeed—so much so, that, although he did not mean, at least on the present occasion, to move the rejection of the Vote for the Britannia, he could not allow it to pass without troubling the Committee with some remarks on the general subject to which the Britannia belonged. It was because he had had unusual opportunities of informing himself upon the question, which really was one of the very first importance to the Navy, that he felt it his bounden duty to point out the very unsatisfactory state of things which existed at the present moment. He would not detain the Committee by quoting from Blue Books, nor even by going fully into the matter. He might, perhaps, do that at some future time. He would merely speak now from his own knowledge, and confine himself strictly to what he considered to be, or rather to what he knew were the fundamental errors of the present system. These were the system of entering officers by nomination, and the early age of that entry, and the ill-planned, ill-organized, and harassing life which young officers were compelled to lead during their four-and-a-half years' sea service as midshipmen. Though during that time they were compelled to work very hard, most of their work was of a very unimproving kind, and their time was so abominably misapplied that these four-and-a-half years were little better than wasted. First, as to the mode of entry, he must point out that the Navy, unlike the Army, did not get the pick of the intelligence of the country. Candidates for the Army were selected by competitive examination from the widest possible area—in fact, all who could produce certificates of character might compete for Army cadetships. Candidates for the Navy, on the contrary, underwent no competitive test whatever, and they were drawn from the small area of those whose political or professional influence was such as to enable them to procure nominations for cadetships. In other words, naval officers were selected by favour from a class, and the patronage was in the hands of the First Lord of the Admiralty. All who obtained nominations became officers, provided they passed the test examinations; thus it might fairly be presumed that the average material out of which the officers of the Navy were manufactured was intellectually of an inferior quality to that which was available for the Army, and which supplied cadets to Sandhurst and Woolwich. Whether that was so in point of fact was a question on which he expressed no opinion whatever.

Lord Ramsey

He was well aware that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith) fully appreciated the many objections to the nomination system, and that he was most anxious to abolish that system, both because it was difficult to obtain sufficient information about the candidates, and also because he found the distribution of patronage an almost intolerable nuisance. He believed the only, or the chief, reason why the right hon. Gentleman did not abolish nominations was, that he did not approve of competitive examination for boys of the tender age of 12 to 13½, the age at which the cadets now joined the training ship. And, no doubt, there was much to be said in favour of that view. But he thought, and he ventured to hope the Committee would agree with him, that to retain a system of patronage in the Service which, of all others, was the most truly national in every sense of the word, was a thing which ought not to be any longer allowed, no matter what difficulties stood in the way. That brought him to the second point to which he wished to call the attention of the Committee—namely, the age at which young officers began life on board ship. It was usually urged, by way of apology and defence, that unless officers entered very young, it was impossible that they should be reconciled to the hardship and confinement of ship life. To that he replied this was pure assumption, and he did not think there was any good ground for believing it to be true. He acknowledged that it was not uncommon to hear naval officers of experience say that if they had not entered the Service at an age when they knew nothing whatever of themselves, or of the world, they would never have joined the Navy at all; and therefore it was assumed, even by those who ought to know better, that unless officers were entered young, there would be great difficulty in obtaining officers at all. But that argument really told the other way, and he said that so long as they continued to enter boys at the present early age—12 to 13½—so long should they continue to enter a very large number whom nature never intended to become naval officers. What was most needed in selecting officers for the Navy was to secure personal fitness for a naval life. That was the one thing needful; secure that, and they might safely enter cadets very much later than they did at present. Without it, although by entering them young they might reconcile many men to ship life, who would otherwise never be able to endure it, they would never succeed in producing any really first-rate naval officers. Now, he was quite certain that they could not even pretend to secure this personal fitness, unless the age of entry was fixed at such a point as would give time for a boy's character to be more or less formed, so that he might be able to judge for himself whether or not a naval career was likely to suit him. He did not hesitate to assure the House that this early entry was, perhaps, the most mischievous and pernicious feature of the whole system. Why, what were the motives which induced boys at the age of 12 to 13 to join the Navy? During the time—nearly two years—that he was commander of the Britannia—by command—he made the acquaintance of some 350 cadets; and it was, of course, his business to know the boys individually as well as he could. Many of them were undoubtedly as fine and promising youths as could be wished, and full of enthusiasm for the Service. On the other hand, there were many who only entered the Navy in order to escape from school; whilst others—and these were a very considerable proportion—told him that they joined the Navy merely because their parents wished them to do so, and not from any wish of their own. Some few even went further than that, and told him they did not much like the Britannia, and were doubtful if they would like the Navy. In short, the facts proved exactly what might have been expected, that whilst they entered boys at 12 to 13½, they could have no guarantee of their personal fitness for the Navy. But that early age was mischievous in other ways. Nothing was gained in the long run, and much was lost by taking boys away from school, stopping their general education just as their minds were beginning to open, and setting them down to study narrow professional subjects, which they would learn in half the time if their minds were more fully developed. And that had so far been recognized that a very large portion of the time on board of the Britannia was now given up to general subjects, not only to elementary mathematics, such as Euclid, Algebra, Arithmetic, and Trigonometry, but to still more general subjects than those, such as History, French, and Geography, subjects which belonged to the curriculum of every school in the country. Thus, out of the total 28 hours per week during the first six months the boys were on board the Britannia, only five were given to professional subjects, such as seamanship and navigation, and 23 to the general subjects he had mentioned. During their second term, eight hours were given to professional subjects and 20 to general subjects; third and fourth terms, nine hours to professional and 19 to general subjects. He thought these figures showed very clearly that the Britannia was not merely a training ship in which technical and professional subjects only were taught, but a floating school for purposes of general education. It was a great expense to the country, and one of which he thought the House of Commons might fairly complain. At the same time, he must say that so long as the system of entering young officers almost during their childhood was continued, so long did he hope that that House would continue to sanction whatever was necessary for their general education. The Britannia itself was, no doubt, a very anomalous institution—a ship without masts, a mere hulk, in fact, on board of which nothing was taught that could not be taught both better and more economically on dry land. But although he thought the educational work now done by the Britannia could be better done, and much better done by a College on shore with proper models, and a properly rigged ship attached, he was not discussing that point now. He regarded it as merely one of detail, in comparison with those which he was endeavouring to submit to the Committee; for he thought that, so long as cadets were entered at the present early age, it mattered little whether they were trained in a floating hulk or in a College on shore. The mischief in either case would be about the same; for in both this early naval training would have the effect of destroying much originality of character, and of narrowing the minds of our future officers, by cutting short their general education, and taking them out of the world before they had had time to see anything of it. Forty or fifty years ago, there were reasons for entering officers as young as possible—reasons which no longer existed; first, because the hardships of sea life were in those days so great that it was really necessary for officers to begin young, in order to become inured to them; and, secondly, because practical seamanship was the one great professional necessity in the old days of sailing ships, and that was best acquired by practice and experience commencing from very early years. But now all this was changed; the hardships were now comparatively slight; whilst, as to seamanship, they not only did not expect or require so much of that peculiar skill in handling ships under sail alone, which was the pride of our officers in former days, but they now possessed a vast amount of knowledge of natural phenomena, embodied in the form of laws and rules, which greatly reduced in value the experience of any single life. Besides, sea service in these days of steam and iron-clad ships did not necessarily bring with it knowledge of seamanship; but seamanship could be taught like everything else, and it ought to be taught far more than it was. It could not be picked up in large iron-clads, and must be taught, if it was to be learnt. On the other hand, our officers were expected to acquire a very considerable amount of scientific knowledge. He maintained that a ship, especially a man-of-war, was just about the very worst place for study of any kind that could possibly be conceived; and he said that the original reasons for entering officers as young as possible having disappeared, it was purely mischievous to adhere to the practice. The only result was—on the one hand, to cause unnecessary expense to the country; and on the other, intellectual injury to the officers themselves. The third point—and it was the last with which he would trouble the Committee—was the anomalous and most unprofitable life that our young officers led during the four-and-a-half years which they spent as midshipmen on board a sea-going ship, from the time that they left the Britannia until they passed their examination for the rank of lieutenant. They were then in what he might call an embryo state of existence—half officer, half schoolboy. They kept regular watch both at sea and in harbour, and were generally on watch about six hours out of every 24. Most of that time, he was bound to say, was wasted, so far as they themselves were concerned; for their chief work when on watch, in these days of steam, was no longer to assist in working the ship, but to walk up and down, report certain times to the commanding officer, see the decks swept, and the ashes thrown overboard. Then they were attached to a division of guns, and to a company of small-arm men, in connection with which a great deal of work was imposed on them, which in the Army would be done by non-commissioned officers—such as taking clothes lists, slop lists, and hammock lists. That sort of work taught the boys nothing whatever. It only wasted their time, and prevented them doing other things. Lastly, in addition to all this, midshipmen were supposed to study under the Naval Instructor for some two hours every forenoon; but that study was very irregular. It not only had to give way to the routine of drills which were carried on in every man-of-war, but was subject to all the vicissitudes of wind and weather at sea. Besides, under the most favourable circumstances, it was not to be expected that a growing boy could study to much good purpose when he had a four hours' watch on deck during the previous night; and, according to the custom of the Service, he would have such a watch during three nights out of four. A midshipman was sometimes excused from taking his forenoon watch in order to go to school. In that case, he lost some of the experience to gain which was the chief object of his being sent to sea. In short, his official duties interfered sadly with his studies, whilst his schoolboy work took every leisure moment, and greatly reduced the knowledge he might otherwise gain by experience, if only he had leisure and opportunity for observation. A midshipman now-a-days really was a very hard-worked individual—that was to say, he had to spend much time in work; but most of it was of so unprofitable a kind that the gain to himself in professional knowledge was comparatively insignificant. In short, his time and labour were vilely misapplied; he could not combine, with advantage, the double character of officer and schoolboy. And it was vain to expect that he should. A very few able and ambitious boys, gifted with strong constitutions and physical energy, might succeed in doing so; but, generally speaking, the attempt had always failed, and he was quite sure that it always would fail. He felt that it was presumptuous, and certainly not wise, in a new Member to speak at such length in Committee as he had done. He was really ashamed of himself, and only hoped that the Committee would forgive him. The truth was that this question of naval education and naval training had long lain on his conscience. He felt very strongly about it; he knew it to be a matter which vitally affected the efficiency of the Navy, and, therefore, he had ventured to think it of such importance as to warrant his trespassing in some degree on the forbearance of the Committee; and he could only say that he was sincerely grateful for the kindness and indulgence by which he had been enabled to call attention to what certainly was by far the greatest blot in our naval administration, and a distinct source of naval weakness in the future. He had just one thing more to say, and that was that he hoped the present Board of Admiralty would not hesitate to go to the root of the matter. He hoped they would put a stop to the mischievous practice of entering children, and to the equally vicious system of entering them by nomination. He did not see why, in these days, officers of the Navy should be selected by favour from any privileged class; and he hoped that the present Board of Admiralty would get rid of the patronage, and would throw open the Navy, like the Army, to the best ability of the nation. He could assure the hon. Gentleman who represented the Board of Admiralty in that House that by taking up the whole question of naval education, and dealing with it as a whole—not in a fragmentary way, as hitherto, by tinkering first at one part, and then at another—now at the Britannia, and now at the College at Greenwich—he could assure him that by dealing with the question as a whole, and in a large and liberal spirit of common sense, as opposed to the narrow counsels of professional pedantry and prejudice, to which was mainly owing the many absurdities of the present system, he would be doing a new thing; and by doing it he would confer a very great benefit on the Navy of the future, and do more to strengthen it than if by one stroke of the pen he was to build 50 iron-clads.

MR. GORST said, he must congratulate the noble Lord who had just sat down (Lord Ramsay) on the patriotism and courage he had shown in bringing the subject of training officers for the Navy so fully before the attention of the Committee; and he was sure that the Committee must be glad that they had reported Progress at that stage on a former occasion, because otherwise they would have lost the advantage of the able and valuable speech which the noble Lord had delivered. He now desired to call the attention of the Committee to the cost of that education which had just been described. He was quite aware that no cost would be considered by the country too great to pay for the production of officers of the highest education for our Navy; but the noble Lord, who had had practical experience of the present system of education, had shown how extremely deficient that education was. It was now, therefore, opportune to call attention to its cost. He found from the Estimates that the expenses of the College amounted to £18,961, to which had to be added the charge for the pay of the officers employed in the direction of the College—namely, £18,071; making a total of £37,000 odd as the annual cost of the school-ship Britannia. He had not been able to find in any Return the number of boys on board the Britannia at one time; but he believed it never exceeded 120. He should, therefore, be giving a great advantage to the expenditure in assuming that the £37,000 was expended upon that number of boys. The result of it was that the cost of the education of each boy was £308 a-year, exclusive of clothing and other expenses defrayed by parents, an expense greater than the cost of education at the most expensive public school in the country. It was true that some part of this expense was recouped by the parents, who paid £98 a-year; but the expense to the country was upwards of £210 for each boy. Now, he could not help thinking that if the education was no better than had just been described, this was a very heavy sum for the country and the parents to be charged with. After the account given of the education on board the Britannia by the noble Lord, nothing which he (Mr. Gorst) could add would, perhaps, have very much weight with the Committee. But he had looked into the Report which gave the most recent information upon the subject that was open to the House of Commons, and from that he would give the Committee two extracts as specimens of the results of the system as regarded French and Latin. The Examiner reported, in the case of the former, that the accent, pronunciation, and conversational powers of the cadets was tolerably good, but that their grammar was exceedingly defective. They did not know how to make an agreement. They did not know how to distinguish the perfect from the participle. They did not know how to make use of the dictionary, for they frequently took the words given at random. Such was the result of the French examination. With regard to Latin, the Examiner reported that the translation of passages, both those which had been read during the term and those which the cadets had not previously seen, was very badly done. Hon. Members experienced in school management would be able to understand from these statements how shockingly bad must be the results which the Examiner had thus described. In defence of such a system, which was opposed to the practice of all other nations, nothing could be said. In the United States Navy they took boys at a later age. In the French and Russian Navies boys of 17 were admitted; while in the Turkish Navy, which they had been accustomed to regard as admirable, they were taken at the age of 18, and these young men of 17 or 18, whose education had up to that age cost the naval administration of these countries nothing, turned into officers in whose presence the noble Lord had just said he had been sometimes ashamed. He believed that Englishmen were, beyond all comparison, naturally the most able of naval officers; and if they had a fair chance given to them, and were thoroughly trained, they would beat all the naval officers in the world. It was, therefore, startling to him to hear the noble Lord say that he felt ashamed, in the presence of officers of foreign Navies, of the want of scientific education in his colleagues. He hoped the subject would be taken up by the Government, and thought that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty, who had himself given great attention to the matter, would do well to call further attention to it. The education of naval officers demanded earnest attention, and it was to be hoped that they would not in future be called upon to vote the extravagant amount of £305 a-year for each of the boys admitted on board the Britannia, and, at the same time, hear from the noble Lord, with all his experience in the matter, that the education given there was wholly defective, and that the results were such as to cause him to blush in the presence of foreign officers.

MR. E. J. REED said, he rose for the purpose of saying that the views which the noble Lord (Lord Ramsay) had laid before the Committee that evening had been, to his (Mr. Reed's) certain knowledge, entertained for some time past by those concerned in the education of young officers for the Navy; and he believed he should be within the mark in saying that representations had been made in times past indicating the results which the noble Lord had pointed out. But he had felt, having taken great interest in the subject for many years, that it was almost hopeless to expect a change unless and until the subject was taken up by a naval officer who had experience of the system, and who spoke with considerable weight in that House. He had been extremely pleased to hear the statement of the noble Lord, because he was convinced that in that statement had been pronounced the virtual end of the present system. The noble Lord had touched with great force on every one of the points which had weighed on the minds of those concerned in this question. The early age at which youngsters were appointed to the Navy was in such contrast to the practice in this respect of other nations that he was glad to hear the subject so forcibly put forward that evening. He hoped, when the Admiralty had time to deal with the subject, the age of admission would be advanced in accordance with the practice of other nations. The Committee must not be surprised to find that so unsatisfactory a state of things as had been described existed, because that arose out of the change of circumstances which had been brought about within the Royal Navy. As the noble Lord had pointed out, the system which was now unsuitable was necessary in the state of the Navy which had passed away, when it was the chief thing for an officer to know the way to manage a ship under canvas, but when it was not necessary, as it was at present, to train him in a number of scientific subjects. There was another point in the speech of the noble Lord to which he would allude—namely, the unsuitableness of a man-of-war in commission for the continuation of the education of naval officers after leaving the Britannia. He (Mr. E. J. Reed) had recently conversed with a young officer who deplored the fact that while the Naval Service laid upon him the necessity of studying a large number of scientific subjects it furnished him with no opportunity for doing so. He did certainly despair of giving young officers on board ship any great facilities in that respect, and was of opinion that the more they could acquire of scientific knowledge before they embarked on the deck of a man-of-war the better it would be for them. The noble Lord had truly pointed out how necessary it was for naval officers in the present day to acquire a large amount of scientific knowledge. At the most, a few years ago, a fair amount of mathematics, enough to enable them to learn navigation, was all that was expected of them; but, in our days, the youngsters of our Naval Service must study other subjects. Scientific gunnery had become part of the business of every officer in the Navy, and the use of torpedoes required a considerable knowledge of chemistry and electricity. If there had been no other reason for change, the altered condition of the Naval Service, and the increased necessity laid upon naval officers for the acquirement of scientific knowledge, would have imperatively demanded an alteration in the system of naval education. It was not, he believed, necessary to say much for the purpose of urging that the attention of the Admiralty should be given to this subject, because he felt they were fortunate in having a Board perfectly able and willing to take a question of this kind into their serious consideration, and that it would be wisely considered was guaranteed by the presence of the hon. Gentleman below him, the Secretary to the Admiralty, as well as by the character of the First Lord. He ventured to make these observations, for the purpose of enforcing the fact that it was not merely the young officers in the Naval Service who felt the necessity for change, but the educational officers. He felt sure, with the exception of men of mature years, whose experience had been gained in past times, that the Admiralty would have the entire concurrence of the Naval Service.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, he thanked the noble Lord (Lord Ramsay) for the able and lucid speech which he had delivered. The noble Lord had spoken upon the question with a weight which belonged to no other Member, because he had been for a considerable time connected with the system of education on board the Britannia. He (Captain Price) rose, not so much for the purpose of adding his testimony to what fell from the noble Lord, as for the purpose of assuring the Committee that the ideas which had been advocated by him were fully borne out by the experience of many officers in the highest positions in the Navy. The principal question before them was the great cost of the Britannia as a Naval College. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had told the Committee that the cost of education of each naval cadet on board that vessel was £308 a-year. He (Captain Price) believed the hon. and learned Member was rather under the mark, because a certain number of young officers were removed from the Service from one cause or another, and the money spent with regard to those must be taken into account. But the cost was not the only consideration which must guide them in this matter. He quite agreed with the noble Lord that if the Britannia were done away with, and the young men educated in the public schools, and then sent to sea at the age of 15 or 16, it would be a great improvement on the present system. In that opinion he was fortified by the views of Commodore Goodenough, who held that a distinction should be made between the period of education and that of special training, and that the special training should be in the hands of the Government, while the education should be left to the parents to be provided in the ordinary schools of the country. He thought that the education provided by these schools was sufficient for that purpose. Again, Admiral Sherard Osborne held that the educational advantages which the Colleges and other institutions in the country afforded to the youngsters of the day would fully enable them to come up to any standard required. Admiral Ryder also, who had made the subject a very special one, was also in favour of young men being gathered from the public schools of the country, which he was convinced by experience would supply the best description of raw material for the Navy. And then he added, there was something in the atmosphere of public schools which prepared boys to become good officers. If the Britannia were done away with the question must, of course, be considered as to when it was desirable that special training should be given. Many officers were of opinion that boys should enter training ships before going to sea. But he could not regard that as the best course to be adopted. Boys of the age of 15 or 16 ought, he thought, to go to sea at once, not in ships like the Thunderer, but in small ships, where they would learn to discharge their duties in a practical and satisfactory manner. If boys were entered at the age of 16 they should be sent to sea at once, because they limited the time during which they could learn, practically, the duties of their profession, if they were sent to a training ship until they were 17 or 18. For many reasons, he believed, it would be advisable to send the boys to sea at once. He had entered the Service at the age of 13, having received a good education at a private school, a good deal of which he had always felt he had lost during the next two years. In those two years he had really learned nothing at all of his profession, although he had been under a Naval Instructor. But at 15 or 16 years of age, having been appointed to a small sea-going ship, he began to pick up the duties of his profession. With regard to special training, his view was that this ought to be given at a Naval University after the age of 19, because at that age the young officer was particularly anxious to learn, and everything he did learn of a scientific character at that age he was much more able and likely to retain in his memory. There was another reason in support of this view. The sub-lieutenants spent a certain portion of their time at College, and then went to sea, where they did nothing unless they were fortunate enough to get appointed to small ships. The greater number, however, were drafted into large ships, where they either did duty as midshipmen or nothing at all, because the commanders of those vessels did not like to intrust the charge of their ships at sea to young officers, even though they might have come out of College with flying colours. He thought that the time now spent in that way might, with the greatest possible advantage, be spent at a Naval University, and that the money saved by doing away with the Britannia, and training the boys at public schools at their own expense, might very well be appropriated to extending the course now gone through. If that scheme were adopted, it would result that about half of the lieutenants on the list would be studying at the University, while the other half might be drafted into small ships, where their qualities would at once be put to a practical test. This question was, of course, not a new one. He thought the best course for the Admiralty to follow would be to appoint a Departmental Committee, composed of naval officers, to investigate the whole subject, because there could be no doubt that circumstances had changed a good deal since the House had last received any information with respect to it. The Government, he thought, would act wisely in doing that; and the House would, he believed, be satisfied with the Report of the Committee.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, they had listened with pleasure to the very able and eloquent speech of the noble Lord (Lord Ramsay), and it would be a satisfaction to the Liberal Party to have in their ranks a gallant Officer so competent to take part in naval debates, and of whom it might be said that he represented the views of the more advanced branches of the Service. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had the greatest interest in all the points which had been raised by the noble Lord, to which on many occasions, both in the House and in Committee, he had addressed himself, and should now lose no opportunity of bringing them before his Colleagues at the Admiralty. If, on that occasion, he did not deal fully with the subject, it was because they were under the consideration of the Admiralty, whose views he was not then in a position to state. With reference to the first point alluded to—namely, the mode of election, he had, on frequent occasions, expressed his opinion that the present system of nomination was not satisfactory. The Committee would recollect that, in 1869, a change in this respect had been made, and the Service was, to a certain extent, opened to competition for the first time, applications being allowed for double the nominations than there were vacancies. There had existed a good deal of feeling against open competition in the case of boys of so young an age, and he could not but feel that there was considerable weight in that opinion. For that reason his right hon. Friend had not thought it well to open the Service completely to the competition of all the world. However, that system, under which the young men competed for cadetships, was altered by the late Mr. Ward Hunt in 1874. He had himself most strongly disapproved of that change, which was made undoubtedly in consequence of the Report of the Committee which sat to consider the question, but which Committee he had always considered inadequate, while their Report had not, in his opinion, carried weight in the country. He did not know what the right hon. Gentleman opposite the late First Lord of the Admiralty thought on the subject; but he was inclined to think he was not altogether satisfied with the principle of pure nomination, and that he would be glad to see some change in the direction indicated. All he could then say was, that the subject was engaging the attention of the present Board of Admiralty. He trusted before long to be able to state what decision had been arrived at. If any change were made, it would probably be in the direction of opening the Service, to a certain extent, on the principle of competition. Then, as to the early age at which cadets were nominated, and the length of time which they served on board the Britannia, he should not speak confidently. There was a growing feeling amongst a large class of officers that it would be a good thing to advance somewhat the age at which boys were nominated; but it should be remembered, on the other hand, that there was a very strong feeling amongst many naval officers that it was wise to bring boys into the Naval Service at as early an age as possible. During the first two years on board the Britannia cadets did not receive a strictly naval training—not a professional education purely as naval officers; but they gained a professional training in those educational subjects of importance to naval officers. It was, therefore, a question whether it was desirable to take them away from public schools in order to give them that special educational training which they required in order to fit them to become naval officers. No doubt they could be educated at public schools, yet they might lose that special training in naval subjects which was imparted at the Britannia. He only stated the difficulties of this question without stating his own opinion, or that of the Lords of the Admiralty upon it; but he, however, thought that there was considerable weight of opinion that the cadets might be as well educated in a College on shore as in a ship, provided they had certain accessories, such as boats. Successive Boards of Admiralty had considered the expediency of doing away with the Britannia, and establishing a Naval College on shore, as was propounded by the late Mr. Ward Hunt. That scheme only fell through in consequence of the great difficulty attending the question of site. He was quite ready then to support that proposal; but he did not at the time express any strong opinion as to where the College should be situated. The only opinion he gave was that it was desirable to do away with the Britannia and to have a College on shore. There was no doubt that the education on board the Britannia was a very costly one, though not so costly as had been stated by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). The hon. and learned Member had added to the cost of education the wages and victuals of the seamen who had been employed on board the Britannia; but the wages and victuals of the seamen must be found, whether they were employed on the Britannia or somewhere else. If, therefore, they deducted the wages and victuals of the seamen, the cost of education was very much less than that stated. The cost of education for each boy would amount in that case to £186 per annum. He had no doubt that if the College was established in some suitable place a boy could be given a very fair education at much less cost. They might reasonably hope that if it were necessary to take these boys, when leaving the public schools, and before going on board ship, to any College erected upon shore for the purpose of their education, the cost would be very much more moderate. He would repeat that the whole question was now receiving the attention of the Board of Admiralty; and he hoped to be able to announce their decision at no distant day.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that he had listened with great pleasure to the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Ramsay), with whom he had the advantage of frequent communication when he was serving in the Britannia. The subject to which he had directed attention was a very important one—the importance of which it was scarcely possible to overrate. The cost was as nothing, for they must have the very best instructed naval officers for the Navy at any cost. This subject had frequently engaged his attention, and he had given as much consideration as it was possible for a person in the position of the First Lord of the Admiralty, while discharging other duties of a very pressing character. He felt that the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who had succeeded were placed at a great disadvantage, in consequence of the pressure of public work, in endeavouring to work out a question of this kind which required so large an amount of consideration. When he first gave attention to this subject, he was inclined to adopt the view that the Britannia itself was totally unnecessary. That was the first conclusion to which anyone would arrive, if the views of the authorities with regard to the special training of young officers for the Naval Service could be entirely disregarded. But when he made inquiry as to whether it would be possible to provide a supply of boys from public schools with the qualifications now possessed by those who passed out from the Britannia, he found that there were very few, if any, public schools which could provide boys with the amount of special mathematical knowledge which was deemed necessary by the highest authorities. In other words, the standard which they required from the cadets at the age of 15 was much higher than the standard required in the public schools. If the Britannia were abolished, and boys were examined into the Service at the age of 15, supposing the standard remained the same, the boys would be crammed up to that point which was necessary to the special examination. But he was afraid they would not be so well instructed in general knowledge as the boys in the Britannia at the present time. The noble Lord had referred to the possibility of examining into the Service at the age of 15; but, as he (Mr. W. H. Smith) had pointed out, that would involve either less mathematical knowledge on the part of the cadets, or the substitution of the cram system.

LORD RAMSAY said, that he never intended to imply that no special mathematical training was required for naval officers. Far from it. But he had said that a College ought to be substituted for the Britannia, and that boys should join that College later than they now join the Britannia.

MR. W. H. SMITH repeated that he had first been of opinion that the Britannia, as a mere school, might be done away with, and that the expense which it cost the country might be saved by boys being educated in public schools up to the age of 15; but he satisfied himself that no public schools furnished the boys with the special mathematical knowledge at the age of 15 which they required; and they would, therefore, have to fall back upon the cram system, with disastrous results to the boys. The noble Lord had gone into the question in a much more serious manner than was implied by the mere continuance or non-continuance of the Britannia. He had entered into the whole history of the education of a cadet from the time when he entered the Britannia to the period when he passed his examination as second lieutenant. He was very glad to hear the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty state that the whole question would be considered, for, as the noble Lord had said, the question of the Britannia was only a fragmentary part of a very great question. The duties which were required of naval officers in modern times were very different from what was formerly the case, and even in this time a considerable change in the course of education, although in a fragmentary manner, had been made. He, for one, agreed that it was impossible for the boy to get up his duties on board ship and to derive much benefit from the Naval Instructor during the few hours a-week which he was allowed to devote to him. He had never been satisfied with the present system in that respect. Either the cadet felt that he could not do his work for the Naval Instructor, or he considered that he was interfering with his duties as officer, and the cadets were thus left to feel that the whole system was a mistake, and an error which failed to carry out the purposes in view—namely, the gradual and complete education of young officers in all the duties expected from them. If that were the case, what was to be substituted for the present system? It was a very grave question, and one that required very serious consideration. The question was entitled to so prolonged and extensive consideration that he feared it was almost beyond the power of the Board of Admiralty to give proper consideration to it. He did not for one moment suggest that the responsibility of the Admiralty should be taken from them; but he doubted very much, judging from his own experience, whether it would be possible for those who had succeeded him at the Admiralty, to give so much consideration to the question as to enable them to produce a result which would satisfy themselves. Commissions had been appointed from time to time to consider the whole question of naval education; and he thought that a time had now arrived when a Royal Commission might be appointed to consider the whole question. He thought that if that Commission were selected with sufficient care and judgment from amongst those acquainted with what was really necessary, a result might be arrived at which would form a satisfactory settlement of this question for a long time to come. He had himself thought that it was desirable, even when they took boys at the early age of 13, to allow anyone under certain restrictions to send boys to a Naval College, and to keep them there until the age of 16, when, by competitive examination, they would determine which of them were to pass into the Service. Of course, that only referred to the first part of the question—that of the entry of cadets which was a most important matter. He was conscious of the fact that from the age of 16, when the boys went to sea, and until they returned and passed through the examination as second lieutenants, much of their time was wasted, and, as a consequence, men who might have been an ornament to the Service were not given an such an education as they ought to receive. He thought that they ought to make the best use of the materials they possessed, and to afford every opportunity for the development of those qualities which existed among the boys who desired to enter the Public Service. He trusted that the noble Lord would forgive him, however, if he referred to his remarks with regard to seamanship. The noble Lord left the impression that now that ships of war mainly consisted of iron-clads propelled by steam, seamanship was not required. While the old kind of seamanship was no longer required, he thought that seamanship of an informed intelligent kind was still required.

LORD RAMSAY said, that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith) seemed to have misunderstood his observations. When he used the word "steamship" he did so in a strictly professional and technical sense. He had not spoken of the art of handling ships under sail in difficult circumstances. He fully agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that that was as necessary as it formerly was.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that he was glad to have elicited the explanation from the noble Lord, that he was sure that the noble Lord would not wish that his comrades in the Service should entertain the impression that he made the suggestion that the art of handling a ship under sail under difficult circumstances was not necessary. He would not detain the Committee any longer, but would state, in conclusion, that when at the Board of Admiralty he felt the responsibility of nomination very great, and that if a better system could have been devised he should have been very glad to have adopted it. He did not think, however, that open competition between boys of 13 was likely to secure the best results for the British Navy—although he thought that competition at a later period, perhaps at 15 or 16, after the boys had received a proper training at a school or College, might be found successful. The training necessary for such later competition would, it should be remembered, fit those who had undergone it for many useful occupations in life. They would be fitted for the Army, for Woolwich, or for other professions.

MR. WHITWELL said, that they now found, from what had been said by those who had spoken since the noble Lord (Lord Ramsay), that this after all was no new question, and that there had been almost a consensus of opinion on the fact. Thus the question had not been moved too soon, but had only waited to be properly brought forward in the Committee by some hon. Member who thoroughly understood it. He trusted that the Committee would now urge upon the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Board of Admiralty to treat the question as one which must be immediately dealt with. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had referred to the expenses of the education on board the Britannia. That education had, undoubtedly, been expensive, and its results, moreover, had not been satisfactory. What they had then to press upon the Admiralty was that this subject should no longer be treated as a mere departmental question. They had heard that the education given to the officers in the Navy was inferior to that given in foreign Navies. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty might feel that the country would not grudge any money for the education of its naval officers, while it was most essential that the Navy should be managed by men of the highest experience and the highest intellectual power attainable. They must not allow this question to drift amongst those too numerous questions which were only to be thought of or considered. The thing must be done; and he was sure he was speaking not only his own opinion, but that of the whole Committee, when he said the subject must be grasped and a satisfactory result brought about.

MR. BENTINCK said, that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had referred to a Naval School at Dartmouth. He (Mr. Bentinck) believed that no greater mistake could be made than that of building a Naval School on shore; putting all questions of cost aside, it was, he thought, impossible to have an efficient school of that kind. Although they did not acquire much of sea-going habits, they learned more on board the Britannia than they could on shore, more particularly with regard to the habits of ship life. He believed that the present system was radically wrong; there was too much cramming of the head and too little exercise of the body, and he should not be surprised if the Naval Service became disorganized in consequence. He was convinced that the boys would turn out better sailors and more useful men if they were kept afloat during the scholastic period. The proper course was to send boys to sea; by that means they would learn more in three months than they would learn on shore in 12. They ought also to be given healthful exercise and not be overcrowded with studies. He did hope that nothing would induce that House to sanction the establishment of a Naval College on shore.

MR. JENKINS said, that the ships of to-day were not like those of 50 years ago. Not only had the steamship been introduced, but with sailing ships there was not the amount of manœuvring that there used to be. In the case of the Merchant Service, what was required was merely long sea service, and that was the only way of obtaining the requisite knowledge. Such knowledge was frequently of immense service in saving a ship from disaster. He thought that, as a rule, the officers of our Navy spent too much time in port—probably two-thirds of their time was so spent, and they were not sufficiently long at sea. For his own part, he believed that the many disasters they had had during the last few years was due to that fact. The noble Lord (Lord Ramsay) had referred to the training of officers, midshipmen, and sub-lieutenants. For his part, he (Mr. Jenkins) could not understand why the ships in which those officers went to sea were not kept under canvas without the use of steam power, so as to enable them to learn sailing tactics, instead of being mainly propelled by steam. For that reason he fully concurred with the system of flying squadrons, which had been introduced by the present Secretary of State for War (Mr. Childers). He hoped that inquiry would be made as to the ships at foreign stations; take, for instance, the China station. He would venture to say that if the Admiralty made inquiries, they would find that the ships at that station spent two-thirds or three-fourths of their time in port. How could any officers, he would ask, be expected to learn their business without continual sea service? He believed that if that matter received the attention of the Board of Admiralty it would be a step in the right direction. He had advocated, last year, that ships should be sent home from the China station to be re-fitted, and not repaired there, and others sent out to relieve them. Officers would thus have the opportunity of gaining experience at sea on the voyage. Instead of that, many of the ships remained abroad, year after year, and officers were sent out as passengers to relieve those whose period of service had expired. He felt sure that the discussion which had taken place that night would tend to remove the blots which at present existed in our system. He was glad that that discussion had taken place.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, that when he compared the Mercantile Service with the Naval, he was at a loss to understand how it was that so many difficulties arose with regard to the latter Service. He could not discern how it was that, recruited as the Navy was with young men of good education, and with every possible advantage, it cut such a poor figure when anything was required to be done. He thought that thanks were due to the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Lord Ramsay) for having given them an insight into how things went on. It appeared that children of 13 years of age were sent to the Britannia. They were not old enough to learn much, and, after a time, it was found that their education was deficient, and that they were dissatisfied with their positions. He would ask the Board of Admiralty and the nation, if that was the right way to introduce young persons into the Navy to manage its affairs? He should say—do not send little boys of 13 years of age into such a Service; they were far too young to acquire any real and valuable knowledge. The fact was, that these boys were sent there to please their mothers and sisters and aunts, and very often, he believed, they had neither education nor brains. They ought to consider the question seriously, and it was the duty of the Board of Admiralty to endeavour to obtain the services of a more advanced class of young men, who had shown some capacity and ability, qualities which could not be expected to be shown by mere children. If they looked at the Naval Service for the last few years, they would find that several ships had been lost; and if they then turned to the Mercantile Service, they could find nothing of the kind in the recent history of the great Companies. Take, for instance, the Cunard line; they had run for over 40 years, and had never lost a single ship; and the Peninsular and Oriental had run for many years to the East Indies, and had never made a blunder, and, in fact, never varied as regarded the time they took in reaching their destination. He asked why they should have those difficulties as regarded the Naval Service? He had no hesitation in saying that naval officers had shown no remarkable skill of late; and he believed the same charge might be brought, with almost equal truth, against their Army. He thought it was high time that those matters were carefully looked into. The Navy was in a most unsatisfactory condition; every naval officer was dissatisfied, and a very large number of those officers were on half-pay. He was sure the present state of things was most undesirable. The noble Lord who had recently addressed them (Lord Ramsay) had brought some very useful information before the Committee, and he had hinted that the education of each child cost, in one way and another, about £300 a-year. That being so, it must be obvious that none but the upper classes could allow their children to go into the Navy. He thought it was a monstrous thing that the education of those children should cost anything like from £200 to £300 a-year. When the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) said that the subject should receive the most careful consideration, he hoped that he would bear in mind the lectures he had received that night. That hon. Gentleman had referred to the system of open competition which the present Secretary of State for War (Mr. Childers) had endeavoured to initiate when he was at the Admiralty. For his own part, he could see no good in subjecting such children as were now sent to the Service to competition. If they were 17 or 18 years of age it would be very different. He trusted that the Gentlemen who now were in charge of the Admiralty would endeavour to procure a more efficient Navy, as he feared the consequences in case they found themselves suddenly involved in a naval war. He trusted that the best assistance that could be given by those in authority would be given to the subject.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he should like for a moment to bring the Committee back to the question of the Vote of some tens of thousands for the departments of the Navy. A number of hon. Gentlemen had referred to the cost of training cadets on board the Britannia; but the real cost, he believed, was known to nobody. The Admiralty itself did not know how much it cost to train cadets on that ship. They were asked now to vote a sum of £9,811 on account of the Britannia; but he thought he could show that the Government did not require that money which they then asked them for. They had that amount and more than that already, and were not therefore in any need of further Votes on that account. If hon. Gentlemen would look at the Comptroller and Auditor General's Reports of the Appropriation Account of the Navy Estimates of last year, they would see, from pages 101 to 112, a series of ledger balances to the amount of £13,243, held by the Government on account of the subscriptions received from the parents and guardians of naval cadets on board the Britannia. That fund had been accumulating for years; representations had been made over and over again to the Government with regard to those balances, and over and over again those representations had been evaded; numerous categorical letters had been addressed by the Comptroller and Auditor General, but the balances still remained in their hands to the extent of £9,000 odd. From that source they had not only sufficient to carry them on from September, 1879, to the end of the last financial year, but quite enough besides for all the expenditure in connection with the Britannia training ship during the present financial year also. There were three funds from which money was supplied; there were the Votes in Parliament, the Naval Cadet Fund, and what was called the private fund of the naval cadets. The proportions were somewhat in this way—where £3,700 was spent out of Imperial funds, £3,400 came out of the Naval Cadet Fund, and £700 out of the private fund; therefore, more than half of the money came from the Parliamentary Votes. The Government had a balance in hand more than sufficient to defray the annual charge, and there was, therefore, no necessity for that £9,811, unless the balances were fully returned to the parents or guardians.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

If there were no promise held out to that effect, he should deem it a necessity to move to reduce the Vote by that sum.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the sum to which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had referred, consisted of contributions of parents for the education of their children on board the Britannia. A discussion had arisen between the Admiralty and the Treasury as to its disposal. The fund would have to be paid into the Exchequer, and the money spent on the children's education must be voted by that House.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he wished to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) with regard to an important matter. There was very great jealousy felt in the Three Kingdoms with reference to the mode of entering the Navy through the Britannia. Naval cadets appeared to be in a totally different position from the young men who entered the Army. No doubt, in some few regiments it was necessary to obtain permission of the General before entering; but that was the case, he believed, only in a few special regiments, such as the Rifle Brigades, the Guards, and an attempt had recently been made to introduce a similar system in the 60th Rifles, but the Army generally must be considered as open. He did not profess to know much about the Navy; but he had been told that there were certain schools which had obtained a certain amount of patronage with regard to admission into the Navy, and, with the exception of the patronage which the First Lord and some distinguished officers possessed, there was no other way of getting into the Navy. Generally speaking, unless a man could procure the interest of the First Lord for the time being, he believed, under the present arrangement, it was very difficult to get a nomination. He wished to ask his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the statement he had made as to the mode of getting admission to the Navy through that ship was a correct one? If not, he should ask him to set him right upon the matter. If he had been rightly informed, and the facts were as he had stated, it seemed to him that the position was a most anomalous one to say that the British Navy, upon which they had prided themselves for so many years, was an open Service, when, in fact, it was restricted to a few high personages endowed with extraordinary privileges of patronage. He should like also to know, whether the present Ministers would do anything, however little, towards throwing open that Service, to public competition, as ought to be done? That question of public competition was one that had been thoroughly thrashed out, and he was certain no harm would accrue to that branch of the Public Service if it were introduced. He would take that opportunity of asking his hon. Friend whether the facts were as he had stated; and, if so, whether the First Lord of the Board of Admiralty would take into consideration the desirability of introducing competition as the means of entering that distinguished Service?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that, during the greater part of that discussion, the subject had turned on the question of entering cadets for the Navy. No doubt, it was quite true that the present mode of entering for that Service was by pure nomination, which was vested mainly in the First Lord of the Admiralty, and, to a certain extent, in the other naval Lords and certain of the naval officers. It was now under consideration, whether or not the Service should, to some extent, be open to competition, and he hoped, before long, to be able to announce the decision.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he wished to ask a Question of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty. It was a simple one, and, no doubt, he could answer it at once. On page 25 he saw that a number of almanacks had been sold. In 1875, 18,896 had been sold, and in 1879 the number had fallen to 16,290. He did not like to see that, for those almanacks had always been considered the standard for navigation. He hoped it was no evidence that the Scientific Department was falling off in skill?

MR. T. BRASSEY said, he could answer the Question of the hon. Member. The almanacks were most useful, and were published by the Admiralty in a cheap form for the use of seamen. The reason that the number sold had slightly diminished, was, no doubt, that other almanacks by private persons had managed to obtain a share of patronage.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was not altogether satisfied with the answer of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) as regarded the balances in their hands. They evidently had no right to the money, and yet he declined to take it in aid of the Vote, and there was probably but little chance of its being returned to the contributors. Under those circumstances, unless he ascertained from the hon. Gentleman that he was prepared to take it in aid of the Vote, or pay it into the Exchequer, he should be compelled to press his Motion.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the money would be paid into the Exchequer.

Vote agreed to.

(2). Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,027,689, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expenses of the Dockyards and Naval Yards at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881."

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the sum was not altogether all that was wanted for the purpose during the year, for it only formed part of £1,363,585, which had been voted under this head, and it was also an increase by £20,000 on the Estimate of the late Government.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, resuming, said, the total of the Vote was not the sum which the Chairman had just read, but was £1,363,585, and of this sum £1,202,000 was to be spent at home, and only £138,000 abroad. Of the sum which was to be spent at home, Deptford was to get £808,4; Chatham, £330,000; Sheerness, £137,000; Portsmouth, £391,000; Devonport, £330,000; and Pembroke, £113,000; so that, altogether, this Island of Great Britain was to receive the advantage of an expenditure of upwards of £1,750,000, whereas Ireland only got the paltry sum of £1,458. Ireland contributed to the Imperial Exchequer in the proportion of 1 to 8 or 9, as compared with England; while it received out of this £1,330,000, only one 85th part. The wages voted under Vote 1, for the pay of Seamen and Marines, was, for the most part, expended in England, and England got the benefit of it, while little or nothing was spent in Ireland. Under Vote 2, for Victuals and Clothing, Lights, Soap, and Tobacco, all these articles were purchased in England, and England got the benefit of the trade. After the money taken for the Admiralty Office which was spent in this country, almost all the Establishments for which money was taken under Vote 5, were either in this country or abroad, and none of them were in Ireland; so that, up to this Vote, almost all the money taken in the Navy Estimates was spent in one portion of the United Kingdom. Ireland, as he had said, only got one 85th part of what was spent in England, and only 100th part of the Vote. If hon. Members turned to page 83 of the Estimates, they would see there that the item of "Contingencies" alone on this Vote was four times as much as the entire sum which it was proposed to spend in Ireland. Of this £1,458—which was a mere fringe of the Vote—which was spent in Ireland, one-third went under the head of "Labour." This was for the pay of the Constabulary, as might be seen by reference to pages 66 and 67 of those Estimates. If hon. Members would turn to those pages they would see the character of the Vote, which was principally a Wages Vote. The total amount given for wages in the Estimate was £1,051,000, which was more than 1,000 times what Ireland got; and out of that sum of upwards of £1,000,000, Ireland barely got £1,000. She did not receive in wages, under this chief Navy Vote, one-thousandth part of what was spent in England. The Government proposed to spend on wages at Gibraltar six times as much as was spent in the whole of Ireland. The Committee would see, also, that by page 67, they proposed to spend in Malta 30 times as much, in Bermuda 25 times as much, and in Jamaica five times as much. In the single harbour of Trincomalee, the Government proposed to spend £4,131, in contradistinction to £1,458 in the whole of Ireland. That country received scarcely one-third of what was demanded for the single port of Esquimaux, in Rangoon; and he had no hesitation in appealing to fair-minded English and Scotch Members—for he would not appeal to his compatriots—if this was a fair, and just, and honest way of dealing with Ireland? They had to pay their quota to the Imperial Exchequer, and they got back less than 1,000th part of what was spent in wages in England. Why should all the Dockyards be in England? They had in Ireland harbours as convenient and suitable, large land-locked basins admirably adapted by nature for dockyards; they had in Cork Harbour, Dingle Harbour, and Dingle Bay, one of the most natural dockyards to be found in the whole world. North of that they had not only the mouth of the Shannon, but Galway, and 20 other harbours in every part of Ireland. Yet they had not a single Dockyard in the whole of the country. They had a right, on the other hand, to have one there, because it was one of the understood conditions of the Union that a Dockyard should be established. Lord Cornwallis distinctly promised that there should be a Dockyard established in Ireland immediately after the Union; but, from that day to this, Irish Members had been vainly trying to obtain their rights. He was now merely repeating the claim that was made 100 times before, and had never yet been granted. They were told that what the Irish people wanted was employment in order to prevent distress and starvation. Let the Government set the example; they had money. They complained of landlords and sanitary authorities not availing themselves of the facilities offered them, yet here they asked for £1,330,000 to be paid for wages and for labour, and by that means they had an opportunity of spending money in the employment of the people of Ireland. Why did not they do it? How easy it was to get over £1,000,000 for works in England, and how hard it was to obtain even £20,000 or £30,000 on loan even to save the people of Ireland from starving! One Dockyard in his country would be a god-send. One single Dockyard established at Cork or in Dingle Harbour, if money was spent on it as money was spent in England, would go a very long way of itself to removing all distress in the two counties bordering on it. But the Government did nothing. They did not even spend the sums for which they asked in the Vote. If hon. Members would turn to the Appropriation Account of last year, they would find that a sum of £4,700 was returned to the Exchequer as not expended in connection with Devonport, Portsmouth, and Sheerness. That sum was returned as not wanted, although it had been voted, and that sum even was three times the amount of all the money the Government now proposed to spend in the whole year in Ireland. He could not think that Ministers were prepared altogether to reject or ignore the claim Ireland had to the establishment of a Dockyard at some port or other along her coast. Therefore, in order to give them the opportunity to make an arrangement for the establishment of such a Dockyard, he would beg to move the postponement of the Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman will not be in Order in moving the postponement of the Vote.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE suggested that the discussion would more properly take place upon Vote 11, for works now in progress in Ireland. The hon. Member (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) would recollect that a considerable sum of money had now been taken to complete the Dock which had for some time been in course of erection at Haulbowline. He would, therefore, venture to suggest that this discussion, which he freely admitted was important, should be raised upon Vote 11, and not upon this Vote, because, of course, as this Vote was for Ships and Dockyards, it was quite impossible to take the ships to be repaired where there were no dockyards.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR replied, that the statement of the Government, that they were proceeding with the works at Haulbowline, would sound very much like satire to his constituents in Ireland. They had always heard too much of the Government's intentions to do something or other in their country. As to the Vote, he begged to call attention to the fact that this was a Dockyard Vote, and his objection to the Vote as it stood was that the money asked for was devoted to dockyards exclusively in England. He claimed a Dockyard for Ireland, and he could not conceive how such a claim could be put forward on any other Vote, or be properly heard except on this. But he might also point out to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), that a certain sum of money was asked for in this Vote, under sub-head E, for this identical Haulbowline. The amount was £901, which stood in flagrant contrast to £300,000, £270,000, and £211,000, and so on, asked on account of different places in England. It seemed to him that this was a proper Vote on which to raise his question, and, in order to do so, he would move the reduction of the Vote by £1,000,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that he could not, of course, deny the right of the hon. Gentleman to raise this question on that Vote, because, as he had pointed out, there was a very small sum for wages taken under that head for Haulbowline; but he still thought that the discussion would more properly come under Vote 11, where £26,000 was taken for these works. If the hon. Gentleman thought that the Government was not advancing quickly enough, and that more money ought to be spent there, that would be a very proper occasion to raise the whole question; but he was sure he would admit that, until the Dock was completed, it was impossible for the Admiralty to spend any considerable sum in repairing ships there. The better mode, perhaps, would be to suggest that a larger sum should be expended in hastening on the works. He had already said that it was intended to spend £25,000 during the current year upon it, which was the sum that had been spent for the last four or five years, and, at that rate, the Dock would be completed in three or four years more. He would venture, also, to remark that if this was an Irish grievance, it was still more a Scotch grievance, because there was not a single Government Dock in the whole of Scotland, and it was not proposed to spend any money upon one.

MR. E. J. REED observed, that the Motion which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had made was hardly a fair one, because it would debar many English Members who were anxious to help from voting with him, because his proposal was so much beside the question that they would be obliged to vote against him. It was very desirable to give every English Member an opportunity of supporting the question of Irish Dockyards, if possible; but he would observe that he knew no Motion which would accomplish that object, as, in Supply, it was only possible for an hon Member to move the reduction of a Vote. Therefore, he thought it would be better to move a Resolution on the subject on going into Committee of Supply. He had noticed that the present First Lord of the Admiralty had stated his intention of sending boys to sea in sailing ships. He thought it would be well if some indication could be elicited from the Admiralty as to the kind of vessel to which they were to be intrusted, in order that hon. Members might have an opportunity of making any suggestions upon that subject which might occur to them. He also referred to the case of mechanical writers in the Dockyards, with the object of inducing his hon. Friend below him to call attention to the matter.

DR. LYONS said, he hoped the hon. Member for Queen's County would withdraw his Motion, and defer the consideration of the subject until they reached Vote 11. The Secretary to the Admiralty would then, no doubt, be in a position to inform the Committee as to the position of the works at Haulbowline. Upon Vote 11 there would be a full opportunity of raising the whole question; but no practical issue could follow further opposition to this Vote on the present occasion. The sooner the remaining Votes were passed the sooner, in his opinion, would the subject be considered.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, he wished to ascertain what were the views of the Government with regard to the Dockyard Establishment—whether they were going to increase the number of established men, or whether they intended to depend more upon the system of hiring? That question was most interesting to the country at large, and particularly to the Dockyard men themselves. Various Committees which had sat to consider the subject had recommended that a larger number of established men should be given to the Dockyards; but, unfortunately, all Governments, whether Conservative or Liberal, had "burked" the question. He remembered it had been remarked that no question was ever asked of the witnesses before the Committees as to whether this or that measure tended to increase the power of the Navy. The subject was always looked at from an economical point of view. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that this question had been dealt with by Admiral Elliot at the time he was a Member of the House of Commons in 1875. The gallant Admiral handled it so well, and used arguments of so unanswerable a character, that the Government was obliged to get rid of him by giving him a good appointment. Since then, although it had been brought forward from time to time, the subject had never been thoroughly or exhaustively dealt with in the House of Commons. For his own part, he could not attempt to deal with it at any length from the fact of there being but few hon. Members disposed to take the matter up. Naval men seemed to be in a minority in that House. Nevertheless, he felt it his duty to say a few words upon the subject of the Dockyard Establishments. As he had stated, it had been recommended over and over again by Committees that they should establish as many men in their Dockyards as possible. The Committee of 1859 made a strong recommendation on that point. They were unanimous in their decision that the men in the Dockyards, and the factories also, should be established, and that at a certain age they should be superannuated. It was true that one Member of the Committee differed as to the exact way in which the system of superannuation should be carried out; but they all agreed that there should be superannuation. That recommendation was made in 1859, and 20 years had elapsed, so far as the factories were concerned, before it was carried out in 1879. This system was established by the late Government, who put a certain number of factory men upon the Superannuation List; and, as a matter of fact, about 1,000 men were so established. But he wished to know whether the Government were going to extend that principle, and gradually establish all the men in the factories; and, more particularly, whether they were going to take into consideration the position of men in the factories who could not now benefit by the establishment? It was all very well to establish men from the present time, and begin counting their times from the date of the order for superannuation by-and-bye; but it was no consolation to those men who had been working in the factories for 30 or 40 years, and could not benefit by that principle. The factories, or steam branch, as they were called, were established as an experiment in 1846, when men of good character were taken from the best private factories in the country. The factories set up by these men had proved a very decided success, and he believed they had effected a saving of 25 per cent in the cost of production of some articles, such as machinery, boilers, and propellers. Many of the men, when taken from private trade, were 25 to 30 years of age. They had been serving continuously ever since the setting up of the factories, and were now looking to the time when they would be obliged to give up work. It might be expected that these men would get some kind of pension; but the fact was they only received a gratuity, which he could assure the Committee was very small indeed. For some years they had received no gratuity at all. Lord Clarence Paget, however, took the first step in that direction, and allowed them £1 for every year's service; and some years afterwards the late Administration, who had found that this plan did not act quite fairly, allowed the men a week's payment for every year's service in the factories. So that a man who had been serving continuously and was incapacitated at 60 years of age, received a gratuity of from £40 to £60, or a sum just sufficient to keep body and soul together for a year. It must, of course, be said that the men who came into the factories received a higher rate of pay than those in the Dockyards who were entitled to superannuation at the age of 60. And it might be urged that out of their higher rate of pay they could save sufficient to buy an annuity commencing on their reaching the age of 60. But it must be remembered that they had no guarantee that their services would be continuous, and that, after having put out money for the purchase of an annuity, by a reduction taking place in the establishment they might, as it were, find themselves on their beam ends. For these reasons, he asked the Secretary to the Admiralty to consider the subject. He believed there were at the Admiralty, or had been until lately, officers who were of opinion that the small gratuity which was given to the men who had worked so many years in the steam branch factories ought to be very much increased, and that, instead of their getting one week's pay for each year's service, they should receive a month's pay. Then, as regarded the Dockyards proper, of course, every man who entered the Dockyards wanted to be put on the Establishment, and wanted to know that he would, by-and-bye, be entitled to superannuation. But he could not get on the List. It was not any fault of his. He might go on serving and serving and not get what he wanted, for the reason that the number of established men was limited. A gang of men might enter the Dockyard to-day, one-third of whom might be put on the Established List at once, because there happened to be vacancies to that extent. One-third of them could not get on this Established List for five years because there were no vacancies, while the remaining third could not be placed on the List for 10 years for the same reason. What was the consequence of this? The third batch, who had to wait 10 years, only began to count their time from the end of that period; they had only a small number of years to count when they arrived at the age of 60, and their superannuation was much less than those who had been put at once on the Established List. He held that every man ought to pass through a probationary course before being entitled to be established; that after, say, five years, he should be put upon the Established List as a matter of right, and that he should commence to count his time not from that date, but that his back time should be given him. A deduction should be made, perhaps, for the amount of extra pay which he had received by reason of his being a hired man during those five years, instead of an established man. This could be done either by reducing his pension for one or two years, when he became entitled to it, or by reducing its equivalent in time—that was to say, that, instead of his counting the whole five years, he should count one year short of that, or whatever the proportion might be equivalent to the extra pay he had been receiving. He assured his hon. Friend who sat upon the opposite Bench as the Representative of the Admiralty that the question was one of the greatest interest at the Dockyards, and

of war, and that, therefore, they were bound to have such a preponderance of fast cruising ships as would, at all events, insure their command of the sea. Well, the hon. Gentleman, with the frankness which always characterized him, had admitted that there was full reason for the complaint of the want of cruising ships; and he (Mr. Bentinck) was prepared to hear that admission followed by the announcement that the Government were about to devote their energies to the construction of a number of vessels of that kind. But, to his great disappointment and regret, the hon. Gentleman wound up by saying he hoped that they should, from time to time, add to their number. [Mr. SHAW LEEFVRE: I said we were proposing to commence three cruisers.] He (Mr. Bentinck), thought the hon. Gentleman advanced an argument against himself. Of what use were three cruising ships in maintaining the ascendancy of Great Britain on the high seas? Forty or fifty ships of that class would be wanted to place the country both in a position to maintain her naval supremacy, and in a position which she must occupy, unless the people were to be reduced to a state of starvation in case of war. It was incredible to him that the hon. Gentleman, unless he had misunderstood him, should, from his place in Parliament, begin by telling the Committee that he admitted the deficiency in the number of their cruising ships; then, that he should go on to say that he hoped, from time to time, to add to their number; and, finally, that he was about to take measures for the construction of three such ships. He had urged these points on every successive Government for many years past; but that did not deter him from again adverting to questions which he considered to be of vital importance to the very existence of the country. The answer of the hon. Gentleman had filled him with astonishment; and the statement that the Admiralty were only about to construct three cruisers, he thought, fully bore out his assertion, made more than once, and to succeeding Governments, and to the House of Commons, that the people of this country were painfully and blindly indifferent to a question which related to their very existence as a nation. The fact was, Government after Government had dealt with this question, not with reference to their knowledge of the subject, or with reference to their convictions—they had dealt with it as a matter of political convenience. No Government, for years past, had had the courage to come down to the House and say that the cost of everything connected with the Navy had increased ten-fold in the last 20 years; consequently, that the cost of the Navy must be very largely increased. Unless the country was prepared to incur the necessary expense, its position, as a great nation, was one of the utmost peril.

MR. RYLANDS said, that the speech which the hon. Gentleman opposite had delivered to the Committee was one with which those hon. Members who had been in former Parliaments were perfectly familiar. He would do the hon. Gentleman the credit to say that he had upheld his testimony without reference to political considerations, and had complained alike whether his own Party or his political opponents were in power. The hon. Gentleman said that more money ought to be expended on the Navy, if they wished to avoid the destruction of England as a Naval Power. But he (Mr. Rylands) could not help remembering that they were paying a large sum—he thought a very exorbitant sum—for Navy Estimates. He very much questioned whether the country would be satisfied if they were told that, although they were spending £10,500,000 a-year—the late Government spent from £11,000,000 to £12,000,000—on the Navy, their naval supremacy was gradually declining. He had no such apprehensions. He believed, if the occasion should arise when they would have to protect the commerce of this country by cruisers, they had in their Mercantile Marine an enormous store of power which could be utilized in a very short period, and in such a way as to protect the commerce of Britain and maintain the naval supremacy of the country. He believed, however, that the enormous expenditure on account of the Navy might be cut down; for he did not believe that so large an expenditure was necessary to maintain the naval supremacy of this country. He did not wish it to be supposed that in any arguments he had used he was desirous of cutting down the naval power of the country; but he did think it was necessary to cut down that wasteful expenditure of the people's money which was going ship-building, had been carried out. He had also pointed out that for the last three or four years in succession those promises had not been carried out. He could only say that it had been usual for Ministers, when laying the Estimates before the House, to state what work had been accomplished during the previous year; but he hoped next year to be able to lay upon the Table of that House a Return giving fuller details of that matter. When the arrangements were completed, and that Return was before them, they would be able to see how much of the money expended had been devoted to ship-building or ship-preparing. He thought he had now answered all the Questions which had been asked, and he hoped that the Vote would then be agreed to.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty a question which, perhaps, he was in a position to answer. A Committee was appointed by the late Board of Admiralty, in conjunction with the then Secretary of State for War, in reference to the guns to be placed in those ships. He had himself considered that some arrangement might be come to by which some sort of composition might be introduced, so that the Naval Service should not rely entirely on the Woolwich Gun Factory. He did not know whether the hon. Gentleman was in a position to give to the Committee any information on the subject. He was sure that he would agree with him that that was the right course to take as regarded the matter of guns for large ships.

MR. BENTINCK said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had taken exception to what he had stated with reference to additional expenditure; but he was bound to say that he considered that the greatest economy would be practised by adding largely to the strength of the Navy. He must remind his hon. Friend, with all respect to him, that he seemed to have lost sight in his argument of one important fact. He admitted the necessity of having an efficient Navy, and yet when he talked of economy he seemed to forget the increased cost of everything connected with the Navy. If they were to have an efficient Navy, he would remind him that it must be at a cost much in excess of that of former years. That was a point that the hon. Gentleman seemed to have forgotten; and he wished to impress upon him the necessity of considering it when talking of the efficiency of the Navy. He should like to say one word with regard to what fell from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty with reference to such enormous iron-clads as the Inflexible. There could be no doubt, and, in fact, it was well known, that ships such as that were regarded as being of a very doubtful character; and it was for consideration whether they contributed to the real available strength of the Navy of this country. He also said that they relied upon a number of Coast Guard ships of bygone days as line-of-battle ships. He (Mr. Bentinck) considered that such vessels were practically useless; and he thought it was hardly right to treat these in the number of cruisers when there was no intention of increasing that class of vessel by new ones. He could not, therefore, agree with his hon. Friend in that matter. Some hon. Member had alluded to the question of the conversion of merchant-men into naval vessels. For his part, he had great doubts whether they would turn out to be useful or not. There were many objections to them, not the least of which was that it was a work of time before those ships could be converted into efficient cruising vessels. He believed that in the event of an outbreak of war such vessels would come too late; everything would have to be done, and nothing would be ready; and this country would find itself in a position of extreme difficulty, not to say jeopardy. The whole subject, in fact, required very serious attention. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty said that all those things would have to be attended to with due regard to economy; and that was where he differed from him. He fully agreed, however, with his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) as to the necessity of economizing, as much as possible, in the Navy; but he denied that allowing the Navy of this country to remain in a state of inefficiency was entitled to be classed under the head of economy. He contended that economy must give way, if a too rigid adherence to it would be likely to entail national disaster.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he was unable to answer fully the question of the

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

Government which had only recently come into Office; and he had the greatest confidence that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty would bring great ability to bear upon this subject. He hoped with regard to the Dockyards that they might find, on a subsequent occasion, that a better system had been adopted; and that while, on the one hand, considerable economy could be secured, on the other, greater results might be obtained by less expenditure.

MR. GORST said, that he hoped Her Majesty's Government would not overlook this important question. He could assure the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), that the question raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price) was not only one of very great importance, but his observations upon it did not deserve to be received with the sneers they had met with. Hon. Members who were disposed to interrupt his hon. and gallant Friend, did not usually take any part in these debates. They only came in for the purpose of making a disturbance. The hon. Member for Burnley had hardly done justice to Gentlemen who represented Dockyard constituencies, when he stated that they could not approach this subject with any but a biased view. He should have thought that even the interests of a large body of workmen were deserving of some attention on the part of Gentlemen who, as Liberals, professed a special interest in the interests of the working classes; but he desired to discuss this question, not in the interest of the people employed, but in the interest of the country at large. He did not think that hon. Members who interrupted properly understood the state of things in their Dockyards at the present time. They employed a great number of workmen; and it was for the interest of the country that they should employ the best workmen who could be obtained at the ordinary rates of labour. To employ second-rate shipwrights, smiths, and fitters was no wise economy; but they ought to have the pick of shipwrights, smiths, and artificers throughout the country. How were arrangements made in order to produce that effect? The principle of the dockyard was that men were put upon the establishment. They were engaged at something less than ordinary wages of labour in their own trade; but they were insured a regular and constant employment, and they received what the hon. Member for Burnley called pension, but which was really deferred pay, for the purpose of making them steady and industrious in their work, and inducing them to remain in the Dockyard. In the first place, by that system, they obtained the pick of men in the country, and they were sure of their services at any time, whether great activity prevailed in the ship-building trade or not. But for such an arrangement, at a period of great activity in the ship-building trade they might have a difficulty in getting men; and it was necessary for the safety of the country to have a number of men upon whom they could rely in times of emergency. In practice, about half of the number of men employed in the Dockyards were not on the establishment. They were hired by the State like any ordinary employer of labour, and that system produced this bad result. They could not get such good hired men as those who worked on the establishment; and, on the other hand, if the rate of wages rose—if a war broke out, or if there were great activity in the ship-building trade—they would find that they would have to increase the wages of the hired artificers. So that, by having to pay extra wages in times of dearth, they would far more than swallow up the extra cost of the men on the establishment in time of peace. Men not on the establishment always felt themselves in a position of inferiority to those on the establishment. The hired shipwrights worked side by side with the establishment men. It was true that they got slightly higher wages; but they had not the same security of permanent employment, particularly when a Liberal Government was in Office, and they were always in fear of losing their employment by retrenchment. Those men felt uncertainty in their work, which made them dissatisfied with their position. Hon. Members below the Gangway on the other side sneered at these arguments; but those artificers had themselves and their families to support, and were as anxious for security for their small incomes as hon. Members were for the security of their large incomes. The hon. and gallant Member for Devonport had not been ashamed to stand up and state that under Vote 11 until then. He should not have attempted to raise that point at all, had it not been that he thought that the question of the prosecution of the Haulbowline works ought to be considered under that head. He took it that the English Dockyards were considered under the present Vote.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he rose to correct a misunderstanding of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down. The present Vote was not the one under which the question he had raised could be considered. The wages of the men employed in the Dockyard were provided in Vote 6; but the cost of the works proposed to be carried out was provided for under Vote 11. Therefore, when that Vote came on it would be the right time to discuss the matter referred to by the hon. Member.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he begged to thank the right hon. Gentleman for his suggestion, and he should raise the question under Vote 11.

MR. BIGGAR said, that, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) and the explanation of the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), it seemed undesirable at the present moment to raise the question of the Vote for Haulbowline. But, considering the fact that no wages could be charged for shipbuilders until the works there were completed, it appeared to him that the question did enter within the limits of the present discussion. He thought that to move to reduce the Vote was not, however, the way to obtain the object they had in view. The proper way seemed to be to raise a discussion on the subject, and to press it upon the attention of the Committee. To move to reduce the Vote was not, by any means, a direct way of proceeding. Nothing like the sum that ought to be spent had been spent on those works; and he thought, therefore, that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Sullivan) was fully justified in raising a discussion of the question. Certainly, an alteration ought to be made in the present system of voting money for those works, and it was most desirable that they should be finished as soon as possible.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. A. M. Sullivan

MR. JENKINS said, that he found, under the head of "Foreign Dockyards and Allowances for Naval Arsenal," Vote 10, a sum of £43,600, and a further sum of £166,500, for expenses in foreign Yards. He wished to obtain some information on that head. The money expended in home Yards was explained; but no information was given as to the expenditure for foreign Yards. A large sum of money seemed to be spent in re-fitting and repairing ships in commission; and it was, he thought, most desirable as regarded that expenditure. He thought that the sum spent was much more than absolutely necessary—for instance, the sum spent at Hong Kong was very large, and they should have some details as to what ships were repaired at that station, and the cost of such repairs. He hoped that the Board of Admiralty would take that matter into their consideration, and would furnish the House with all the information they could upon the subject.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the Return they proposed in another year to lay before the House would give all the information desired upon that subject.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, they had drifted away for some time from the question before the Committee. They had gone into a discussion as regarded wages of artizans and other classes of men, and had heard hon. Gentlemen talking about the "wages of my constituents." He did not find fault with Gentlemen from England or Ireland trying to gain advantages for their constituents, or wanting a share of the money spent in the localities represented; but he begged to remind them that they had met there for the good of the country, and not for the benefit of any particular constituency. He should like to say a few words upon that Vote. They spent an enormous sum in wages; but he thought they saw little for it. Some hon. Member—he had forgotten who it was—said that there had been more expenditure than last year, and less to show for it. He could not understand how that was so. He thought that those works in Her Majesty's Yards compared very unfavourably with those of the Mercantile Marine. In the latter, they could always get a large ship built in six or eight months; whereas, in the Dockyards, they took four or five years,

Government which had only recently come into Office; and he had the greatest confidence that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty would bring great ability to bear upon this subject. He hoped with regard to the Dockyards that they might find, on a subsequent occasion, that a better system had been adopted; and that while, on the one hand, considerable economy could be secured, on the other, greater results might be obtained by less expenditure.

MR. GORST said, that he hoped Her Majesty's Government would not overlook this important question. He could assure the hon. Return had never been furnished. Under the circumstances, he could not but believe that all those statements which had been made with reference to the island were purely imaginative, and that there was no Victualling Yard there at all.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that victualling was provided at the Island of Ascension at a small cost. There was also a Dockyard and a Hospital there.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, this question had been raised and answered during the time he had presided at the Admiralty. He had found the Establishments in the Island to be of great value to the West Coast Service.

MR. GORST said, he wished to know the total cost of the Establishments at the Island?

MR. T. BRASSEY said, that the cost was £2,400.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £47,584, to complete the sum for Medical Establishments at Home and Abroad.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, if hon. Members would turn to pages 100 and 101 they would see a reproduction of this Vote, and would find that Ireland only got the sum of £1,000 odd. Again, they would observe that not a single penny of the Marine Infirmary Vote was spent in Ireland. He entered his protest against the unjust distribution of these Votes.

MR. GORST said that the island having been alluded to as a ship now reappeared as a Hospital. He pressed upon the Government to say what the island actually cost, because he could not regard the answer given by the Secretary to the Admiralty as satisfactory. The amount which appeared on page 106 was only the extra pay of the garrison performing the duties of the island, to which had to be added the pay of the seamen and marines. The hon. Gentleman would remember that he had not mentioned the Kroomen. It appeared that the naval officers were assisted by a number of these savages in the performance of their duties in the island.

MR. T. BRASSEY said, the Kroomen were 34 in number, and their pay varied from 6d. a-day upwards.

Mr. Gorst

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the statements of accounts seemed to be very much confused. They had already, under Vote 5, passed a lump sum for the expense of the Britannia at Dartmouth. On page 90 he found a charge for a hospital for cadets, and that certain salaries were voted twice. In order to obtain an explanation of that, they were referred to page 160 in the Appendix, which really gave no information at all. The Vote for the Britannia was supposed to include all the expenses connected with that ship; but they had now to vote, for the second time, the salaries of the surgeons and sick porters on shore. He asked why the whole of the cost was not included in the Estimate for the Britannia on page 32? It had already been found that certain sums disappeared in some way or other; but they were now asked to vote the same sums twice over.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he thought the hon. Gentleman was mistaken. Although last year the sum of £934 was charged under Vote 5, it was this year charged under Vote 9.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, under the present Vote—that which had been just put from the Chair—there was a charge for Dartmouth Hospital for cadets.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the hon. Member would see that there were in the Estimates two columns, one showing the Votes for last year and the other for the present year, and that no part of this year's Vote was to be spent on the Establishment at Ascension.

MR. GORST said, the Committee had been informed a short time ago that the total cost of the Establishment at Ascension was £2,400. He now found that it was raised by other items to the sum of £4,000. Besides this, there must be added the full pay of the officers, seamen, and marines, of unknown number on board the Flora. It was perfectly true there were some receipts; but the Committee were not told what those receipts amounted to.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. and learned Gentleman will look he will see that the money has been taken under Vote 1, and that there is no money under this Vote taken for the Island of Ascension.

Vote agreed to.

vessels that could be available, he had ascertained there was a considerable number—he believed 30 or 40, perhaps more—and all of them were capable of steaming 14 to 15 knots an hour. By a very little alteration they could be turned into war vessels, and would add greatly to the cruising strength of the Navy. All these matters had to be taken into consideration when estimating the real strength of the Navy. The Mercantile Service must be considered as adding substantial strength to the Navy, on which to rely in time of war; and he was satisfied that no other Power had anything like the same number of vessels and her Mercantile Marine to fall back upon. In addition to those vessels, there were also several iron-clads, which had become obsolete as first-class ironclads, and which, by a certain expenditure, could be converted into cruisers. In the case of some of them, at all events, it was contemplated to turn them into cruisers by putting compound engines into them, and so increasing their speed. By that means, they would gain a considerable increase to the cruising strength of the Navy. He thought it would not be a wise policy to build at once 30 or 40 vessels of that kind. The better course would be to add to their number gradually. He could not, therefore, agree with his hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) in that respect. His hon. Friend went on to ask what was the intention of the Government with regard to the training of seamen for the Navy, and he quoted from the speech of the Civil Lord (Mr. Brassey), which was made recently, with reference to sending out seamen in sailing vessels. All that his hon. Friend (Mr. Brassey) had stated was that he considered it necessary for the Admiralty to send young seamen to sea; but he did not say what class of vessels they should be sent out in. The hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price), and his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), had raised the question as to the number of established men in the naval factories. His attention had not been called to that subject during the time he had been in Office; and it was the wish of the Board of Admiralty to postpone the consideration of such questions until the Board of Admiralty visited the

Dockyards in the autumn. They would then hear all that could be said on the subject by the various classes of workmen, and decide what was to be done. Such a question, he ventured to think, was scarcely a proper one to be discussed on the floor of that House. When he was at the Admiralty before, he had always advocated treating such questions by direct communication between the Board of Admiralty and the men; and he deprecated, as far as possible, making that question the subject of political discussion in that House. He did not believe that, in the long run, any class of workmen would be the gainers by making such a matter a political question; and he thought hon. Members ought to be satisfied to leave the authorities to deal with it. All such questions, he begged to assure the Committee, would be fairly considered when the Dockyards were visited by the Board of Admiralty. With reference to the general question of establishment, hon. Members would, no doubt, admit that it was one of great difficulty. Dockyard men were, till lately, divided into two classes—dockyardmen proper, and those who were employed in the factories. The first-named were entitled to superannuation, but not the latter. But in the year 1879 a change was made. The system of superannuation was introduced into the factories, to a limited extent. For his own part, he had been opposed to this change; but, inasmuch as it had been introduced, it could not be again withdrawn, and, therefore, the only question was to what extent it should be carried. Of course, the Committee must see that if they gave a man a pension they must proportionately reduce his wages. He believed that the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Massey Lopes) carried out that arrangement, and whenever a pension was granted a proportionate reduction in wages had been made. He did not think it wise to introduce that principle in the factories; but, as it had been introduced, the question to what extent it should be carried out would be the subject of the most careful consideration of the present Board of Admiralty. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had pointed out how important it was that the House should be informed every year, on the Estimates, whether the work promised in the previous Estimates, as regarded he thought it was one which could be legitimately and fairly brought forward. The inequality of the present system could be easily seen in the case of two men who did the same work and were of equally good character, one of whom might at once be placed on the Established List, while the other would have, perhaps, to begin counting his time only after the expiration of 10 years' service. He believed the Admiralty would see the justice of considering this question with a view to placing it on a fair and satisfactory basis.

MR. BENTINCK said, he believed this was the Vote upon which it was customary to go into the whole question as to the condition of the British Navy. He desired to make one or two remarks upon that subject, in consequence of what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty when it was last under discussion. Those who were present, he thought, would bear him out, and those who had read the remarks of the hon. Gentleman would, no doubt, go with him when he said that the statement referred to was of a very remarkable character. When they were last discussing this question, he had complained of the extreme indifference shown by the House of Commons to everything connected with the condition and welfare of the Navy of this country. In answer to that complaint, the hon. Gentleman argued that there was no indifference on the part of the House of Commons either to the welfare or condition of the Navy; but he said that the reason why there was such an apparent indifference to the question was that no Party spirit was imported into the discussion. He quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman on that point, and wished that fact would account for the very small number of Members who took an interest or part in these discussions. He believed the hon. Gentleman would do him the justice of acquitting him of introducing into the consideration of the question any Party feeling, for he had always endeavoured to point out what, in his opinion, had been the defects or errors in the conduct of the Board of Admiralty of the day without reference, in any way, to Party. The right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord would, he thought, also do him the justice to say that, with all the respect and goodwill which he had towards him, he had criticized his measures as frankly as the measures on the other side of the House. But the Secretary to the Admiralty had gone on to say that another reason why the House treated this great question with so much apparent indifference was that they did not share the alarms which he (Mr. Bentinck) entertained, and which he still confessed to entertain, as to the present condition of the British Navy. Moreover, he was bound to add that, after the statement which fell from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), he saw still further reason for alarm. The two points which he had endeavoured to bring before the House, and to which he had called the attention of the hon. Gentleman, were, in the first place, the want of a sufficient reserve of heavy ships of line-of-battle, of the class now known as iron-clads. He complained that no reserve of such ships existed to supply the inevitable casualties which must occur in a great naval action with ships of so fragile a character as iron-clads. The substance of the hon. Gentleman's reply was, in the first place, that he had an ample reserve of iron-clads; and he went on to say that the Coast Guard formed the Admiralty Reserve for that portion of the Navy. But he would like to hear a statement of facts which would tend to prove that he had a sufficient reserve of fighting ships in their Navy in the event of the inevitable casualties which must occur in a great naval action. He should be much gratified to hear how the hon. Gentleman made out that the ships now classed as amongst their Naval Reserve were ships qualified to take the place of their heavy iron-clads in action. Upon that point he would be very glad to have a clear explanation from the Secretary to the Admiralty. The second point to which he had referred was the total absence of cruising ships for the purpose of harassing the commerce of the enemy, of defending their own commerce in the event of war, and of maintaining complete control of the sea. And when he adverted to those points, he had called the attention of the hon. Gentleman to the fact that the question was one which not only related to the harassing of the enemies' commerce; but, under the present condition of things, was of the greatest importance with regard to the supply of food to the people of this country in case of war, and that, therefore, they were bound to have such a preponderance of fast cruising ships as would, at all events, insure their command of the sea. Well, the hon. Gentleman, with the frankness which always characterized him, had admitted that there was full reason for the complaint of the want of cruising ships; and he (Mr. Bentinck) was prepared to hear that admission followed by the announcement that the Government were about to devote their energies to the construction of a number of vessels of that kind. But, to his great disappointment and regret, the hon. Gentleman wound up by saying he hoped that they should, from time to time, add to their number. [Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: I said we were proposing to commence three cruisers.] He (Mr. Bentinck), thought the hon. Gentleman advanced an argument against himself. Of what use were three cruising ships in maintaining the ascendancy of Great Britain on the high seas? Forty or fifty ships of that class would be wanted to place the country both in a position to maintain her naval supremacy, and in a position which she must occupy, unless the people were to be reduced to a state of starvation in case of war. It was incredible to him that the hon. Gentleman, unless he had misunderstood him, should, from his place in Parliament, begin by telling the Committee that he admitted the deficiency in the number of their cruising ships; then, that he should go on to say that he hoped, from time to time, to add to their number; and, finally, that he was about to take measures for the construction of three such ships. He had urged these points on every successive Government for many years past; but that did not deter him from again adverting to questions which he considered to be of vital importance to the very existence of the country. The answer of the hon. Gentleman had filled him with astonishment; and the statement that the Admiralty were only about to construct three cruisers, he thought, fully bore out his assertion, made more than once, and to succeeding Governments, and to the House of Commons, that the people of this country were painfully and blindly indifferent to a question which related to their very existence as a nation. The fact was, Government after Government had dealt with this question, not with reference to their knowledge of the subject, or with reference to their convictions—they had dealt with it as a matter of political convenience. No Government, for years past, had had the courage to come down to the House and say that the cost of everything connected with the Navy had increased ten-fold in the last 20 years; consequently, that the cost of the Navy must be very largely increased. Unless the country was prepared to incur the necessary expense, its position, as a great nation, was one of the utmost peril.

MR. RYLANDS said, that the speech which the hon. Gentleman opposite had delivered to the Committee was one with which those hon. Members who had been in former Parliaments were perfectly familiar. He would do the hon. Gentleman the credit to say that he had upheld his testimony without reference to political considerations, and had complained alike whether his own Party or his political opponents were in power. The hon. Gentleman said that more money ought to be expended on the Navy, if they wished to avoid the destruction of England as a Naval Power. But he (Mr. Rylands) could not help remembering that they were paying a large sum—he thought a very exorbitant sum—for Navy Estimates. He very much questioned whether the country would be satisfied if they were told that, although they were spending £10,500,000 a-year—the late Government spent from £11,000,000 to £12,000,000—on the Navy, their naval supremacy was gradually declining. He had no such apprehensions. He believed, if the occasion should arise when they would have to protect the commerce of this country by cruisers, they had in their Mercantile Marine an enormous store of power which could be utilized in a very short period, and in such a way as to protect the commerce of Britain and maintain the naval supremacy of the country. He believed, however, that the enormous expenditure on account of the Navy might be cut down; for he did not believe that so large an expenditure was necessary to maintain the naval supremacy of this country. He did not wish it to be supposed that in any arguments he had used he was desirous of cutting down the naval power of the country; but he did think it was necessary to cut down that wasteful expenditure of the people's money which was going on. The hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price) had pressed upon the Committee the necessity of dipping their hands into the public purse in order to give employment to his constituents. He entirely disputed the contention of the hon. and gallant Member. He said that the policy which had been pursued with regard to the Dockyards had been found to be unsatisfactory, and had, in fact, induced the Government to engage in work which it would not have engaged in but from the necessity of finding employment for these establishment men. The hon. and gallant Gentleman could hardly be expected to look at this matter from a perfectly impartial point of view, representing, as he did, a Dockyard constituency; but if he would carefully investigate the amount paid by the country for pensions to these establishment men, he would find that this addition to the wages of these men was a matter for very serious consideration. He had very grave doubt whether the establishment principle was a wise one; but he certainly was of opinion that it was highly undesirable to extend it. They should keep establishments within narrow limits, for if they had a large number of men in the Dockyards they could not keep them in steady employment. He should like to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty to a matter which he hoped might be attended to in present and subsequent years. He held in his hand an amended programme of ship-building, to be executed during the years 1880-81, and he found in that programme that the total number of men to be employed was 15,772. He had also a statement of the total amount of work which was intended to be completed in the course of that year, which it appeared was 12,353 tons. He wished to ask the hon. Gentleman whether, at the end of the year, he could not lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing the tonnage of the ships which had been completed during the preceding 12 months, and also state the number of men who had been employed in completing that tonnage? He would tell the Committee why such a Return would be desirable. In 1877-8 the estimate of the right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord of the Admiralty was that there would be added to the Navy in that year 14,240 tons, and he asked the House for the wages of a certain number of men upon that footing. During the year the actual number of tons added to the Navy was 12,052, or a deduction of 15 per cent upon the estimate. At the same time, the wages paid to artificers stood at as high a sum as if the full amount of tonnage had been completed. He could not but regard that as a very unsatisfactory result. He thought that was a matter which required some explanation. He wished that there should be laid upon the Table of the House, as soon as possible after the close of the financial year, a statement enabling the House to test the Estimates of the Government, and to see whether the proposals of the Government had been carried out, and how far the amount of work completed and the number of men employed corresponded with the Estimates. He was reminded that there was laid upon the House annually a Return of the ship-building of the country. And from that Return, any hon. Member employing an accountant or private secretary might be able to inform himself with regard to the exact state of the case; but not being able to employ either an accountant or private secretary to make these investigations for him, he found it extremely difficult to obtain a satisfactory knowledge of the result of those Returns. However, he was of opinion that the Ship-building Accounts were presented at such a late period that they practically ceased to be of any use. The Return for 1877-8—that was to say, for the year's transactions ending March 31, 1878—was not placed in the hands of hon. Members until the beginning of the present year, or not till 18 months or two years after the period to which it referred, and when its examination was of no use. He had no doubt those Returns took a considerable time to arrange; but he could tell the hon. Gentleman—and he need scarcely inform the right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord of the Admiralty—that any private concern which did not balance up its affairs until two years after they had taken place would soon go into the Bankruptcy Court, or, at all events, would not be able to keep that grasp of its transactions which was necessary to insure economy. He hoped that the Government would look into this matter. He did not wish to press hardly upon a

Mr. Rylands

Government which had only recently come into Office; and he had the greatest confidence that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty would bring great ability to bear upon this subject. He hoped with regard to the Dockyards that they might find, on a subsequent occasion, that a better system had been adopted; and that while, on the one hand, considerable economy could be secured, on the other, greater results might be obtained by less expenditure.

Mr. GORST said, that he hoped Her Majesty's Government would not overlook this important question. He could assure the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), that the question raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price) was not only one of very great importance, but his observations upon it did not deserve to be received with the sneers they had met with. Hon. Members who were disposed to interrupt his hon. and gallant Friend, did not usually take any part in these debates. They only came in for the purpose of making a disturbance. The hon. Member for Burnley had hardly done justice to Gentlemen who represented Dockyard constituencies, when he stated that they could not approach this subject with any but a biased view. He should have thought that even the interests of a large body of workmen were deserving of some attention on the part of Gentlemen who, as Liberals, professed a special interest in the interests of the working classes; but he desired to discuss this question, not in the interest of the people employed, but in the interest of the country at large. He did not think that hon. Members who interrupted properly understood the state of things in their Dockyards at the present time. They employed a great number of workmen; and it was for the interest of the country that they should employ the best workmen who could be obtained at the ordinary rates of labour. To employ second-rate shipwrights, smiths, and fitters was no wise economy; but they ought to have the pick of shipwrights, smiths, and artificers throughout the country. How were arrangements made in order to produce that effect? The principle of the dockyard was that men were put upon the establishment. They were engaged at something less than ordinary wages of labour in their own trade; but they were insured a regular and constant employment, and they received what the hon. Member for Burnley called pension, but which was really deferred pay, for the purpose of making them steady and industrious in their work, and inducing them to remain in the Dockyard. In the first place, by that system, they obtained the pick of men in the country, and they were sure of their services at any time, whether great activity prevailed in the ship-building trade or not. But for such an arrangement, at a period of great activity in the ship-building trade they might have a difficulty in getting men; and it was necessary for the safety of the country to have a number of men upon whom they could rely in times of emergency. In practice, about half of the number of men employed in the Dockyards were not on the establishment. They were hired by the State like any ordinary employer of labour, and that system produced this bad result. They could not get such good hired men as those who worked on the establishment; and, on the other hand, if the rate of wages rose—if a war broke out, or if there were great activity in the ship-building trade—they would find that they would have to increase the wages of the hired artificers. So that, by having to pay extra wages in times of dearth, they would far more than swallow up the extra cost of the men on the establishment in time of peace. Men not on the establishment always felt themselves in a position of inferiority to those on the establishment. The hired shipwrights worked side by side with the establishment men. It was true that they got slightly higher wages; but they had not the same security of permanent employment, particularly when a Liberal Government was in Office, and they were always in fear of losing their employment by retrenchment. Those men felt uncertainty in their work, which made them dissatisfied with their position. Hon. Members below the Gangway on the other side sneered at these arguments; but those artificers had themselves and their families to support, and were as anxious for security for their small incomes as hon. Members were for the security of their large incomes. The hon. and gallant Member for Devonport had not been ashamed to stand up and state that those men were not treated fairly and properly. Those men knew that they were working side by side with establishment men, who were gradually accumulating deferred pay in the shape of annuity, which would render them comfortable for the rest of their days when they could no longer work; and they felt themselves to be suffering under great injustice in not being allowed to enjoy a similar advantage. When the establishment was first instituted, men were always after a few years of probation placed on the establishment. But, at present, men were kept out of the establishment for 12 and 15 years in order to save their pensions. He did not think that was a wise course for the country to pursue. He was not asking money from the public purse to distribute amongst his constituents; but he thought it would be wise if the Admiralty would look into the whole system, and would treat all the men upon the same principle. If there was one thing workpeople liked more than another, it was equality. They could not see why, if two men were working side by side at the same job year after year, one man should be able to earn a pension which would make him comfortable for the rest of his days, while the other had no such prospects. That was the case. It was a very simple question, and it ought to receive the serious consideration of the Admiralty. He thought that the remarks of his hon. and gallant Friend were worthy of attention; and he should not have risen to take any part in the discussion if he had not felt indignant at hon. Gentlemen, who actually took no part in the discussion of Naval Estimates, interrupting his hon. and gallant Friend.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had again raised the discussion of the question which occupied the House when the first Votes were taken this year, and his reply must, consequently, partake of the character of a recapitulation of the statements he then made. The hon. Member complained of the reserves of iron-clads. In reply, he must point out that there was, at the present time, a larger number of iron-clads in their first-class Reserves in the Dockyards than at any former period. There were five such vessels—namely, the Dreadnought, the Sultan, the Nelson, the Devastation, and the Swiftsure, and to these would shortly be added the Neptune, the Superb, and the Orion; while in the course of the year the number would be increased by the Inflexible, which would be the strongest vessel afloat. Next year there would also be added to the Navy the Ajax and the Agamemnon. He frankly admitted, on a former occasion, that it would be desirable to hasten on the iron-clads building in the Dockyards; and they had, to the best of their ability, acted in this direction. He had pointed out that it was not possible, with due regard to economy, to employ more than a certain number of men upon each individual ship. They had closely approached that limit in the proposals they had made. He would venture to hope that next year they might be able to complete a larger tonnage of iron-clads than during the present year. On the last occasion on which he had spoken on the matter before the House, he had pointed out that the Admiralty proposed to build, by contract, three very fast cruisers. He pointed out that there was a greater reason to complain of the want of cruisers than of iron-clads. Looking to the fact that during the last two years there had been but a small amount of this class of vessels added to the Navy, he stated that they were going to build three first-class cruisers, and he might also state that they were now completing four corvettes, not, perhaps, first-class cruisers, but powerful and valuable vessels; and, in addition to this, there were seven sloops also in course of construction. He had before him a list of 10 vessels which were of the greatest value. Amongst them were the Inconstant, the Shah, the Boadicea, the Bacchante, and the Euryalus. Therefore, they already had in the Navy 10 vessels which could steam at a greater speed than 14 knots an hour. In the present year they proposed to add three more such vessels to this list, and he hoped that, from time to time, they would be able to add further to it. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), as regarded the Mercantile Marine, that it would be a great source of strength in the event of a war. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith), when there was a prospect of a war with Russia, made inquiry into the state of the Mercantile Marine. Of first-class vessels that could be available, he had ascertained there was a considerable number—he believed 30 or 40, perhaps more—and all of them were capable of steaming 14 to 15 knots an hour. By a very little alteration they could be turned into war vessels, and would add greatly to the cruising strength of the Navy. All these matters had to be taken into consideration when estimating the real strength of the Navy. The Mercantile Service must be considered as adding substantial strength to the Navy, on which to rely in time of war; and he was satisfied that no other Power had anything like the same number of vessels and her Mercantile Marine to fall back upon. In addition to those vessels, there were also several iron-clads, which had become obsolete as first-class ironclads, and which, by a certain expenditure, could be converted into cruisers. In the case of some of them, at all events, it was contemplated to turn them into cruisers by putting compound engines into them, and so increasing their speed. By that means, they would gain a considerable increase to the cruising strength of the Navy. He thought it would not be a wise policy to build at once 30 or 40 vessels of that kind. The better course would be to add to their number gradually. He could not, therefore, agree with his hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) in that respect. His hon. Friend went on to ask what was the intention of the Government with regard to the training of seamen for the Navy, and he quoted from the speech of the Civil Lord (Mr. Brassey), which was made recently, with reference to sending out seamen in sailing vessels. All that his hon. Friend (Mr. Brassey) had stated was that he considered it necessary for the Admiralty to send young seamen to sea; but he did not say what class of vessels they should be sent out in. The hon. and gallant Member for Devonport (Captain Price), and his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), had raised the question as to the number of established men in the naval factories. His attention had not been called to that subject during the time he had been in Office; and it was the wish of the Board of Admiralty to postpone the consideration of such questions until the Board of Admiralty visited the

Dockyards in the autumn. They would then hear all that could be said on the subject by the various classes of workmen, and decide what was to be done. Such a question, he ventured to think, was scarcely a proper one to be discussed on the floor of that House. When he was at the Admiralty before, he had always advocated treating such questions by direct communication between the Board of Admiralty and the men; and he deprecated, as far as possible, making that question the subject of political discussion in that House. He did not believe that, in the long run, any class of workmen would be the gainers by making such a matter a political question; and he thought hon. Members ought to be satisfied to leave the authorities to deal with it. All such questions, he begged to assure the Committee, would be fairly considered when the Dockyards were visited by the Board of Admiralty. With reference to the general question of establishment, hon. Members would, no doubt, admit that it was one of great difficulty. Dockyard men were, till lately, divided into two classes—dockyardmen proper, and those who were employed in the factories. The first-named were entitled to superannuation, but not the latter. But in the year 1879 a change was made. The system of superannuation was introduced into the factories, to a limited extent. For his own part, he had been opposed to this change; but, inasmuch as it had been introduced, it could not be again withdrawn, and, therefore, the only question was to what extent it should be carried. Of course, the Committee must see that if they gave a man a pension they must proportionately reduce his wages. He believed that the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Massey Lopes) carried out that arrangement, and whenever a pension was granted a proportionate reduction in wages had been made. He did not think it wise to introduce that principle in the factories; but, as it had been introduced, the question to what extent it should be carried out would be the subject of the most careful consideration of the present Board of Admiralty. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had pointed out how important it was that the House should be informed every year, on the Estimates, whether the work promised in the previous Estimates, as regarded ship-building, had been carried out. He had also pointed out that for the last three or four years in succession those promises had not been carried out. He could only say that it had been usual for Ministers, when laying the Estimates before the House, to state what work had been accomplished during the previous year; but he hoped next year to be able to lay upon the Table of that House a Return giving fuller details of that matter. When the arrangements were completed, and that Return was before them, they would be able to see how much of the money expended had been devoted to ship-building or ship-preparing. He thought he had now answered all the Questions which had been asked, and he hoped that the Vote would then be agreed to.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty a question which, perhaps, he was in a position to answer. A Committee was appointed by the late Board of Admiralty, in conjunction with the then Secretary of State for War, in reference to the guns to be placed in those ships. He had himself considered that some arrangement might be come to by which some sort of composition might be introduced, so that the Naval Service should not rely entirely on the Woolwich Gun Factory. He did not know whether the hon. Gentleman was in a position to give to the Committee any information on the subject. He was sure that he would agree with him that that was the right course to take as regarded the matter of guns for large ships.

MR. BENTINCK said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had taken exception to what he had stated with reference to additional expenditure; but he was bound to say that he considered that the greatest economy would be practised by adding largely to the strength of the Navy. He must remind his hon. Friend, with all respect to him, that he seemed to have lost sight in his argument of one important fact. He admitted the necessity of having an efficient Navy, and yet when he talked of economy he seemed to forget the increased cost of everything connected with the Navy. If they were to have an efficient Navy, he would remind him that it must be at a cost much in excess of that of former years. That was a point that the hon. Gentleman seemed to have forgotten; and he wished to impress upon him the necessity of considering it when talking of the efficiency of the Navy. He should like to say one word with regard to what fell from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty with reference to such enormous iron-clads as the Inflexible. There could be no doubt, and, in fact, it was well known, that ships such as that were regarded as being of a very doubtful character; and it was for consideration whether they contributed to the real available strength of the Navy of this country. He also said that they relied upon a number of Coast Guard ships of bygone days as line-of-battle ships. He (Mr. Bentinck) considered that such vessels were practically useless; and he thought it was hardly right to treat these in the number of cruisers when there was no intention of increasing that class of vessel by new ones. He could not, therefore, agree with his hon. Friend in that matter. Some hon. Member had alluded to the question of the conversion of merchant-men into naval vessels. For his part, he had great doubts whether they would turn out to be useful or not. There were many objections to them, not the least of which was that it was a work of time before those ships could be converted into efficient cruising vessels. He believed that in the event of an outbreak of war such vessels would come too late; everything would have to be done, and nothing would be ready; and this country would find itself in a position of extreme difficulty, not to say jeopardy. The whole subject, in fact, required very serious attention. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty said that all those things would have to be attended to with due regard to economy; and that was where he differed from him. He fully agreed, however, with his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) as to the necessity of economizing, as much as possible, in the Navy; but he denied that allowing the Navy of this country to remain in a state of inefficiency was entitled to be classed under the head of economy. He contended that economy must give way, if a too rigid adherence to it would be likely to entail national disaster.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he was unable to answer fully the question of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith). He could, however, say that they agreed with him that it was important that the Admiralty should be in a position to order guns from some other source than Woolwich. Arrangements had already been made with Messrs. Armstrong to manufacture a 43-ton gun, and also 14 6-inch guns. With regard to the former, until it was completed and tried, it was impossible to say whether further orders could be given. It would depend upon the trial; and, if successful, a similar one would be ordered by the War Office.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had moved an Amendment to reduce the Vote. He mentioned that for the information of those hon. Members who had been dining. The new Members—of whom he was one—had kept the House, according to the advice received on the first evening. He moved to reduce the Vote as a protest against the system by which the whole of the Navy expenditure was made for the benefit of this country, to the entire exclusion of Ireland. He had already pointed out how the bulk of the money under that Vote, both for wages and labour, was spent in England, and how not one-thousandth part went for the benefit of Ireland. He should propose a similar reduction of the amount which had to be voted for Dockyards in England—namely, £13,000, because that represented the amount which ought properly to be spent in Ireland on that Service. As he understood the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty, he admitted the force of his complaint, and stated that the Government intended to proceed with the works now in course of completion until the Dockyard in Ireland was finished. If he was mistaken, perhaps the hon. Gentleman would correct him. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) proposed to proceed with the works at present in hand at Haulbowline; but if they really intended to build the Dockyard, then he could not see why no sum was asked for for that purpose in the Dockyard Vote they were then discussing. When he proposed his Amendment the hon. Gentleman had said that it should properly have come in the consideration of Vote 11, and stated that the sum proposed to be spent at Haulbowline would be found under that head. He had turned to that Vote, and found a sum of £30,000 on account of those works; but that was nothing like the sum required in order to catch up or overtake the sum which had already been spent in similar work in England. If such a sum as £120,000 or £100,000 were asked for for that purpose, he should be willing to withdraw his Amendment for the reduction of the present Vote. The hon. Gentlemen had given the Irish Members an assurance that that dockyard work in Ireland would be proceeded with immediately and with the greatest possible despatch. The hon. Gentleman had not been connected with the Admiralty so long as he (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had been with another Department of the Public Service; and he knew that there was no difficulty whatever in transferring an item of the Vote if the Treasury chose to do so, or in allowing the amount to be expended on works in Ireland. If the hon. Gentleman would say that a much more considerable sum would be spent than what appeared then on the Estimates, he would not only withdraw his Amendment, but promise not to oppose Vote 11 when it came on.

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand that the hon. Member wishes to withdraw his Amendment. Is it your pleasure that the said Amendment be withdrawn?

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, that the present course of spending the public money for a Dockyard in Ireland was a mistake. If they really wanted a Dockyard at Haulbowline, it ought to be proceeded with. If not, driblets of £10,000 or £20,000 ought not to be thrown away on it. He could tell the Secretary to the Admiralty that the Government had been supposed to be bent on building a Dockyard there for nearly a century. In 1799 the vote of an Irish Member of Parliament, who represented a constituency near Haulbowline, was sought to be purchased by the Minister of that day by undertaking that the Imperial Parliament should build a Dockyard there. In the year 1801 or 1802, Parliament began the driblet system, pretending to keep faith with the man whose vote they had bought over.

THE CHAIRMAN: I wish to point out to the hon. and learned Member that the Vote for Haulbowline comes under Vote 11.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he was not aware that that Vote was referred to under Vote 11 until then. He should not have attempted to raise that point at all, had it not been that he thought that the question of the prosecution of the Haulbowline works ought to be considered under that head. He took it that the English Dockyards were considered under the present Vote.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he rose to correct a misunderstanding of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down. The present Vote was not the one under which the question he had raised could be considered. The wages of the men employed in the Dockyard were provided in Vote 6; but the cost of the works proposed to be carried out was provided for under Vote 11. Therefore, when that Vote came on it would be the right time to discuss the matter referred to by the hon. Member.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he begged to thank the right hon. Gentleman for his suggestion, and he should raise the question under Vote 11.

MR. BIGGAR said, that, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) and the explanation of the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), it seemed undesirable at the present moment to raise the question of the Vote for Haulbowline. But, considering the fact that no wages could be charged for shipbuilders until the works there were completed, it appeared to him that the question did enter within the limits of the present discussion. He thought that to move to reduce the Vote was not, however, the way to obtain the object they had in view. The proper way seemed to be to raise a discussion on the subject, and to press it upon the attention of the Committee. To move to reduce the Vote was not, by any means, a direct way of proceeding. Nothing like the sum that ought to be spent had been spent on those works; and he thought, therefore, that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Sullivan) was fully justified in raising a discussion of the question. Certainly, an alteration ought to be made in the present system of voting money for those works, and it was most desirable that they should be finished as soon as possible.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. A. M. Sullivan

MR. JENKINS said, that he found, under the head of "Foreign Dockyards and Allowances for Naval Arsenals," Vote 10, a sum of £43,600, and a further sum of £166,500, for expenses in foreign Yards. He wished to obtain some information on that head. The money expended in home Yards was explained; but no information was given as to the expenditure for foreign Yards. A large sum of money seemed to be spent in re-fitting and repairing ships in commission; and it was, he thought, most desirable as regarded that expenditure. He thought that the sum spent was much more than absolutely necessary—for instance, the sum spent at Hong Kong was very large, and they should have some details as to what ships were repaired at that station, and the cost of such repairs. He hoped that the Board of Admiralty would take that matter into their consideration, and would furnish the House with all the information they could upon the subject.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the Return they proposed in another year to lay before the House would give all the information desired upon that subject.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, they had drifted away for some time from the question before the Committee. They had gone into a discussion as regarded wages of artisans and other classes of men, and had heard hon. Gentlemen talking about the "wages of my constituents." He did not find fault with Gentlemen from England or Ireland trying to gain advantages for their constituents, or wanting a share of the money spent in the localities represented; but he begged to remind them that they had met there for the good of the country, and not for the benefit of any particular constituency. He should like to say a few words upon that Vote. They spent an enormous sum in wages; but he thought they saw little for it. Some hon. Member—he had forgotten who it was—said that there had been more expenditure than last year, and less to show for it. He could not understand how that was so. He thought that those works in Her Majesty's Yards compared very unfavourably with those of the Mercantile Marine. In the latter, they could always get a large ship built in six or eight months; whereas, in the Dockyards, they took four or five years.

been taken a little earlier than was expected, and, therefore, he was not in the House; but his right hon. Friend had told him that he thought the question had much better be discussed when it arose on the Votes. And he was inclined to agree with him that that was certainly not the most convenient way of raising the whole question. With respect to a question put to him by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill), he begged to state that the Endowed Schools Bill (Ireland) would stand over.

MAJOR NOLAN thought he had a right to complain. The Government promised to give him an answer on Report, and, therefore, he did not go into the question in Committee. He knew, of course, that it was an accident that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was not there; but, still, he thought he was entitled to an answer, and if the Government did not keep to arrangements which they made in this way, how could any trust be put in them? It was not at all a fair thing to say that the matter had better be discussed in Committee, when he had been promised an explanation on the Report, and it could scarcely be called fair and straightforward conduct.

Resolutions agreed to.

TAXES MANAGEMENT BILL.—[BILL 242.]

(Lord Frederick Cavendish, Mr. John Holms.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it was merely a measure of consolidation, brought in in consequence of the recommendation of the Statute Law Consolidation Commission, and its object was fully described in the Memorandum attached. He could not understand that there could be any objection to it; but, if there were any, it had much better be considered in Committee. There could not possibly be any objection to the principle of the Bill, which was to embody in one measure all the provisions of the law relating to taxes.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, they had a Bill of a similar kind before them the other evening, and the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury then told them it was merely a measure of consolidation; but, on examination, it was found that if it had been passed some of its clauses would have been directly opposed to the spirit of the Budget of the Prime Minister. Now the noble Lord brought in another Bill containing 120 clauses, which, he ventured to say, no single Member in that House had any knowledge of. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, he doubted very much whether the hon. Member who said that had ever seen the Bill before. It consolidated an enormous number of Acts, and he would like to ask whether this was a Bill for which the noble Lord was himself responsible, or whether he found it in the office when he came there? If the Bill had been brought up in the short time during which the present Government had been in Office, he should not like to take the noble Lord's assurance that it was merely a consolidation measure.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH denied that he in any way misled the House in reference to the Spirits Bill. Certain provisions were inserted into it which were in accordance with the existing law, although they would be modified if a measure since introduced were carried. But it would have deceived the House had not those clauses been produced, because the Malt Tax was in existence at the time, and his measure only professed to be a consolidation of the existing law. He should state most positively that this was simply a consolidation Bill, with the exception of the alterations mentioned.

MR. GORST said, no answer had been given to the question whether the Bill was prepared by the present Government—[LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Certainly not.]—or whether they found it in the office when they went there? If the Bill was prepared by the late Government, he thought they might have sufficient confidence in the measure to allow it to pass.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

but the Committee had made up their minds long ago. The Secretary to the Admiralty had told them that he did not intend to do anything before the end of the Session, and the Committee had no guarantee that the question would be dealt with next Session.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was hardly fair that an hon. Gentleman should propose to pass a Vote of Want of Confidence in the Admiralty, because, as he said, there had been great delay in former years in dealing with this matter, and because, after being but a few weeks in Office, his hon. Friend was unable to comply with a demand involving the reorganization of an important body of men, and, therefore, requiring a great deal of consideration. And then, because the hon. Gentleman had not laid the Report upon the Table of the House, he had proposed to pass by his Department altogether, without allowing the time asked for consideration of the matter, and to proceed at once to the examination of the Report.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, he recognized no distinction whatever between one Government or another, so far as this matter was concerned. He was perfectly consistent in the matter, and repeated that the House had not dealt with the question of the Royal Marines as they ought to have done in a straightforward manner. The last Government had instituted an inquiry; after many years' delay they had appointed a Committee; and he now asked that, as the Committee had reported months ago, its Report should, like other Reports, be laid upon the Table of the House.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the Committee had only been appointed a few months ago. Their Report, therefore, had only been, as the hon. Gentleman opposite had stated, a few weeks before the Board of Admiralty. There was much difficulty in fully considering a question of this character, and arriving at a fair conclusion. A great deal had been done for the Royal Marines during the last Parliament. His hon. and gallant Friend must remember very well that the retirement of the officers had been raised and placed on the same scale as those in the Army, and the pensions of non-commissioned officers had also been increased. It then became necessary to consider the position of the corps as a whole, and he had thought it right to appoint a Departmental Committee to consider the question. The matter being one of great importance, he should deprecate any hasty decision on the part of the Government. Such a decision would not be fair either to the corps itself or to the interests of the country. However, he thought that as soon as a decision was arrived at it should be announced to the House. He believed the corps was necessary to the strength of the country; and all the Committee had been instructed to consider was how its efficiency might best be forwarded, while the interests of the officers were to be especially considered.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had said that his hon. and gallant Friend had passed by the Board of Admiralty. But it was the Secretary to the Admiralty who had, on every occasion, passed by the Board by his referring everything to the decision of Lord Northbrook.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £758,250, to complete the sum for Naval Stores for Building and Repairing the Fleet, &c.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what progress had been made in ascertaining the amount of naval stores remaining on hand? It was well known that the Admiralty authorities were perfectly in the dark as to the amount of stores they possessed. Again, the system of periodical sales by auction had been pointed to by the Comptroller and Auditor General, as resulting in the inevitable waste of public money. He (Mr. O'Connor) hoped the Secretary to the Admiralty would admit that the question was one which called for immediate attention; and the least the Committee could expect was an assurance that the question would be dealt with before the Estimates of next year were laid upon the Table.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, in consequence of the representations of the Comptroller and Auditor General, arrangements had been made for taking regular accounts of the stores in the Dockyards. It was not a new arrangement; but the audits had fallen somewhat into arrear, and an arrangement had been made by which they would be very much accelerated. Only two days ago the Treasury had sanctioned an extra grant for the purpose. He hoped that the explanation would satisfy the hon. Member.

MR. GORST asked whether both sections of this Vote were to be taken together, or whether one section was to be discussed at a time? He believed it was usual to take one section at a time.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he should first put Section 1.

Vote agreed to.

(7) £556,750, to complete the sum for Machinery and Ships built by Contract.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he should like to ask the hon. Gentleman what arrangements had been made with regard to the outstanding claims for deficiencies in the stores of the training ship Gibraltar? He believed that the deficiencies had amounted to several thousand pounds, and he should like to know what steps had been taken.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he was sorry he could not give the hon. Member an answer on that occasion, inasmuch as the question was new to him. At all events, he could not reply upon this section of the Vote, which was for ships built by contract and not for stores. If the hon. Member would bring forward a question upon Report he would give him an answer.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £419,213, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of New Works, Buildings, Yard Machinery, and Repairs, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881.”

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he should like to know what course the Admiralty was taking with regard to the Naval Barracks at Portsmouth? That was a question of very serious importance. There could be no doubt that some of the depôt vessels at Portsmouth were rapidly decaying, and that it would not be possible to replace them without great outlay. The late Admiralty gave very careful consideration to this matter, and arrived at the decision to commence new barracks. He hoped that their successors had seen fit to adopt their decision to construct buildings sufficient to accommodate 1,000 men. The present condition of the Duke of Wellington flag ship was very serious, and a large outlay would be required upon her for the next few years, unless these designs were carried out. There was not another ship which could be brought into service without an expenditure approaching that which would be necessary for restoring her.

MR. T. BRASSEY said, that this question had come under the consideration of the present Admiralty, and they had arrived at the conclusion to carry out the designs of the late First Lord. The question of site, as the right hon. Gentleman knew, had given rise to a certain amount of discussion, and it had been thought better to postpone the final decision as to the site until the Government had had further opportunities of considering it. In other respects the Government had approved the policy which recommended itself to the late Board of Admiralty, and had decided to carry out their designs.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that he hoped before this Vote was taken Her Majesty's Government would give Irish Members some clear undertaking as to what it intended to do with regard to the Dockyard works in Ireland. At the present time they were far from having any clear idea as to the intentions of the Government. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty had stated that it was proposed to take the sum of £30,000 during the present year for the Dockyard works of Haulbowline. The hon. Gentleman must have thought hon. Members were exceedingly ignorant as to the expenses of the Dockyards. He must have been aware that when, 15 years ago, it was proposed to establish Dockyards at Portsmouth and Chatham, the Admiralty authorities applied to Parliament for an Act authorizing an expenditure of £1,500,000 for Portsmouth, and for Chatham of something over £1,000,000. Since that date the Admiralty had entered into contracts £700,000 in excess of the amount they had estimated for. Year after year they had taken tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of pounds for these Dockyards. By an Act of Parliament they were limited to £1,000,000 and £1,500,000 respectively for the Dockyards; but they had exceeded their authority, without the sanction of Parliament, in the case of Portsmouth to the extent of £700,000, and in the case of Chatham to £800,000. They had never accounted to Parliament for that excess of expenditure over the authorized Estimates; but they had never hesitated to spend money on the Dockyards of this country. But with regard to Dockyards in Ireland, he would challenge hon. Gentlemen to show him any single case where the amount estimated for had been expended. Frequently the money had been returned to the Treasury as unexpended, although Parliament had voted it for Irish Dockyards. He maintained that it was trifling with Irish Members to announce the intention of the Government to establish Dockyards in Ireland, and only to ask £30,000 on account of them. That sum did not amount to a hundredth part of what had been expended upon Portsmouth and Chatham. At the rate at which they were now building the Irish Dockyard, it would not be completed in 100 years. What use was it to tell the people of Ireland that a Dockyard was being constructed in that country, when it was building at such a rate as this? Moreover, they had no assurance from the Treasury that the sum voted would be actually expended; and he must ask that the Government should give an assurance that the money would be expended. He should also like to know in what time they might expect to see the work completed?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, perhaps hon. Members were not aware that the works at Haulbowline were being carried out by convict labour. When he was at Haulbowline, he was informed that there was an excellent stone in the neighbourhood, which could be quarried in the most excellent and perfect manner at one-third of the price it could be contracted to be delivered at Haulbowline. But notwithstanding that, it would have been a very great advantage to the neighbourhood that local stone should have been used; yet the late Admiralty chose, for some reason or other which the officials on the spot did not understand, to make a contract with some large stone merchant to bring stone from England and land it at Haulbowline. Moreover, the quality of that stone was slightly inferior to that which could be quarried on the spot.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, it was intended to spend about £25,000 upon works at Haulbowline, that being the same amount as had been spent during the last few years. He admitted that it was not a large amount; but he had always understood, as convict labour was employed upon the construction of part of the Dock, it was not possible to push the works very rapidly. The state of crime in Ireland had been such that the number of convicts was not considerable; and, therefore, the work had not progressed very much. With regard to the observations of the noble Lord, he could give no explanation; and it was a matter for which his Predecessors were responsible, rather than the present Board of Admiralty.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he was not aware of any contract of the sort referred to by the noble Lord having been made; but if the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty would allow him to obtain information at the Admiralty, he would give an explanation to the noble Lord.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he would give Notice of the Question.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that the employment of convict labour was a matter of great grievance to Portsmouth. It was very hard upon the builders of Portsmouth to have to compete with convict labour; and he wished to know whether convict labour was to be employed at Portsmouth Dockyard?

MR. T. BRASSEY said, it was not intended to employ convict labour upon the barracks in Portsmouth Dockyard. Convicts had been employed in making foundations; but as soon as the plans had been decided on the work would be placed in the hands of contractors.

MR. GORST said, that he wished to ask Her Majesty's Government one or two questions. The first related to the Naval College at Greenwich. It seemed that a Vote was taken for half the cost of decorating Greenwich Chapel; and he supposed he was not wrong in imagining that the other half of the cost was to be paid out of the Greenwich Hospital Fund. He should wish to ask the hon. Gentleman the Civil Lord of the Admiralty upon what principle the half cost of decorating the chapel was charged upon the Greenwich Hospital Funds? There were no pensioners at present to use the chapel, and it was solely for the benefit of the naval officers at the College. He thought that if the chapel needed decoration the whole charge ought to be defrayed out of the Estimates of the country. The second question he wished to ask was with regard to Ascension Island. As on this occasion a substantial sum was charged in respect of Ascension Island, he thought he should be in Order in raising the question. The sum of £1,000 was charged in respect to ordinary repairs and maintenance of buildings; and, no doubt, there was a regular annual charge for repairs of buildings, as well as for wages, at Ascension Island. He wished to know whether the Government, some day or other, would give the House a Return of the whole cost of maintaining Ascension Island? It might be very proper to maintain it, and he did not wish to cast any slur upon either the present or the late Admiralty for treating the island like a ship; but he did think that the House ought to have before it the whole expense of maintaining the island. In almost every Vote there appeared some charge or other for the maintenance of something at Ascension Island; and it was only fair to the House to have before it, in some shape or other, the whole cost of maintaining Ascension Island.

MR. T. BRASSEY said, that with regard to the chapel at Greenwich Hospital, it was used partly by boys at Greenwich School, and that was the reason for half of the cost being paid out of the Greenwich Hospital Fund. As respected Ascension Island, a statement would be prepared and laid before the House which would give the hon. and learned Member the information he required. Personally, he should be very glad of that statement.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty seemed to be in a very mirthful mood, for he had been good enough to say that the Government restricted their Vote on account of Haulbowline Dockyard to £30,000, because they employed only convict labour, and that as there were few convicts in Ireland it was not possible to push the work. That was the reason given why the just claim of Ireland for a Dockyard was not to be met at present. Some time ago he pressed the Government to tell him the time which the Dockyard would take in construction, and what steps the Government would take to press that completion forward? That question had not been answered, and the hon. Gentleman did not seem to think it necessary to answer it. He wished to point out to the Committee that this £30,000 was one-seventeenth part of the cost of Haulbowline Dockyard. Anyone listening to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty would imagine that the Government had determined at last to do something in the way of Dockyards in Ireland; but what they proposed to do did not give any evidence of their intention. If the Government had any intention of giving a Dockyard to Ireland, it would be satisfactory to Irish Members to know that. Irish Members did not propose to let the matter be lost sight of, or to allow the Government to take only £30,000 for Dockyards in Ireland. When they were on Vote 6, they were told that the question of Irish Dockyards ought not to be raised upon it. He raised it on the present Vote, because he found that the Government were spending £8,000 more than they were authorized to spend upon English Dockyards. They were now asking £112,000 for the works at Portsmouth; and in order to test the sense of the Committee he begged to move the reduction of the Vote by that sum.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £307,213, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of New Works, Buildings, Yard Machinery, and Repairs, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

CAPTAIN PRICE said, that this Dockyard at Haulbowline was either necessary or it was not. If it were unnecessary, it ought to be removed from the Votes; but if necessary, the Government ought to press it forward. It was perfectly ridiculous to think of completing a Dockyard by spending £20,000 or £30,000 upon it for the last few years. He had been at Haulbowline, and he had seen the way in which the work was carried on there. The harbour was silted up almost as fast as it could be dredged. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty had given as his reason for the work not being pushed forward that convict labour was not in excess in Ireland; but he would ask the Government why convicts only should be employed on this work? They all knew what convict labour was. If a little drop of rain came, all the convicts were marched off under cover, and the work was at a standstill. But there were a great many labourers in Ireland who did not care for rain, and who would do the work much better than the convicts did. He should have thought that, looking at the necessity to provide work for the people in Ireland, the Government might have made this a time to push forward this work, and instead of asking for £30,000 they might have asked for £60,000. In a strategic point of view, it was most important to have a Dockyard at Haulbowline. He believed that in that opinion every hon. and gallant Member in that House would bear him out.

MR. DALY said, that the reason alleged for the smallness of the Vote for the Dockyard at Haulbowline was that it was to be entirely executed by convict labour. He could not understand why works should be done in England by contract, and in Ireland by convict labour only. In the immediate neighbourhood of Haulbowline both men and material were ready at hand, and employment was sorely needed by the people. Why were they, who were taking their share of the Imperial Government and of the Imperial taxation, to be told that the work was to be done entirely by convict labour, in spite of the necessity for giving employment in the neighbourhood of Haulbowline?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that he hoped the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) did not understand him as not giving a complete answer to his question. He had informed the hon. Member that he was not possessed of full information upon this subject. He had further told him that the delay in the progress of the work was due, in a great measure, to the employment of convict labour. Seeing the difficulties in the way, he did not understand how it would be possible to employ a greater amount of labour. No further amount of labour had been provided for in the Estimates. The work was carried out almost entirely by convicts, and it was impossible to get other labourers to work on the same spot with convicts. He had been informed that it was simply impracticable to increase the strength of the labour employed either in the area of the basin or that of the dock.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, that with regard to Haulbowline, he wished to state that that he believed the inhabitants of the district were well satisfied that as much labour was being employed there as could be advantageously employed.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, it was natural to suppose that after the testimony of the hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down he should be disposed to withdraw his Amendment; but he could not reconcile that proceeding with his duty not only to his constituents, but also to the main body of the taxpayers in Ireland. The hon. and gallant Member for Cork (Colonel Colthurst) had said that as much labour as possible was employed at Haulbowline, and he (Mr. O'Connor) quite believed that. They knew perfectly well that a larger number of convicts was employed than of free labourers, and it was a well-known fact that less work was obtained from convict labour than from any other kind. There appeared to be no reason whatever why the works should not be pushed on more rapidly. Haulbowline was a large place, where free labour could easily be employed, as well as convict labour. There could be two separate gangs, so that no possible inconvenience could arise from being employed on the same work. As a matter of fact, the Secretary to the Admiralty had admitted that the two kinds of labour might be employed together, and he believed that that was being done elsewhere. The fact was that there was no real difficulty in the matter; but the present Government was like its Predecessors, and would not move until they saw that the Irish Members were determined. He should consider it his duty to press his Motion to a division.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he had heard that subject discussed for a very considerable time, as to whether those works should be carried on or no. He was so anxious to make inquiry with regard to that matter of the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith), and he was sure that he would be doing a kindness to many hon. Members if he would be good enough to answer it. It was with reference to the employment of labour at Haulbowline. Could he say whether the labour employed there when he left Office was to the full extent to which it ought to be carried?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had already stated that as much labour was employed when he left Office, and during the whole of the autumn and spring, as it was possible profitably to employ at Haulbowline. The men were employed upon the construction of the great dock, and in the excavation of the basin also. Free labour was employed in the dock and convict labour in the basin, and the two sets were kept distinct. They had done all they could, when they were in Office, to furnish as much profitable employment there as possible.

MR. DALY said, he had received a communication from a Mr. Andrews, a resident engineer at Haulbowline, in which he stated that a causeway of stone that had been excavated might very well be constructed from Ballybritton to the opposite side of the river. The local proprietors had sustained some slight injury from the works, and it would be a boon to them to have the causeway constructed. It would, however, be a good opportunity for employing a number of unskilled labourers.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he had not heard about such a proposition. He would, however, make inquiry, and reply on the Report of the Committee.

MR. DALY said, he would state, for the information of the hon. Gentleman, that the scheme was suggested by the gentleman he had named, a resident engineer. He believed it would be a great benefit if carried out.

MR. PARNELL said, that the hon. and gallant Member for County Cork (Colonel Colthurst) had stated that although he had not had the opportunity of inspecting the works, he was assured that as many hands were employed as possible. Of course, that might be so; but what they complained of was that the works were such that very few men could be employed upon them. They thought the Government should have more extensive works in hand, so that more of the public money which they were privileged to pay should be spent in Ireland. It must occur to them that it appeared hardly fair that where Ireland paid one-seventh, or perhaps one-eighth, of the contributions under that head to the Imperial Exchequer, she only received back, in the shape of money spent on Dockyards, about one-thousandth part. The benefit derived by that country was, in fact, infinitesimal. He could not help thinking that the time might come when Dockyards in Ireland might be of considerable service. He did not wish to press the Government to move in that matter; but, at the same time, it must be recollected that it had always been urged by the Members for the City of Cork. He remembered that his late Friend, Mr. Ronayne, used to allude to it occasionally. He thought that if the Government would give an assurance that they would look into the matter, and see if a fairer proportion of the public money could be spent in Ireland, they might allow that Vote to pass unchallenged. Otherwise, he should certainly support the Amendment that his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. O'Connor) had proposed.

Question put.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that after the Vote was passed he hoped they would consent to report Progress, as they had been then sitting for nearly eight hours. ["No!"] An hon. Member called "No;" but if he had been sitting there all the evening, as they had been, he would be very glad to be relieved. There was a most important question coming presently—namely, pensions to naval officers and widows—and he, therefore, thought that if the present Vote was passed, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty might very well report Progress.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, there was no important question for the next two or three Votes. He must ask the Committee to take those, at any rate.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the only Vote he objected to being taken was that of the pensions. Of course, he could not speak for anybody else; but, as far as he was concerned, he should be perfectly satisfied if they reported Progress when they reached that Vote.

MR. ORR EWING said, that of the money spent for Dockyards, and the different Departments, quite as large a sum was, he believed, spent in Ireland as they were entitled to. He trusted that the Government would not yield to the unreasonable request of the Irish Members without taking into consideration the claims of Scotland.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he was bound to point out to the Committee that the Dockyards, especially the one at Portsmouth, were not carried on according to the requirements of economy. It appeared to him that, from a strategic point of view, they were making a sacrifice in confining their works to places such as that. He must say that he considered it a public disgrace that they in Ireland were treated in the way they were under those Estimates. Except in the case of a few coast-guard ships, no money was spent in that country. He should be very glad if the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty would have the courage to deal with that question.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding £56,363, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of Medicines, Medical Stores, &c., which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1881."

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, there was an item in the Vote which he wished to criticize; but he should not make a long speech and detain the Committee. With regard to the expenses for carrying out the terms of the Contagious Diseases Acts, whatever was proposed for that purpose he should vote against, in accordance with what he had done in that matter for the last 10 or 12 years. He saw no reason for altering his conduct in regard to that matter. He begged to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £55,363, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of Medicines, Medical Stores, &c., which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881."—(Sir Andrew Lusk.)

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he thought it was hardly necessary to divide upon that occasion. A Committee had been appointed on that question; and he, therefore, thought that to raise a discussion on that matter then would be inopportune.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, that inasmuch as his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty had appealed to him to withdraw his Amendment he should certainly do so.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(10.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £6,938, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of Martial Law, &c., which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881."

MR. FINIGAN said, he saw that under this Vote a very large sum was allowed to Protestant clergymen, while only the miserable sum of £26 was given to a Catholic priest. He was not an advocate for expending large sums of money on creeds; but as this money came equally out of the pockets of Protestants and Catholics as citizens, it was a very unjust thing that some persons should draw a large sum from the Estimates, while only the miserable pittance of £26 was given to a Catholic priest. Considering how late an hour they had now reached, he should beg to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Finigan.)

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press his Motion. He presumed this money was given by a capitation grant in proportion to the number of Catholics in the hospital; and it must, therefore, be very satisfactory to the hon. Member to see that the amount required was small.

MR. FINIGAN said, he should prefer if the Government made the capitation grant elsewhere in the same way; but, for his part, he did not see why he should accept that explanation merely when it suited the convenience of the Government. He was asked to withdraw his Motion. If the hon. Gentleman would undertake to pay this Catholic priest fairly and a decent sum, he would be very happy to withdraw his Motion; but he could not accept this simple explanation about the capitation grant.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE promised to look into the matter to see that this gentleman was fairly paid in proportion to the work he performed. There was no wish, on the part of the Government, other than that everyone should be paid in proportion to the work performed. Probably the fact was that this gentleman had a very small number of prisoners to look after.

MR. DALY begged the hon. Gentleman to remember that the salary was less than that of an ordinary day-labourer. Surely no minister of religion ought to be paid such a pittance as this. The money was scarcely enough to pay him for merely walking to and fro. It was barely 10s. a-week, and that was not enough to pay anybody.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE thought that it would turn out that the priest was doing duty in the town, and was only called upon occasionally to attend in the prison, and that he was, consequently, only paid for the services he performed.

MR. FINIGAN remarked, that he must, of course, do duty every Sunday in the year, and on 12 holidays in each year. That was barely 6s. each. Upon the understanding that the Secretary to the Admiralty would fairly consider this matter he should be very happy to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(11.) £101,820, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Services.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, before this Vote was put, he should like to ask the hon. Gentleman whether anything was taken into account for the Botany Bay estates? Some time ago a British officer, acting without instructions and without any authority from his superiors, took upon himself to purchase an estate, because the owner of it was accused of murder, or something of that kind. The consequence was that the British authorities had been mixed up in unpleasant transactions from that day to this; and last year there was an item of £224 16s. 11d. taken in connection with expenses incidental to the working of that estate. He should like to know if there was any charge in the present Estimates on account of that estate; and, if not, how the Government connection with it had terminated?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE regretted that he could not answer the question; but he had heard nothing about the transaction, and he found no allusion to it in the Estimates. He supposed the money was entirely paid last year. He would make inquiry, and he hoped to be able to answer the question on the Report.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR observed, that if there was no further charge on this behalf in the Vote he presumed the Government had parted with the estate. If it had done so, it must have realized some money, and that money ought to have been brought into the account for the year, or, at any rate, to have been entered as an extra receipt. Now, he looked in vain, in connection with these Estimates, for any indication on the part of the Government that they were in possession of such extra receipt. He could not trace any record of it; and he regretted that he was unable to ask the late First Lord of the Admiralty any question on the subject, because he surely would be able to throw some light upon it. But that was always the case in these Estimates. Whenever any question was put which went below the mere surface, the Government sheltered themselves under the very visible excuse that they had been a very short time in Office, and that they were merely carrying out the plans of their Predecessors. They could, consequently, give no explanation of these proposals. The consequence was that they were able to get no satisfaction out of them on many questions. He should certainly bring up the question again on the Report.

MR. GORST wished to point out that here, again, they had the item of Ascension Island in the shape of a contribution for recreation in the island. He supposed there was some sort of football club kept up there for the Kroomen. He rose to call attention to it, so that the Government might take that contribution also in consideration of their Return.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £617,367, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of Half Pay, Reserved, and Retired Pay to Officers of the Navy and Marines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1881."

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR thought the Government would now hardly object to report Progress. It was 10 minutes past 1; and although some Gentlemen who came in at a late hour in the evening might not find this discussion hard work, those of them who had been at it for eight hours at a stretch, and had taken some trouble in going into the matter, did feel that they had been sufficiently long at it for one evening. He, therefore, begged to propose to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he would agree to withdraw Vote 16, if there were any serious objection on it; but he had had no intimation of any serious objection to be urged, and he asked the Committee to proceed until they came to one that was objected to.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF hoped the course suggested by the hon. Gentleman would be acceded to.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT thought they had really done enough work for one night; and he should, therefore, very cordially support a Motion to report Progress.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, if there were really to be any discussion on the Vote he would at once report Progress; but, up to the present, he had seen no indication that it was objected to by anybody.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, if the hon. Gentleman would look at the Comptroller and Auditor General's Report, he would see, at page 126, a question of such magnitude as would certainly induce him to report Progress, for it raised nothing more or less than the whole question of the audit of stores. It was one, too, which must be thoroughly thrashed out before they left the Committee.

MR. FINIGAN hoped the Motion would be pressed. He had some very awkward questions to ask upon that Vote. He wanted to know something about an unfortunate person called Prince Leiningen, and he should certainly move that his half-pay as Rear Admiral should be discontinued, for he did not find that he did anything for the money; and the way in which his time was occupied ought certainly to be paid for by those who had the advantage of his service. He had also several questions to ask in relation to several other officers.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, after having heard those explanations, would certainly consent to report Progress.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [June 25] reported.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had asked a question on these Votes in regard to the convict establishments that were, or rather that ought to be, in County Galway. The Government were kind enough to promise that they would give him an answer on Report. The facts simply were that a Commission of Inquiry into the prisons of Ireland reported that a convict prison ought to be established in Galway where there was already a prison available for the purpose, and where convict labour might also be usefully employed. The late Government promised that they would carry that recommendation into effect, and would establish a convict prison. He would wish to know when the present Government would put the Resolution in force, as he did not suppose for a moment that they intended to throw over the terms of the late Resolution? He brought the matter forward in Committee of Supply, and the Government promised to give him some information on Report as to the time they would commence this transfer of convicts.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he had spoken to his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland on this subject, and he knew the right hon. Gentleman fully intended to be present there that night, and to make a statement on the subject. He supposed that the Report of Supply had been taken a little earlier than was expected, and, therefore, he was not in the House; but his right hon. Friend had told him that he thought the question had much better be discussed when it arose on the Votes. And he was inclined to agree with him that that was certainly not the most convenient way of raising the whole question. With respect to a question put to him by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill), he begged to state that the Endowed Schools Bill (Ireland) would stand over.

MAJOR NOLAN thought he had a right to complain. The Government promised to give him an answer on Report, and, therefore, he did not go into the question in Committee. He knew, of course, that it was an accident that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was not there; but, still, he thought he was entitled to an answer, and if the Government did not keep to arrangements which they made in this way, how could any trust be put in them? It was not at all a fair thing to say that the matter had better be discussed in Committee, when he had been promised an explanation on the Report, and it could scarcely be called fair and straightforward conduct.

Resolutions agreed to.

TAXES MANAGEMENT BILL.—[BILL 242.]

(Lord Frederick Cavendish, Mr. John Holms.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it was merely a measure of consolidation, brought in in consequence of the recommendation of the Statute Law Consolidation Commission, and its object was fully described in the Memorandum attached. He could not understand that there could be any objection to it; but, if there were any, it had much better be considered in Committee. There could not possibly be any objection to the principle of the Bill, which was to embody in one measure all the provisions of the law relating to taxes.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, they had a Bill of a similar kind before them the other evening, and the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury then told them it was merely a measure of consolidation; but, on examination, it was found that if it had been passed some of its clauses would have been directly opposed to the spirit of the Budget of the Prime Minister. Now the noble Lord brought in another Bill containing 120 clauses, which, he ventured to say, no single Member in that House had any knowledge of. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, he doubted very much whether the hon. Member who said that had ever seen the Bill before. It consolidated an enormous number of Acts, and he would like to ask whether this was a Bill for which the noble Lord was himself responsible, or whether he found it in the office when he came there? If the Bill had been brought up in the short time during which the present Government had been in Office, he should not like to take the noble Lord's assurance that it was merely a consolidation measure.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH denied that he in any way misled the House in reference to the Spirits Bill. Certain provisions were inserted into it which were in accordance with the existing law, although they would be modified if a measure since introduced were carried. But it would have deceived the House had not those clauses been produced, because the Malt Tax was in existence at the time, and his measure only professed to be a consolidation of the existing law. He should state most positively that this was simply a consolidation Bill, with the exception of the alterations mentioned.

MR. GORST said, no answer had been given to the question whether the Bill was prepared by the present Government—[LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Certainly not.]—or whether they found it in the office when they went there? If the Bill was prepared by the late Government, he thought they might have sufficient confidence in the measure to allow it to pass.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS REGISTRATION (IRELAND) (re-committed) BILL.

(Mr. Meldon, Mr. Maurice Brooks, Mr. Errington.)

[BILL 245.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MAJOR NOLAN said, he should like to know whether, by this Bill, any new fees were imposed on the people for births and deaths; and, also, whether under it any new charges were imposed on Poor Law Unions?

MR. M. BROOKS said, that having been in the Committee on the Bill he could answer the question. It was a Bill simply to assimilate the law in Ireland to that in England, and it would not impose any fees in consequence of the change.

MR. ERRINGTON said, he merely proposed to go into the Committee pro forma, and to sit again at a future day.

MAJOR NOLAN would like to have an answer to his question before the Bill went further, either from the Government or the hon. Member for Longford.

MR. ERRINGTON said, certain changes had been made in the Bill by which certain charges were increased; but other charges were so much diminished that the balance would be in favour of the alteration. He begged to move that the Committee report Progress.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE AND JUDICATURE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Mellor, Mr. Gregory, Mr. Marriott.)

[BILL 229.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Judge may order whole cause to be tried by a referee in certain cases).

MR. WARTON said, he objected to this Bill very much indeed, and he hoped it would not be proceeded with, because very few Members of the Legal Profession were now in the House, and his objection to the Bill was that the gentlemen who filled the position of Official Referees were so thoroughly inefficient for the duties they had to perform that, so long as they were in office, he objected to their having extended powers. He was aware that their powers were very limited, owing to the construction given to certain Statutes, and that it was advisable that Official Referees conjointly should have the same power as Arbitrators; but, on the other hand, his objection was that three, at any rate, out of the four Referees were so inefficient that it was no use giving them any more power than they now possessed. He did not know whether he could move an Amendment that so long as the Official Referees were alive their powers should not be increased, because they were thoroughly inefficient.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped the objection would not be pressed. The object of the Bill was to give a larger amount of duty to the Official Referees. The objection had been raised that, in consequence of the present rule, the Official Referees had not the power to settle arbitrations. The Bill was intended to remedy that defect, and gave the Referees that power. The Bill provided that the case should be referred to the Referees, and that they should perform certain duties. He protested against the idea that if those increased duties were thrown upon the gentlemen now in office as Official Referees they would not be properly performed; and, although on one occasion he had complained of the appointment of one of these gentlemen, he must say he had not heard any complaint of the manner in which they performed their duties. He did not think it right to indulge in criticism of so sweeping a character, unless it was backed up by some facts upon which they could rely. He believed that the Official Referees fulfilled their duties both to the satisfaction of the public and the suitors themselves. They would have a large amount of duty cast upon them. He trusted the hon. Member would allow the Bill to pass through Committee.

MR. WARTON said, he thought the Attorney General's memory was at fault. He believed these gentlemen had a very small amount of business referred to them long before it was found out that their powers were limited.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Procedure to be under Judicature Acts, 1873 to 1879).

Amendment proposed to insert the words,

"And the Court shall have the same power in regard to such trial entering on judgment as it has under Rule 36."—(Mr. Mellor.)

Amendment agreed to.

REPORTING IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS —REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

RESOLUTIONS.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, it was with considerable reluctance and hesitation that he presented himself to their Lordships on that occasion in the character of a daring innovator, by moving the three Resolutions which he was about to submit; but he was consoled by the reflection that if those Resolutions were innovations, they, at any rate, had a great deal to recommend them for consideration. There could be no manner of doubt that, from various causes, there was general dissatisfaction with regard to the reporting in that House. He would not stop to inquire what the causes of that dissatisfaction were, for that was not material to his present purpose. One of them, perhaps, might be an inability or indisposition on the part of noble Lords to express themselves as loudly and as clearly as they might do. There was, on the other hand, a disposition on the part of other noble Lords to carry on the agreeable conversation which had, he believed, become a considerable part of the proceedings of that House, and there could be no doubt that that conversation very much interfered with that proper silence which should prevail if the reporters were to do justice to what was said. There was also another subject which involved very wide considerations, and that was the construction of the House itself, and the nature of its acoustic properties. Their Lordships were pleased to appoint, at the beginning of that Session, a Committee to inquire into the reporting of that House, and he (Earl Beauchamp) had had the honour to be appointed Chairman of that Committee. He was, in consequence of that, placed in a very difficult position. Some time ago he heard an anecdote of one of England's merchant princes who had raised himself to a very wealthy position from very simple beginnings. He was asked to explain the secret of his success, he replied that he had two rules, one of which was never to give advice, and the other never to take it. He (Earl Beauchamp) had been under the necessity during the last few weeks of receiving a great deal of advice, and he was now in the position of being obliged to give some to their

Lordships. Thus, he was forced to violate both the rules to which that merchant prince attributed his success in life, and his only excuse was that the advice he was about to give was of a very homœopathic character, and that the propositions which he had to make were merely tentative. He did not now ask their Lordships to agree to anything, except the trial of an experiment, and that experiment was of so simple a character that he really did think it deserved a trial. That his propositions would cure all the defects complained of he did not for one moment apprehend or believe; but he thought they might do much to remedy some of the inconveniences which interfered with the successful reporting of their debates. The 1st Resolution he had to propose was—

“(1.) That for the week beginning 5th July the Woolsack be placed at the north end of the House; that the Lord Chancellor do sit facing the Throne; that the cross benches be placed where the Woolsacks now are; and that all Standing Orders and Regulations inconsistent with the Motion be suspended while it is in force.”

One of the reasons which actuated the Committee in arriving at the conclusion—which they did unanimously—that such a plan was worth trial was that at the present moment, though their Lordships were in the habit, as they all were aware, of addressing the Whole House and not any one Peer in particular, yet that some of their Lordships, who had become accustomed to a different practice in the House of Commons, where every Member was bound to address the Chair—and in the House of Commons the Speaker's Gallery was immediately under the Reporters' Gallery, so that all speeches were addressed to that quarter of the House where reporters were stationed, and consequently they enjoyed necessarily great advantages in the way of hearing and reporting the remarks addressed to the Chairman—followed the practice they had learnt “elsewhere.” Of course, they were all well aware that the rule in that House was for their Lordships to speak to the Whole House. It was only those, perhaps, who had recently arrived from the House of Commons who retained the practice, which they derived from that Assembly, of addressing the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack; but, still, there were noble Lords who had contracted that habit, and he had no doubt that that way of turning from the Reporters' Gallery and to the Lord Chancellor had the effect of very much diminishing the chance which the reporters had of hearing what was said by those who spoke. If that was so, there was surely an obvious advantage in trying, so to speak, to draw all the speeches from the different noble Lords to one focus. If the noble and learned Lord's cushion were changed to the other end of the House, he (Earl Beauchamp) could not but think there would be a greater uniformity in the direction of the voice, and the habit in time might spring up of all the speakers turning themselves in that direction rather than in the other, or of addressing themselves to noble Lords opposite. Various suggestions had been made to the Committee; but he would not weary their Lordships by detailing them, as they did not approve themselves to the Committee. Something was said; but as the Committee satisfied themselves that such a plan was impossible, he only referred to the matter to show that the suggestion had received consideration, as to the possibility of stationing reporters in the chamber below the House. The experiments satisfied the Committee that that was quite impossible. Such a proceeding would not only seriously interfere with the ventilating arrangements of the House, which were so essential to their comfort and their health, but it was also found that there was this further difficulty—that while the speakers in various parts of the House were heard pretty easily in the chamber below, those noble lords who sat at the Table spoke from such a position that it brought the Table between them and those below, and rendered their speeches less capable of being heard than almost any others. It did so happen that most of the important speeches in that House were delivered either from the Bench at which he spoke, or from the Bench opposite, and, therefore, that scheme could not be entertained. One of the disadvantages of the present state of things was that though various schemes were proposed none of them had yet been tried, and until some of them had been subjected to the test of an experiment, it was very difficult for the Committee to tell what schemes they should discard and what they should adopt. With regard to the 2nd and 3rd Resolutions which stood in his name, the estimate of the Board of Works showed that the cost would be not very large or extravagant in amount. His 2nd Resolution was—

and the cost of that was estimated at £35. It had been stated on very good authority that the reporters would benefit very much if they were slightly advanced in the manner proposed by that Resolution. The Committee took a quantity of evidence on that point, and there was a great difference of opinion; but it was only by an experiment that they could ascertain which opinion was the correct one. It was an experiment which must be tried, and tried whilst the House was sitting ex hypothesi. It was one inconvenience of that House that it had to serve a number of different purposes varying with the occasion. Sometimes it was called upon to accommodate some 200 or 300 Peers; while, at another, the debates were carried on by a very much smaller number. Then, again, it was necessary that the Room should be of sufficient size for those State occasions, such as the opening of Parliament, which occasionally occurred. Any alteration such as that proposed in 1868 was, therefore, beyond their consideration; and what they had to consider was how they could turn the accommodation of the present House to the best possible use. The information, in order to enable them to form that opinion, could only be obtained by the Resolution he had to submit. His 3rd Resolution was—

That 3rd Resolution, if tried, would involve no further outlay than a sum of £20. These were the estimates of the Board of Works; and it was with a view to test these opinions that he begged their Lordships to agree to Resolutions allowing these experiments. It had been said that he proposed in his 1st Resolution a very great change in their arrangements. He did not know that that was any very serious or valid argument, especially, as if the 1st Resolution were carried out, nothing besides the reversal of the noble and learned Lord's seat would be required. If the House of Commons was summoned to the Bar to hear the Royal Assent given to any Bills, or to receive any Message from the Crown, the Benches would be placed as usual, and the Royal Commissioners would be seated as now, on the Steps of the Throne. As far as the appearance of the House was concerned, therefore, the present arrangement would not seriously interfere with it; while he would remind their Lordships that such a change was not altogether new, because, when they sat for judicial purposes, the Lord Chancellor did not sit on the Woolsack, but occupied a seat at that end of the House. The shifting of the Benches would be a trifling matter, not worthy of consideration, if their Lordships should be satisfied that the experiment was worth trying. The advantages of the 1st proposition were, that if it were carried out they would converge in one focus the speeches of noble Lords, and that focus would be immediately under the Reporters' Gallery, thereby giving them a better chance than now of hearing the addresses that were made. He was not defending the practice, or saying whether it was right and proper, that noble Lords should address themselves to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, for that was a matter of high policy into which he would be very unwilling to enter. He would only say that many noble Lords at present did turn that way, and that an advantage would follow from the alteration he recommended. A difficult problem was proposed to the Committee to solve, and they would be assisted in doing it by the very simple expedient of bringing the Lord Chancellor from one end of the House to the other. The noble and learned Lord himself, of course, would be in rather a different position in addressing their Lordships, for, instead of stepping from the place where he usually sat and then directly addressing himself to the House, he would have to take another position. But there was no reason why the Lord Chancellor should not speak from that Table just as much as any other of Her Majesty's Ministers. He (Earl Beauchamp) did not for a moment maintain that he was proposing an heroic remedy; but he certainly did think his proposals would tend to mitigate some of the inconveniences complained of; and, at all events, it was an experiment worth trying which might succeed in doing something towards solving the question. He begged to move the 1st of the Resolutions which stood in his name.

Moved, That for the week beginning 5th July the woolsack be placed at the north end of the House; that the Lord Chancellor do sit facing the Throne; that the cross benches be placed where the woolsacks now are; and that all standing orders and regulations inconsistent with this motion be suspended while it is in force.—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

LORD DENMAN said, he had, when the Select Committee was appointed, stated that he had read all the evidence before the Committee of the House of Commons; but that was not reported, and one of the objections, in his opinion, to proceeding hastily was that the evidence taken before the Committee was not, at the present time, in the hands of their Lordships, and they had not, therefore, had an opportunity of forming an opinion on the facts which had induced the Committee to come to that conclusion. He, therefore, thought it would be far better for them to wait until they had seen that evidence, because the alteration proposed in the 1st Resolution was, to say the least of it, a grave innovation. If the proposal were carried out, the effect would be that when Her Majesty's faithful Commons came to that House, the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack would turn his back upon them. After referring to the practice of the French Chamber of Deputies, where Members spoke from a place facilitating hearing, his Lordship was understood to say in conclusion that no one cared less about being reported than he did; but if his speeches were not worthy of a report, he wished that his name might be left out entirely.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he was very much surprised to hear that revolutionary proposal come from the other side of the House. It amounted to nothing less than that the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack should be sent back to the Bar. He (the Duke of Somerset) did not see what advantage, either, their Lordships would gain from the change; for really, with all respect to the noble and learned Lord, he had never noticed that noble Lords were in the habit of addressing him. It seemed to him that noble Lords usually addressed the opposite side of the House, and not the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. His Lordship was not in the position of Speaker, and did not maintain the Rules of the House as the Speaker of the House of Commons did. The Speaker of the House of Commons also named the person who was to be chosen to address the House, and was, therefore, Chairman in that sense; while they had no Chairman to control them, and had to get on as best they could—sometimes with a little confusion, sometimes the other way. Upon the whole, however, he thought they got on very well, and that it would be far better that they should "rather bear those ills we have, than fly to others that we know not of." If they really wanted to hear the speeches of noble Lords in that House, the best remedy would be to take the two centre Galleries, so that the reporters were in the middle of the House on each side of it, and would hear the speeches made across the Table; but the fact was, that very often it was very difficult, even for noble Lords, to hear speeches that were made in that House; while it might be that there were speeches in which the public did not take any particular interest, and the reporters, as representing that public, might not care about catching what was said on those occasions. They all had a great respect for the public, although it did not pay them much attention, and although they knew that, while the country disregarded their speeches, the House of Commons disregarded their votes. If the people and the other House took that line, it was not at all surprising that the reporters should sometimes be of the same opinion. For his part, he could not support this plan for turning the whole House topsy-turvy, and, at any rate, before it was attempted, he should like to know whether or not some other plan might not be adopted; or whether, at any rate, the Committee had considered any other plan. He did not think this proposal would be in consonance with the feelings of the House. It was certainly a great change, and, in his opinion, also, it was inadequate to the purpose in view. He should beg to move the rejection of the Resolution.

LORD SUDELEY observed, that the noble Lord (Lord Denman) seemed to think that the Committee proposed this as a permanent change; but that was by no means so—all the Committee wished was to have one or two experiments tried, in order to see what the result was. There could be no doubt, whatever, that the accommodation for the reporters in that House at the present time was very bad indeed; and nobody who had heard the evidence before the Committee could be of any other opinion. The noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) had declared himself very much surprised at the 1st Resolution, and he said that it would turn the whole House topsy-turvy. He also said that he did not think that Peers usually addressed themselves to the Lord Chancellor; but that, on the contrary, they addressed noble Lords opposite. The noble Duke, however, was himself a very good example of the incorrectness of his theory, for he was himself an instance of the practice to which he had referred. During the whole of his remarks he addressed himself directly to the Woolsack, and, in consequence, with his back to the Gallery; and, for his part, he (Lord Sudeley) doubted very much whether much of what the noble Duke said could be heard in the Gallery. It was perfectly true, of course, that their Lordships did not intentionally address the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack; but it was, nevertheless, a fact, seeing him there, they did turn towards him. The evidence before the Committee had not been printed; but that was because the Committee was still sitting. Before that Committee, it was shown very clearly that when Peers spoke towards the Gallery they were heard very much better than when they addressed noble Lords opposite, or turned themselves towards the Lord Chancellor. It was stated in evidence before the Committee, only a fortnight ago, by one of the principal reporters in their Lordships' Gallery, that only a few weeks before a very important speech was delivered from the Treasury Bench, and, owing to the noise in the House, the noble Lord was so imperfectly heard, that the reporters actually waited until the reply was made, in order to concoct from that reply the speech which the noble Lord delivered. The reporters occupied a very difficult position, and it was almost impossible for them, under the present circumstances, to do their work properly. The noble Duke seemed to think that there were other places where the reporters could be put; and there were many plans now before the Committee. There had been suggestions made that they should be put on both sides of the Gallery. But it had been shown that that could not be done, without some communication between the Galleries and the transcribing room—and which was difficult, almost impossible. He did hope that their Lordships would consent to try this experiment, and, perhaps, one or two others which the Committee might suggest to them, in order to test the reliability of the evidence submitted to the Committee. The Committee might, possibly, recommend official, or semi-official, reporting, and that question was also under consideration; but the point which the Committee were now endeavouring to try was whether the work of the newspaper reporters could be facilitated, and whether the acoustic properties of the House could be improved. He, therefore, sincerely hoped that the House would consent to try this experiment for a few days.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, it was always ungracious to refer a thing of this sort to a Committee, and then not to take into careful consideration the recommendations of the noble Lords who consented to devote their time and attention to the matter submitted to them for their consideration. He understood, however, that there were prima facie objections to the course suggested, which, after all, might not be sufficient to outweigh the arguments submitted to them. From his own observation and experience, he had some doubts whether many noble Lords failed to be heard because they addressed the Lord Chancellor. He confessed that he had never observed that noble Lords did address the Lord Chancellor; and on that point he agreed very much with his noble Friend the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset). He believed that they must admit the existence of the practical defect to which the noble Lord who had just sat down (Lord Sudeley) had alluded, when he said that noble Lords were not heard, not because they addressed the Lord Chancellor, but because there was so much noise in the House that the reporters could hear nothing. As a fact, instead of the acoustic properties of the House being very bad, they were too good. When he used sometimes to sit in that House upon Appeals as a lay Lord, he was surprised to find that counsel addressing the noble and learned Lords at that time were admirably heard, even when they spoke almost in a whisper. Why was that? Why, because there was perfect silence—people were listening judicially. It was a judicial inquiry, and they were listening to everything that was said at the Bar. Under those circumstances counsel, speaking quite conversationally, were heard all over the House. The real truth was, that many noble Lords were not heard, because so many other noble Lords were talking to one another privately—all that conversation, of course, being equally well heard. He did not wish to object to any experiment the Committee might wish to try; but it was quite clear that the experiment could only refer to those noble Lords who addressed themselves to the Lord Chancellor. His own conviction was that they would never have good reporting in that House, so far as bad reporting was due to any want of hearing, until the reporters sat on one or the other side of the House. He heard a suggestion made two or three days ago—it might be impossible, but the suggestion was worth consideration—that the reporters might be placed in the thickness of the walls between the House and the Division Lobbies, where they would hear admirably and yet not be in the House. It seemed to him that that was better than to transfer the seat of the Lord Chancellor from one part of the House to another.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH said, it did seem somewhat of an ungracious thing to object to any experiment which had been recommended or proposed for their convenience; but he ventured to think that, while the experiment described in the 1st Resolution would not serve the purpose, it was not matter for consideration. If the change in the seat of the Lord Chancellor was not possible permanently, he did not think it would be of any practical use to try the change merely as an experiment. And he thought it was not possible permanently, because it would cause a great deal of inconvenience on many occasions, such as had been pointed out, when the Speaker of the House of Commons came to the Bar to hear the Royal Commission read; while, on Appeals or on other Law Business, the Lord Chancellor would be turned with his back towards the counsel; or other arrangements would have to be made for those particular occasions. It might be said that the whole arrangement would be very easily changed; but it would, nevertheless, take up some time; and, as their Lordships were aware, the House of Commons occasionally came to the Bar to hear the Royal Assent given during the sitting of the House. If the whole arrangements had been so changed, after the Royal Assent had been given, it would necessitate an adjournment of the House while the Woolsack was being transferred, and that would be fraught with much inconvenience, unaccompanied, as far as he could see, with any great advantage. Again, if this Resolution were carried and the alteration made, he should like to ask the noble Earl who moved it (Earl Beauchamp) for some further instructions. What was the House to do while this experiment was being carried out? If the Lord Chancellor and the Chairman of Committees were to sit at the other end of the House, and the Cross-Benches were to face them, there were still no directions how their Lordships themselves were to sit. It seemed to him another change would be rendered necessary, and he should like to ask what it was to be. It was within their Lordships' knowledge that they were divided in that House into two Parties—those who supported Her Majesty's Government, sitting on the right of the noble and learned Lord, and the Opposition, sitting on his left. It was, of course, obvious that if the position of the noble and learned Lord was changed, so the respective positions of the two Parties would also have to be changed. During the week that this experiment was being tried, were they then to cross over to the Benches on the opposite side from those on which they now sat? It was a mere matter of detail, but it was one on which the noble Earl had given them no instruction—and he should have added a recommendation as to their Lordships' conduct while the experiment was being carried on. It was a mere objection in detail, of course, and it was, perhaps, premature to take it when it was not certain that the Resolution would be carried. As he had said, he did not believe this change could be of a permanent character. He did not, therefore, see any necessity for trying it for the period now recommended.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he could not agree to the proposition of the Committee, because it would alter the whole arrangements in so serious a manner as to create very great difficulty, and the Lord Chancellor would be put in a wrong position for the transaction of the Business of the House. It would also interfere with the transaction of other Business. He did not agree with the noble Lord (Lord Balfour of Burleigh) in his objection about the Commons, because, when the Speaker attended to hear the Royal Assent read, the Commission sat on the Bench in front of the Throne, and not on the Woolsack, and, therefore, the Commons would come in in just the same way as at present; but on occasions when the Commons brought them a Message—which were, it was true, rare; but still they did bring a Message occasionally—it would be very awkward for the Lord Chancellor to sit with his back to them. It was neither gracious nor pleasant that the Lord Chancellor should be turned with his back to the Speaker. Then, again, the Woolsack was open to Peers of Scotland and Ireland, on which they might sit; and if its position were changed, it would not be so convenient of approach for going in and coming out as when it was placed where it was now, in close contiguity to the Chamber in which they assembled. All these little things had some connection with the matter; but his great objection was that, being a very strong Conservative, he liked the House as it always had been, and he did not think it would improve in appearance if it were changed. There was no doubt that many noble Lords, particularly, if they had not strong voices, would do well, when they were addressing the House—particularly if they were not in a favourable position—to come to the Table. There was no earthly reason why they should not do that, and a good many did so already; particularly when they spoke from the Cross-Benches, where they would be inaudible unless they took that course. That would be a great improvement. It would also be a great change if they paid a little more attention to Order. At present they were very much in the habit of speaking rather loudly to their neighbours, as though they did not care very much about the Business that was going on. As to this change, however, he must honestly confess that he could not give his consent to it. It would make alterations in a variety of ways, some of which he had stated. He did not quite understand what was to be done by putting up seats beyond the Gallery. Were two to be brought out, going more over the Bar? If that was found to answer, the whole Gallery might be brought more forward, and, no doubt, if that were done, it would very much improve the hearing. As to the proposed Gallery in the two corners below the Bar, it might easily be tried on one side, and the reporters would soon find whether they heard better in that position than in the Gallery; but if both sides were so occupied, Black Rod's seat would be taken away, and all the places open to ladies who were not Peeresses or Peers' daughters; and the arrangement appeared to him objectionable, and had better not be attempted.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE asked if this was a complaint from the reporters that they could not hear during the debates? If that was the case, then some change ought to be made; but if, on the other hand, the public did not take that interest in their debates which he, as an humble Member of the House, could wish, and, consequently, they were not reported fully, he did not see the use of any change. He had very seldom seen a case where Members on the Front Benches had spoken, even when they did not speak so clearly as they might—which, of course, was a rare occurrence—where, by some miraculous art, they were not reported.

EARL BEAUCHAMP begged to say a few words in reply. The objection of the noble Lord (Lord Oranmore and Browne) went to the very root of the matter. The reporters did complain, and very strongly indeed. He was not prepared to say that there was not some truth in what the noble Lord had said—that the public did not take any very great interest in their debates;

but, still, there was no doubt that the reporters did complain very severely that they had not the means of hearing what was said. A rather entertaining kind of expedient that was resorted to by them had been mentioned by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Sudeley). A speech was not heard in the Gallery, and in order to show what the noble Lord must have said, the speech was composed from the allusions in subsequent speeches. They had had it in evidence, that not infrequently such an expedient was forced upon the reporters in order to supply what was wanted. If the proposition he made was one of a permanent character, they might entertain the objections of the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees. Another noble Lord (Lord Balfour of Burleigh) had evidently not even been present when the Royal Assent was given, for the Lord Chancellor did not occupy the Woolsack on that occasion; so that as regarded that particular ceremony, no difficulty would arise. No doubt, there would be some difficulty if, under unforeseen circumstances, a Message should be addressed to that House by the Commons; but such communications were very infrequent, for he had no recollection of any such Message having ever come up, and he did not think it was at all likely that one would come up during the next week, which was the time in which they proposed to try this experiment. They merely wanted to ascertain how far, and what grounds, there were for the belief that the removal of the seat of the Lord Chancellor would mitigate the difficulty. He had been asked what would happen to noble Lords on both sides of the House, and whether they were to cross over for that week? He did not think there would be any necessity for noble Lords on that side to crossover to the other this Session, though they could not tell what might happen during the next. He did not think there need, at present, be any such wholesale migration. Besides, he did not understand that the Supporters of the Government sat on the right hand of the Lord Chancellor, but that they were placed on the dexter hand of the Throne. With reference to the suggestions that the reporters should be placed in the centre Galleries and in the thickness of the walls, both of those propositions had been considered in Committee, and there were very serious practical inconveniences in regard to both of them. In the first place, reporters on one side of the House would hear very little from noble Lords speaking on the same side; that would really involve the necessity, to obtain full reports, of having two reporting staffs in the place of one, and these would have to be provided with access to the transcript room. He did not say, if that was the only possible arrangement, that they might not be able to carry it out; but the change could not be made without great expense and inconvenience, and if the difficulty could be obviated by some such simple experiment as that he now advocated, he thought their Lordships would feel inclined to try it. The noble Lord (Lord Balfour of Burleigh), again, had said that Scotch and Irish Peers would be prevented from coming to the Woolsack; but he would put it to the House whether any number of Scotch or Irish Peers ever did take their seat on the Woolsack? They, certainly, constantly did take their seats on the Throne, and on the steps of it; but he had only seen one Irish Peer take his seat on the Woolsack. Such a contingency, therefore, was not likely to happen during the next week; while, if the arrangement became permanent, the Standing Orders and Regulations would have to be considered. All he asked, now, was that the Standing Orders should be suspended during the week that this change was in force. If it was found not to be necessary, nothing would be easier than to let the proposition drop, and then they would have gained their experience, and their minds would be clear for the consideration of other remedies; but when the change involved so trifling an alteration, he did hope their Lordships would agree to the recommendation which had been unanimously made to them by the Committee. If it should be found that their reasons for asking it were not sound, and that the alteration did not produce more advantageous reporting, even then their Lordships would have added to the stock of information on the subject to a considerable extent.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, after hearing the debate on this proposition, he must consider it as the most extraordinary that he had ever heard with regard to the manners and customs of their Lordships' House. Upon one point he wished to remark very strongly. This seemed to him a most irregular proceeding. A proposition was made upon a so-called Report of a Committee, which had never been presented to their Lordships. Reference had been made in the speeches to opinions and suggestions and proposals which had been made to the Committee, but of which their Lordships were at present utterly unaware.

THE EARL OF BEAUCHAMP: No, no! [Handing the noble Lord a Paper.]

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he must apologize if he had said anything which was not correct; but he understood that the Report of a Committee was a voluminous document, and he could hardly suppose that the deliberations could be condensed into such short dimensions as that. Therefore, he did not think he was speaking inaccurately, when he said that he hoped noble Lords would not agree to this suggestion, until, at least, the Report of the Committee was laid upon the Table, and they had had time to consider it.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE considered that it was somewhat undignified of a great House like that to alter the position of its Chief Officer merely as a sort of trial. Surely, if an experiment were necessary, there were means of making it without this change in all the organization of the House. The experiment might be made by bringing in a number of people on Saturdays or days when the House was not sitting, and seeing the result of speaking in a proper voice, so that the speaker could be heard in the Gallery. If that was all that was wanted, it was surely not a dignified way for their Lordships themselves to be thus made the subjects of an experiment, and he hoped the suggestion would be well considered before it was adopted.

EARL GRANVILLE observed, that he entirely agreed with the observation of his noble Friend near him (the Duke of Argyll) that it was an ungracious act, after a Committee had devoted some time to the consideration of a question of this kind, at once to reject their propositions; but, at the same time, he thought there was much in what the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees had said. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Hardwicke) was mistaken in supposing there was no Report from the Committee. There was a Report, but there was no evidence. The House, in fact, were quite ignorant of the propositions made to the Committee, and whether any information was obtained by them with regard to the reporting in other countries, and, generally, of the propositions made with regard to the alterations in the structure of the House. Under such circumstances, he should not advise his noble Friend opposite (Earl Beauchamp) to press his Motion to a vote. The noble Duke (the Duke of Cambridge) had just said that the experiment might be tried when the House was not sitting. If the experiment were to be tried at all, it ought to be tried under the fullest conditions; and he did not know that during the next week they were likely to have a very spirited attack on the Government, with the ex-Lord Chancellor, the ex-Prime Minister, and the late Foreign Secretary all away. He was not at all aware how, under those circumstances, they could have an animated debate which would fairly test the result of the speaking. He thought this complaint of the House was very much the fault of the speakers, because those who spoke out well, he thought, were well reported. He believed he could, when he paid attention to it, make himself heard, as some of his speeches were reported with great accuracy. He had nothing to complain of in regard to his own reports, although he often saw it stated that "Lord Granville was perfectly inaudible in the Gallery." It was very tempting to speak in a low voice across a narrow Table, to those whom the speaker was amusing. Some noble Lords did not hear very well, and began talking to one another. That example was followed by ladies and others at the Bar, who were immediately below the Reporters' Gallery; and that made it utterly impossible for them to struggle against the noise. He should be very sorry, indeed, to vote against a proposition made by the Committee, to whom they were exceedingly indebted for their labours in endeavouring to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion; but he, nevertheless, must advise his noble Friend not to divide on the Motion; and he would advise the Committee to renew their labours, and see if they could not make some proposition more agreeable than, he was afraid, this one was to their Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he had listened with very great interest to this debate, and everyone must admit that the evil that had been submitted to the Committee had not been submitted to them without good and adequate cause. He had also had the advantage that day of contemplating the reporters in the Gallery, and if the reporters could be called before the House, he believed they would say that, with the exception of some remarks from the noble Duke, their powers of reporting could only be exercised by means of a resource on which they had very frequently to rely—namely, guess work. The noble Earl below him (Earl Granville) appeared to labour under the impression that he was generally heard, or could be heard, in the Reporters' Gallery. That was certainly not what the reporters had said to the Committee, or what the real fact was, for more than one reporter had particularly mentioned the difficulty of hearing the remarks of the noble Earl, and, of course, by not hearing them, the reporters first, and then the public outside, suffered serious loss. He was rather inclined to doubt whether the House was really in favour of the remedy which was now proposed; but there certainly was another which was in their own hands to exercise, which was not difficult, not revolutionary, and did not involve moving his noble and learned Friend for one-tenth of a second to the other end of the House, while it would be very effectual, because it would go to the root of the evil. There could be no doubt that the main cause of the present inability on the part of the reporters to hear was chiefly due to the disorderly proceedings, if he might call them so, which took place behind the Woolsack, and in that part of the building not in the House, such as the space behind the Bar. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), who he regretted to say was not present, in giving evidence to the Committee, described to them with perfect accuracy and in words which, of course, as they came from the noble Marquess, put the question far more clearer than any words of his could do, that that was a part of the House to which everybody went who had any business to transact. He was asked if he meant the Peers who had admission to the House, and he said not at all; that they must know just as well as he did that anybody came there. For his part, he thought that if the Rules of the House with regard to persons below the Throne were observed, there would be much more silence in those parts of the House, and below the Bar, and the reporters would be able to hear much better than at present. He did not know what course his noble Friend would take as to the 1st Resolution; but, even if he abandoned that, he did hope that he would not drop the two which followed.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK observed, that it would be very undesirable to try the experiment, and he did not suppose the noble Earl (Earl Beauchamp) would divide on it, as nobody had said a word in its favour. For his part, he believed that the trial of the experiment for a week only would be useless, for during that time they would be so astonished to see the noble and learned Lord at that end of the House that they would turn towards him. But he quite agreed with what had just been said, that the noble Earl might press his other two Resolutions, which were merely small experiments for testing the acoustic properties of the House. The Report put before them did allude strongly to the difficulty of obtaining satisfactory evidence on the subject with which the Committee was engaged. They might surely, at the expense of £40 or £50, allow the Committee to make these two other experiments.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he would not trouble the House as to the 1st Resolution.

Resolution, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he now begged to move his 2nd and 3rd Resolutions.

Moved to resolve,

That it is expedient that a seat for one or two reporters be temporarily and inexpensively constructed in front of the present gallery:

That it is expedient that a platform be temporarily and inexpensively erected on either side of the House below the Bar according to a plan prepared by Mr. G. M. Barry in 1868 for the better accommodation of the reporters now in the gallery.—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he merely wished to make one remark. If these Galleries were to be erected, where were the ladies to come in? It was rather a strong thing to take away all their seats.

EARL BEAUCHAMP replied, that it was only proposed to try this plan tentatively; and if anything was to be done to remedy these defective arrangements, they must not mind a little inconvenience of that kind. If, of course, the House determined to do nothing, then nothing could be done. But if any alteration was to be made, and any improvement arrived at, it could not be obtained without some corresponding sacrifice on the part of somebody or other.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) objected further, that there would be no place for Black Rod, as his seat would be moved away. He thought the plan might be tried on one side of the House only.

LORD DENMAN (who was very imperfectly heard) was understood to suggest that the difficulty might be got over altogether by handing over the reporting to an agency. The House, also, ought to have the power of excluding any reporter who made their Lordships say what they did not say. There ought not to be what Lord Brougham called a "mendacity licence." He had, in 1856, alluded to the speech of the Earl of Albermarle, who had said that nothing was known of the affairs of India but what "the gentlemen behind the clock" might choose to report, and he thought that truth was the principal thing to be studied in reports, however brief.

On Question? Resolutions agreed to.

STATE OF IRELAND—SERVICE OF PROCESS—THE CONSTABULARY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE, in asking Her Majesty's Government, What orders are issued to the Royal Irish Constabulary when sent out to protect persons in exercise of their legal rights; and, whether, in consequence of the disturbed state of Ireland, they intend to introduce a measure to allow substitution of service in case of all notices of ejectments, civil bill processes, &c.?—said, he did not ask the Question as an attack upon the present Government, because some of the facts to which he would refer had occurred in the time of the last Government. In reference to the first part of his Question, the maintenance of peace and order in Ireland depended, he was sorry to say, upon the action of the Police Force, and all must be perfectly aware how difficult it was for that Force to act if they did not know how far they ought to go. He would not refer to the present sudden change in the policy of Her Majesty's Government from that which they announced at the beginning of the Session in what they were now proposing, but he thought it must tend to increase lawlessness; because, whatever might be the motive, there was no doubt that the result would be that the yielding to the demands made by a Party whose demands were almost unlimited in the way of revolution and disorder, would tend to make those people more than ever inclined to evade the obligations of law and order. He would give their Lordships an instance of what, unfortunately, so frequently occurred in Ireland. The process-servers were protected by considerable bodies of police, and he knew one instance where a process-server was attacked by a number of women and children who got hold of the process-server, ill-used him, and took the processes away from him, the police retiring without doing anything. Now, there were plenty of instances of rowdy women in St. Giles' with whom the English police had to deal, and they were always able to preserve peace and order. If proper instructions were given to the Irish police, he could not help thinking that the rowdy women of Ireland could be equally properly dealt with. The people thought they could act as they liked, perfectly irrespective of the police, and it also had the effect on the police themselves of demoralizing them if they were not allowed to use proper means to repel force by force. In support of this, he should like to refer to the case of Mr. Acheson, which occurred the other day. The police went to protect him in the exercise of his undoubted legal right. A great mob assembled, several shots were fired, and the police were mobbed. The police, instead of using their side or firearms to protect Mr. Acheson, put their arms around him. The people tried to thrust at him with pitchforks; and that gentleman, not trusting to the police, ran away. Mr. Acheson was pursued; he was out-run. He turned in self-defence, and, unfortunately, shot a man. What happened? The people stopped almost immediately, and there was no difficulty, after the man was killed, in protecting Mr. Acheson. He (Lord Oranmore and Browne) believed the police came up again afterwards. He believed that if the people had thought that the police could do their duty in protecting Mr. Acheson, that life would never have been lost. But there was no doubt that where the police were sent to protect persons in the exercise of their civil rights, the oftener they were defeated the more the country people would believe that they were instructed not to use the arms that were put into their hands, and they would say that it was all a sham. If the same course was continued from day to day, it would be more and more impossible for the law to be carried out at all in Ireland. He was told that in his own neighbourhood, within the last few months, one process-server had resigned or been turned off after another, because, from the treatment the former process-servers had received, they were afraid to fulfil their duties. With regard to the second part of the Question, it was a most important matter, and the suggestion contained in it came from one of the many Land Judges in Ireland. It was now possible to substitute service of process by posting up the notices upon certain market-places or chapels, subject to the previous sanction of the Assistant Barrister. However, a short Act of Parliament might be passed to enable all processes to be served through the Post Office, subject to the approbation of the Assistant Barrister. At any rate, something more than mere words from the Government were necessary to enable the authorities to enforce the law in Ireland.

EARL GRANVILLE regretted that, owing to the short Notice which the noble Lord (Lord Oranmore and Browne) had given of his intention of bringing the subject forward that evening, the noble Lord the President of the Council (Earl Spencer), who usually answered Questions of this nature, was not present to reply to the one under Notice. He (Earl Granville) would, however, endeavour to answer it in his absence. With regard to the first part of the noble Lord's Question, he had to state that there had not been sufficient time since the Notice had been given to communicate with Dublin and to obtain the information which the noble Lord asked for. With regard to the second part, he had to state that he was not aware that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any new Bill on the subject this Session. He believed it was the fact that, under the Civil Bill Courts Act, 16 & 17 Vict. the 17th clause taken in connection with the 65th clause, did very much to remedy that which the noble Lord desired to see remedied, and he (Earl Granville) did not know himself why it had not more frequently been put into practice. He could only repeat what had been so often said before, that Her Majesty's Government were determined to enforce the law as it existed.

VISCOUNT SHERBROOKE pointed out that certain processes could now be sent through the Post Office, and asked why they should not make this system compulsory, and then a stop would probably be put to these proceedings? If the processes were sent through the Post Office, they would not require the assistance of process-servers. He hoped that the Government would consider the subject.

RATHMINES AND RATHGAR TOWNSHIP WATER BILL. [Lords.] (by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. M. BROOKS, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time upon that day three months, said, he wished to offer a few observations to the House. The township of Rathmines and Rathgar embraced a very large and flourishing district in the immediate neighbourhood of the City of Dublin. The promoters of the present Bill proposed to obtain an independent supply of water, the present supply being professedly inadequate and impure. It was proposed to do this at the cost of about £100,000, and he opposed their being allowed to obtain the powers asked for, because the City of Dublin already possessed a scheme called the "Vartry Water Scheme," which was admitted to be the finest and best public supply of water that existed anywhere in the world. Now, this water supply lay at the very door of Rathmines and Rathgar, and there were no engineering difficulties to prevent them from participating in the Vartry supply. But there was a fear on the part of Rathmines and Rathgar, that if they obtained their supply of water from the Dublin source, the feeling at present existing in the public mind that Rathmines and Rathgar with the surrounding townships should be amalgamated with the City of Dublin would be thereby encouraged, and that eventually the amalgamation would be carried out, greatly to the advantage of the City of Dublin as well as to the advantage of Rathmines and Rathgar. He ought to remind the House that there was at present, and had been for some years, a Royal Commission sitting in Dublin for the purpose of inquiring into the propriety of re-adjusting the boundaries of several of the districts adjacent to the borough. That Commission was about to present its Report, and there was little doubt that the Commissioners would recommend that the townships adjoining the City should be amalgamated with the City. It was thought that the proposed amalgamation would endanger the existing form of local self-government, and bring all the local bodies now independent of the Corporation of Dublin and of each other, into general co-operation. That was, as far as he could understand, the only objection the Commissioners of Rathmines and Rathgar had to obtaining their water supply from the same source as that of Dublin. Undoubtedly, if this scheme was rejected, the present injustice in the rating of the borough and of Rathmines would shortly be removed, and Rathmines would have to pay more in the shape of taxes, while Dublin would pay so much less, and the inequality that now existed would be remedied. With regard to the present condition of the water supply of Rathmines and Rathgar, he must mention that the Government supplied the barracks within the township of Rathmines and Rathgar with Vartry water at a cost of £500 a-year, and every penny of that sum was in alleviation of the taxes of Dublin. In regard to the rate at which the water ought to be supplied by Dublin there need be no difficulty, because the Corporation of the City of Dublin were not unwilling, but, on the contrary, were most anxious to remit the question of the rates of payment to arbitration. Upon these grounds, he begged to move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, "to leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add "upon this day three months."—(Mr. M. Brooks.)

Question proposed, that the word "now" stand part of the Question.

MR. FINDLATER supported the second reading of the Bill, and said he believed that it received the approval of a large portion of the ratepayers of Rathmines, who were not in favour of the proposal now made on the part of the Corporation of Dublin. They had every confidence in the Commissioners that they would do their best for the benefit of the ratepayers, and they thought this was an unfair attempt, before the Bill was submitted to the investigation of a Committee—an unfair attempt by a piece of sharp practice of this kind—to throw out a Bill that would be useful and valuable to the inhabitants of Rathmines and Rathgar. He thought the Corporation of Dublin had precluded themselves from coming forward on the present occasion, because, by the Act obtained by them in 1874, they prevented the Commissioners of Rathmines from compulsorily demanding to be supplied with water from the Vartry Waterworks. In 1877 they entered into negotiations with the Commissioners of Rathmines for the purpose of supplying water, and, after the negotiations were concluded and an agreement come to, it was repudiated by certain members of the Corporation, and was not in the end carried out. Their own rival scheme, which they had promoted here, had now been rejected, and they were actually trying to set up this agreement again. It was quite impossible, in a Sitting of the House like the present, to go into the merits of the question in the same satisfactory manner as would be the case if the matter were gone into by a Special Committee. They could rely much better upon the Report of a Committee appointed by the House to examine and investigate the matter. There could be no question whatever of surprise. All the facts stated by the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. M. Brooks) had been stated before the Committee, and it was most unusual to attempt to throw out a valuable Bill of this kind in this manner.

MR. RODWELL hoped to be permitted to say a word or two upon the matter. He did not propose to go into the merits of the case; but he believed it was a Bill which had already occupied the attention of the House of Lords for seven days when a competing scheme was brought forward in opposition to it, and that, after those seven days' investigation, the present scheme was passed. He need not remind the House that it was a very unusual course to oppose a Bill on the second reading, and especially under such circumstances as these. The fact of its having occupied so long a time must, he thought, satisfy the House that it was a Bill that required more consideration to be given to it before they committed themselves to a proposal for throwing out the Bill on the second reading. He thought his hon. Friend the Member for Dublin (Mr. M. Brooks) had not explained the whole facts of the case to the House. It did seem to him (Mr. Rodwell), that the fact of the circumstances having already been so well and so thoroughly discussed, and that this scheme had in the end been preferred by the Committee of the House of Lords, were reasons why the House of Commons should send it to a Select Committee, and why they should not dispose of it in the summary way suggested by the hon. Member for Dublin. According to a statement which had been placed in his hands, there was a population of 25,000 persons already waiting for a supply of water. The Corporation of the City of Dublin had not agreed to supply them with water, but had actually excluded this very spot from a former arrangement they had entered into with Parliament; while, at the same time, they bound themselves not to oppose any future Bill for supplying Rathmines and Rathgar with water. Under these circumstances, he must oppose the proposition of the hon. Member for Dublin, who represented the Corporation of Dublin. Such a proposal did not come from them with good grace. He trusted that the House would permit the Bill to be read a second time, in order that it might be disposed of in the usual way.

MR. LITTON supported the second reading of the Bill. He concurred with the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell), that it was a very unusual course to throw out a Bill of this description upon the second reading. The hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. M. Brooks) seemed to forget that the opponents of the Bill had already had an opportunity of pressing their objections upon the Committee of the House of Lords, and of showing why the Bill should not be passed. That being so, the course now taken by the hon. Member was a most inconvenient one. The hon. Member came down to the House, and on the second reading of the Bill, in a short statement of a few moments, asked the House to undo and set at naught all the labours of the Committee of the House of Lords who had had the Bill before them for several days. The whole course of procedure connected with Private Bills was already beset with great difficulties, and those difficulties would become intolerable if a proceeding of this kind were to be sanctioned. He, therefore, asked the House not to accede to the suggestion which had been made by the hon. Member for Dublin; but if the hon. Member thought he had a case against the Bill, let him take such steps as would enable the opponents of the measure to state before a Select Committee of the House those objections which had already been held untenable by a Committee of the House of Lords. On that ground, he supported the second reading of the Bill, and he asked the House to reject the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dublin.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, having had some acquaintance with the water supply of Dublin, rose to support his hon. Friend the Member for Dublin (Mr. M. Brooks) in the Motion which he had submitted to the House. That was, undoubtedly, a very strong case, and the very fact, that the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell) had brought forward as an argument, that it was subjected to a seven days' investigation by a Committee of the House of Lords, proved nothing beyond the extreme injustice and inconvenience of submitting Irish local questions to the consideration of a Committee who could have practically no acquaintance with the facts of the case. The facts of the case were these. The sanitary state of Dublin was about as bad as the sanitary state of any town in the United Kingdom. Continual efforts had been made by various Government Boards to improve the sanitary state of Dublin; but if there was one thing more than another which was absolutely perfect in connection with the sanitary arrangements of Dublin it was the water supply, which was quite as perfect as the celebrated Croton water supply of New York. That water supply was obtained at immense cost by the City of Dublin, 25 or 30 years ago, and the pipes absolutely passed through the township of Rathmines and Rathgar. Yet, the township refused to avail itself of the supply, and preferred to go in for an entirely new scheme for obtaining water from some other source, altogether competing with this great public work carried out by the Corporation of Dublin some years ago. In no case could Rathmines and Rathgar get a better supply of water. The Corporation of Dublin had offered to supply water on reasonable terms, and it passed absolutely through the township. Under those circumstances, he did not think it was right to allow schemes of that kind to be brought forward in that haphazard manner. And the matter was one of such extreme importance, that he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) or the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland himself would explain their views of the case.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he was of opinion that it would be an exceedingly inconvenient and, to borrow the expression of the noble Lord, a haphazard course to throw out a Bill which had been so fully considered by the House of Lords, without allowing it to be at least re-examined by a Select Committee upstairs. The case was simply this. A corporate body—the Commissioners of Rathmines township—proposed to supply themselves with water. He would not say one word against the excellent character of the supply of water afforded by Dublin. Everyone agreed that the Vartry water was excellent; but it could hardly be maintained that, because Dublin had a good supply of water, therefore the people of Rathmines should not have the privilege of supplying themselves with other water equally good. He certainly could see no reason why the House should compel the Rathmines people to take the Vartry water from the Corporation of Dublin, if they thought they could get a better and cheaper supply elsewhere. Besides, there was a clause in the Dublin Water Act of 1874, to which attention had already been called by the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell), and which, with the permission of the House, he (Mr. Law) would now read. In that year the Corporation of Dublin sought to extend their waterworks; but, finding the original scheme too costly, they reduced it by specially excluding Rathmines and certain other districts from their operations, and inserted in their Act clauses which prevented the people of Rathmines and the other excluded districts from participating in the supply of water so authorized to be provided. The clause then proceeded in these terms—

“Provided always, that the Corporation shall not hereafter have power to oppose any person, company, or incorporated body seeking Parliamentary power to obtain a water supply for any place or district excluded hereby.”

He (Mr. Law) thought it would be very unjust if the House were now, at the instance of the hon. Member for the City of Dublin, and in the summary manner he suggested, to preclude all further consideration of the merits of the Bill.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN remarked, that the clause just read by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) had had the effect of preventing the full merits of this measure from being gone into by the House of Lords. He agreed that the House of Commons ought very rarely to interfere with the passing of a Private Bill at this stage. Nothing but very exceptional circumstances would justify such a course of procedure. There were, however, exceptional circumstances in this case. The Boundary Commission was about to Report on the question of extending the boundaries of the Borough of Dublin, and what was now called the City of Dublin would then be so enlarged as to take in all the parasitical townships which had grown up around the old Principality of Dublin. It would be most mischievous, therefore, if they were to allow a number of these small independent schemes for the supply of water to grow up, instead of having them all under a complete sanatorial system of water supply. The noble Lord below him, the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), was personally acquainted with the City of Dublin, and he thanked the noble Lord for the interest he took in the affairs of the people of Dublin. The noble Lord was fully aware that if this scheme were sanctioned, nothing but mischief could accrue in regard to future plans which the House would undoubtedly have before it for the better municipal government of Dublin. It would be disastrous to sanction Bills like this, constituting new vested interests—little petty interests altogether independent of the City of Dublin—instead of giving the chance of creating some few months hence, when the Report of the Boundary Commission was presented, a scheme of water supply that would be worthy of the great Corporation of Dublin. It was upon that ground that he would give his vote in favour of the Amendment, although he quite agreed that the House ought not to interfere with the second reading of a Private Bill except under very exceptional circumstances.

The Attorney General for Ireland

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) had based his opposition to the Bill chiefly on the ground that the Report of the Boundary Commission would come out at some future time. He (Mr. Lyon Playfair) wished to remind the hon. and learned Member that if the boundaries of the City of Dublin had to be enlarged it must be by an Act of Parliament, and that the worst that could happen under the circumstances would be that the township of Rathmines, having obtained a supply of water otherwise than from the Vartry river, would have a locus standi to represent its own interests on this Bill being committed. He did not think that that was a ground for preventing the Bill from going upstairs. Let the House see in what position the Bill was. It had already passed through a careful examination by the House of Lords, and had only been passed after seven days sitting, and a thorough investigation of the merits of the Dodder water. The Vartry water was also fairly before the Committee of the House of Lords, and both sources of supply were considered on their merits. The Vartry water was very good; but the Dodder water was exceedingly good also. It came from a Silurian district, and was very pure water. He thought, when the House of Lords had spent seven days in examining into the merits of the scheme, and had rejected one Bill in preference to another, and sent it down for consideration in the House of Commons, it should require a very strong case indeed to refuse permission for it to be sent upstairs. He held in his hand a Petition from the Corporation of Dublin against the Bill, and in that Petition the Corporation did not say one word about the Boundary Commission. They petitioned simply to be heard against the Bill, on its merits, in the ordinary form, when the Bill got upstairs. Under these circumstances, he thought the House should take the usual course of giving the Bill a second reading, and then they would have the Corporation of Dublin and any other person who could establish a locus standi to represent their case, when the Committee would carefully hear it, and give as much consideration to it as the Committee of the House of Lords had done.

MR. M. BROOKS said, that in consequence of what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees, he thought he ought to be content with the discussion which had taken place, and that the further investigation of the Bill should take place before the Select Committee. He would, therefore, with the leave of the House, withdraw the Amendment he had moved for the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time and committed.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Baron Pollock and Mr. Justice Hawkins, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the Borough of Tewkesbury.

TEWKESBURY ELECTION.

Westminster Hall,

June 28th, 1880.

We, Sir Charles Edward Pollock, knight, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and Sir Henry Hawkins, knight, one of the Justices of the High Court of Justice, two of the Judges for the time being for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, and The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1880, certify that upon the 17th day of June instant (1880), and the day following, we duly held a Court at Gloucester, in the county of Gloucester, for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the Borough of Tewkesbury, in the said County of Gloucester, between Thomas Collins, Henry Browett, Frederick Blanchard Sellors, and George Allard, Petitioners; and William Edwin Price, Respondent.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, We certify that at the conclusion of the said trial we determined that the said William Edwin Price, being the Member whose Election and Return were complained of in the said Petition, was not duly elected and returned, and we do hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

And whereas charges were made in the said Petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Act, report as follows:—

That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the consent or knowledge of either of the Candidates at the said Election.

And we further report, in pursuance of the said Acts, that upon the trial of the said Petition the persons who were proved to have been guilty of corrupt practices are:—Ebenezer Lugg, Samuel Jones, and Alfred Ricketts.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, we report that on the evidence before us, to which we have strictly confined our attention, we have no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the Election to which the Petition relates.

C. E. POLLOCK.
H. HAWKINS.

To the Right Honble.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

And the said Certificate and Report were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

PARLIAMENTARY AFFIRMATION (MR. BRADLAUGH).

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT TO MOTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I beg to give Notice that when the Prime Minister makes the Motion of which he gave Notice last night, I shall move, as an Amendment—

“That this House cannot adopt a Resolution which virtually rescinds the Resolution passed by it on the 22nd day of June last.”

MR. GORST gave Notice that before the Prime Minister should move his Resolution on Mr. Bradlaugh's case, he would put it to the Speaker as a Question of Order, Whether such a Resolution can be put to the House, as raising substantially the same question as one on which the judgment of the House has been already expressed in the current Session?

MINES REGULATION ACT, 1872—THE BLACK LAKE COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to the account of an explosion which appeared in the “Birmingham Weekly Post,” which occurred in the Black Lake Colliery, Swan village, Staffordshire, on the 7th instant, whereby the manager J. R. Cooksey and several other persons were severely burned; if it be correct that the manager took those persons into the mine along with him before it had been examined as to whether it was safe or not; if the manager holds a Government certificate of competency; and, whether he will direct or instruct a legal gentleman to attend the inquest on behalf of the State?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that in consequence of the hon. Member's Question he had communicated with Mr. Baker, the Inspector, who informed him that Mr. J. R. Cooksey, the manager, held a certificate of competency since February, 1875, and that until recently he had been certificated manager of a colliery at Wednesbury. Secondly, it was not correct that the manager had taken the men into the mine along with him before it had been examined as to whether it was safe or not. On the contrary, the mine had been examined and reported safe before the men went to work. Immediately after the explosion two men descended, and they stated that they found two safety lamps unscrewed, in which case, if correct, it would not be difficult to account for the explosion. He would make further inquiries, and ascertain if it would be necessary to send anyone to represent the Government at the inquest.

METEOROLOGICAL REPORTS.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, considering that the cost of telegraphing from London has been assigned as the reason against free transmission and publication of the meteorological reports and forecasts to the ports and fishing stations throughout the Kingdom, he will direct that the useful important information in question be promptly and freely made public in London, so that all who may desire to use it or telegraph it throughout the Kingdom may do so? He might add that the Chamber of Agriculture was desirous of having the information telegraphed to inland stations with a view to harvest prospects.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, I have to state in answer to the Question of the hon. and learned Member, that the information to which his Question refers is already, to a great extent, made public in London. The forecasts are prepared at 11 a.m. at the Meteorological Office. Forecasts are also prepared at 2.30 p.m. They are sent out by special messengers and posted at stations free of charge. Among other places, at both Houses of Parliament, Lloyd's Rooms, and the Mansion House, Cornhill, New Bond Street, and other prominent positions. In addition to the above forecasts, a watch is kept from 8.30 to 9 p.m., and whenever the Office thinks it necessary storm warnings and special forecasts are telegraphed to 133 stations. I may state that, if considered desirable, the forecasts made at 11 o'clock might be made more generally public.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: Will the noble Lord kindly say whether there is any objection to publish the 8 o'clock evening forecasts free?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: That would make a difference of £1,000 in the cost, and I do not think it necessary to propose a Supplementary Estimate to meet that charge.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: In consequence of the answer of the noble Lord, I beg to give Notice that I will call attention to the large grant made already upon the subject, and the small amount that would be required to make the observations infinitely more useful.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE CHIEF MOIROSE

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies Whether he will inquire into the truth of a statement made in the "Christian Express," published at the Lovedale Institution in South Africa, that the body of the Chief Moirose had been dreadfully mutilated, and his head carried off for scientific purposes by a Negro attached to the Cape Mounted Rifles.

MR. GRANT DUFF, in reply, said, that it was quite clear that the body of Moirose was buried the day after his mountain was taken; but, so far back as January last, a statement came to the knowledge of the then Secretary of State to the effect that his head had been removed for anatomical purposes. He immediately, of course, gave orders by telegraph that the head should be decently interred with the other remains, and soon afterwards a telegram was received stating that the order had been carried into effect.

THE PRISONS ACT, 1865 — MAGISTRATES' SENTENCES—THE CASE OF CATHERINE CONNOLLY.

MR. PASSMORE EDWARDS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of

Catherine Connolly, who, on Saturday last was sentenced to twenty-one days imprisonment with hard labour, without the option of a fine, for conveying to her husband, now in the House of Detention, a quarter of an ounce of tobacco in a pastry turnover intended for his dinner; and, whether he intends to interfere with the sentence?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I am not at all surprised at the attention which this sentence has created, and I have taken every means in my power to communicate with the magistrate who passed it. I wrote to him last night; but, getting no answer this morning, I directed my Private Secretary to go to the Court and communicate with him. Unfortunately, however, the magistrate is not sitting to-day; and, therefore, I have had no personal communication with him, although I hope to have it in the course of the day. As to the sentence, I have ascertained, however, certain circumstances which I will mention to the House. First of all, I should say that this conviction was under the Prisons Act of 1865, which certainly does appear in this particular, no doubt, to be a very severe Act; for it says that every person who, contrary to the regulations of the prison, brings, or attempts by any means whatever to introduce, any spirituous or fermented liquor, or tobacco, into any prison, shall, on conviction, be sentenced to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding six months, or be liable to a penalty not exceeding £20. It was under that provision that the woman was brought up. I am also informed that the newspaper reports were in many respects inaccurate. They stated that the woman was sentenced to hard labour, whereas the Statute does not authorize hard labour. It was also stated that the child was left to find its way home. That is inaccurate. The magistrate directed the police to take care of the child and to take it home. That is all the information concerning the case which I have at present, and I cannot undertake to say what I will do with the sentence until I have had an opportunity of communicating with the sitting magistrate. I can assure the House that no time will be lost in dealing with the case, and doing justice as far as possible.

CRIMINAL LAW—ALLEGED ILLEGAL DETENTION OF A FEMALE.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is true that a young woman named Hampson, who was sentenced at the Salford Quarter Sessions on 1st March last to three months imprisonment, has been detained beyond that period by mistake, in place of a prisoner under a longer sentence; and, whether, in that case, he has given directions for her liberation?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, it was not true the young woman in question had been illegally detained in prison, as it appeared that her sentence was not three, but six months.

ARMY—SURGEON MAJORS OF THE HOUSEHOLD CAVALRY.

MR. THORNHILL asked the Secretary of State for War, Why Surgeon Majors of Household Cavalry are compelled to retire at the age of fifty-five without further promotion, whereas in other branches of the service Surgeon Majors, at and after the age of fifty-five, can attain higher rank, and their compulsory retirement does not occur till the age of sixty?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, the hon. Member must be under some misapprehension. Surgeon Majors in every branch of the Service are compulsorily retired at the age of 55.

ARMY—AUXILIARY FORCES—THE VOLUNTEERS AND THE ELECTIONS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that the Kent County Annual Volunteer Competition had suddenly to be postponed on account of the nomination of a candidate for Gravesend having been fixed for the same day as the competition; and, whether, inasmuch as the proceedings at a nomination are now only of a formal character, he will alter the Volunteer regulations so as to limit the prohibition of Volunteer meetings to the polling day only?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that I am not aware that the Kent Volunteer competition gathering was postponed on account of the nomination at Gravesend.

Prohibitions on Volunteer gatherings are not limited to polling and nomination days, as in the case of Regular troops, by statute. It has, however, been considered desirable that Volunteers as a body should not assemble during the progress of an election; and the Volunteer Regulations therefore lay down (Section 14, paragraph 419) that Volunteer corps shall not assemble for drill or any other purpose between the issue of a Writ and the termination of an election. Considering the reasons which led to this Regulation, I am not in a position to say that I am prepared to alter it.

POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—DISCLOSURE OF TELEGRAMS.

MR. CALLAN asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House, Copies of the Informations in the case of the Queen v. Burton, a telegraph clerk, sworn before the police magistrates of the city of Dublin on or about the 20th May last; of the bail bonds entered into by the prisoner and his bailsmen; of the official or special shorthand writers' report of the trial at Green Street on Friday, June 18, 1880, when the aforesaid Henry Burton was convicted of, and sentenced to two months' imprisonment for, disclosing telegrams in reference to the late election for the county of Meath; and, whether, considering the grave nature of the circumstances disclosed at said trial, and the importance of securing the confidence of the public in the inviolability of telegraph messages, he will advise Her Majesty's Government that a Commission, independent of the department, shall issue to inquire into the working of, and the complaints made of, alleged divulgations in the telegraph office, Dublin, with directions to report thereon?

MR. FAWCETT: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan), I beg to state that I have no objection to lay on the Table copies of the information and of the bail bonds, if these copies can be secured. With regard to the shorthand writers' notes in the case of the "Queen v. Burton," I shall also have no objection to lay those on the Table; but as they are somewhat voluminous, I think it would be undesirable to have them printed, unless the House subsequently desires it, which is in the discretion of hon. Members. With regard to the proceedings adopted in the Post Office, in any case where it is supposed that the contents of any telegram have been divulged by any official connected with the Post Office, an inquiry of the most searching kind is at once undertaken, and if the report is that the charges have been proved against the official, he is invariably prosecuted. In this case, against the express wish of the sender of the telegram, the telegraph clerk was prosecuted, and as a result of that prosecution, he was sentenced to two months' imprisonment with hard labour. Under the circumstances I have explained I cannot recommend the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the matter referred to, and I think the proceedings adopted by the Post Office are quite sufficient.

Mr. Childers

MR. CALLAN: Sir, in consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to give Notice that on Thursday next I shall ask the Postmaster General, Whether any reports have been made by the Post Office authorities in Dublin to the Head Office here as to complaints having been made in Dublin of the divulgation of telegrams with reference to the candidature of any party at the late election for the county of Westmeath, and also, as to instructions sent and details of intended movements of Mr. Donnelly in the bye-election for Louth in the month of April last having been divulged to certain members of the Land League in Dublin?

ORDER OF THE DAY.

(Mr. W. E. Forster, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE ON AMENDMENT ON SECOND READING. [25th June.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [25th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. TOTTENHAM: I rise, Sir, to enter an earnest protest on behalf of the landlords of Ireland, and, indeed, I think I may say of the United Kingdom, against the further measure of confiscation and interference with the rights of property which Her Majesty's Government have thought fit to put before the House and the country. I followed attentively, and I have since read in the public papers, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill (Mr. W. E. Forster), and I failed to find one single syllable which could be called an argument in justification, or even in apology, for the principles of confiscation, injustice, and totally uncalled-for subversion of the rights of property which are contained therein. On the contrary, the facts stated by the right hon. Gentleman go conclusively to show, first, how thoroughly unjustified he was in not renewing the Peace Preservation Act, at least for some of the scheduled districts, where he has on his own showing and figures to keep a large force of police for the preservation of the peace and the enforcement of the law. He also stated, from a list of figures which he could not stand any cross-examination upon, that evictions had increased, and in the year 1879 had reached 1,098, as against 503 two years previously, and in this year 1,073. The right hon. Gentleman, however, forgot to tell the House that there are 600,000 agricultural holdings in Ireland, and that these figures, giving him credit for every one of the total number as being agricultural, and not one relating to a town or village holding, would be a fraction under one eviction in every 600 holdings. Now, Sir, I should like to ask how that figure will bear comparison with the present number of agricultural tenancies on hands in England, where it is not necessary to resort to eviction, and where, if the tenant is unable to pay the rent, he gives up his farm, and there is an end of the matter, and the landlord is not driven to evict him? I venture to say, Sir, that the comparison will be very much in favour of Ireland; and the number of farms now unlet, and on the hands of the landlords, will be very far under the proportion in England. Well now, Sir, where are the localities in which the great increase of these evictions has taken place? Why, in the very counties where the agitation against payment of rent at all is at its height—namely, Galway, Mayo, and Sligo, where process servers and bailiffs have been beaten in the execution of their duty. Where parties of men, disguised, have entered the houses of tenants, who were supposed to be inclined to pay, at night, and sworn them not to pay; and where notices have been posted on farms and in the district warning no person to have anything to do with evicted farms on pain of death. Where threatening letters have been sown broadcast; and where meetings have been held, attended by hon. Members of this House, where the rankest disloyalty and sedition have been unblushingly preached, and no efforts have been spared to stir up the feelings of the people against the law, against payment of rent, and against their landlords, who are their natural friends and protectors. At the last Winter Assizes for the Province or Circuit of Connaught, I was foreman of the Grand Jury, before whom the Bills of indictment for all the five counties were sent, and I will give the House an abstract of the crimes for which prisoners were actually arraigned, and also of those for which no persons were made answerable. I find, Sir, on referring to the Return of agrarian crimes presented to Parliament for the year ending January 31, 1880, that out of a total of 977 crimes and outrages of this nature committed in Ireland, no less than 480, or nearly half the whole number, occurred in the counties of Mayo, Sligo, and Galway, where this criminal agitation is now being carried on. To give the House a sample of what these crimes are, I will give the details of one county—namely, Sligo, which is the only one I have been able to obtain in time:—Firing at the person, 3; wounding, 2; assault on process server, 1; killing and maiming cattle, 7; malicious injuries to property, 2; assembling armed, or disguised, or unlawfully tendering oaths, 14; seizing arms, 1; sending threatening letters, 20; sedition, 3; total, 53; less cases for trial 5; total not amenable, 48. These will give the House some idea of the state those counties have been brought to by agitation, and the teaching of those whose

way in which their efforts are sneered at, their sacrifices made light of, and their acts and intentions wilfully perverted, distorted, and misrepresented is enough to dry up the milk of human kindness in any breast, and divert the stream of self-denying expenditure to any other land, rather than one where, no matter what is done, or however good the object, a sinister motive is found and applied, without the slightest grounds or the slightest compunction, and where facts are wilfully perverted, and the grossest misrepresentations are of daily and hourly occurrence. In what position is it now proposed to put the landlord? Why, in the position of everything to pay, and nothing to pay it with, as the Government proposes to suspend the payment of rent. I put a Question to the Chief Secretary for Ireland the other night, and several other hon. Members put similar Questions, with a view of ascertaining whether the Government proposed to insert any concurrent proposal of relief for the class they propose to ruin; but, being an inconvenient view of the matter, the right hon. Gentleman declined to give us any answer, and challenged us to bring forward those arguments when the Bill was being discussed by the House. Well, Sir, I now ask Her Majesty's Government, whether, as they propose to take away from us the means of paying our debts and just demands, whether they are prepared to forego the payment by us of all the charges and taxes now payable by us to the Crown—namely, Income Tax, tithe rent-charge, quit, and Crown rents, succession duties, and all other items of Imperial taxation incidental to the ownership of property? Whether they are prepared to provide for the payment of poor's rates and county rates now payable by us, and the latter of which has latterly been largely increased by the Relief of Distress Act, which imposes half the repayment of the borrowed moneys upon the landlord? And I further ask them whether, as they are going to make it penal for the landlord to attempt to recover his rent, they will in common justice extend the principle to holders of charges of various kinds incidental to landed property, and make it equally penal on such persons if they require to be paid either interest or principal, annuity or rent-charge, during the continuance of this monstrous proposition? Can anyone say that this is not simple common sense and justice, and that English legislation is not bound to protect by even-handed justice the interests of all classes with whom the proposed measure is to deal? Now, Sir, while protesting in the strongest manner against the principles of the Bill which is before the House, do not let me for a moment be supposed to sympathize with any landlord who, in a time of distress and suffering, should harshly make use of the powers now vested in him by law, where he knew that the rents were not paid from real distress, or from causes beyond the tenants' control. I believe the men who would so act are very few indeed, and would certainly be no friends of mine; and it is a well-known fact that an ejectment for non-payment of rent is, in a large majority of cases, simply the instrument for compelling the unwilling, rather than those unable to pay. It is also well known that for one ejectment decree which is executed, 10 are either settled before execution or redeemed during the six months allowed for redemption. Lest anyone may retort—"Does this man practice what he preaches?" I will merely say for the information of the House that on my own estate there are upwards of 400 tenancies, and in the last 10 years I have had two ejectments for non-payment of rent, and two from other causes. The power of ejecting for non-payment of rent is the only handle a landlord has over a refractory and unwilling tenant, and if you take away that power by this penal legislation, I have no hesitation in saying that you will convert the whole area of the scheduled districts into one of self-declared paupers; so self-declared for the purpose of bringing themselves within the provisions of the Bill, and avoiding the payment of rent. I have lived all my life in close and intimate relations with the people, and I warn Her Majesty's Government that if they persist in this hastily considered and ill-advised interference with the rights of property they are simply pandering to that agitation which is the curse of that unfortunate country; they are letting in the thin end of the agitator's wedge; they will dangerously increase the tension of the relations, which unfortunately exists in some districts, between landlord and tenant; they will embitter the feelings which already exist; they will raise a frightful crop of litigation and discontent; they will render it impossible to collect rents justly due; and they will stop the flow of private expenditure on the part of the landlords, who will no longer have resources to draw upon, and on many of these who are now heavily burdened they will bring ruin. Sir, the strongest argument I can use against the Bill are the words of the right hon. Gentleman himself, at the earlier period of the Session, when he stated that he considered suspension of eviction as almost the same thing as suspension of payment of rent, and I will conclude by appealing to the House not to permit the landlords of Ireland again to be made the scapegoats of Liberal legislation, and the victims of renewed and gross injustice without cause or reason.

MR. ROUNDELL said, that any claim which he might have for asking the indulgence of the House whilst he addressed it upon that grave and difficult subject must be derived from the fact that for some months during the eventful Session of the disestablishment of the Irish Church he filled the post of Private Secretary to the then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; that in that capacity he was privy to every act of the Irish Government; and that since that time he had conceived an interest in the affairs of the Irish people that he should never lose. He did not presume to address himself to hon. Members from Ireland, who were so much better informed than himself upon all the details of this question. What he ventured to do as an English Member, and as one closely allied with the landowning interest, was to address himself to English and Scotch Members, and to put before them arguments which should remove the grave misapprehensions which existed as to the character and tendency of the Bill. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), who moved the rejection of the Bill, spoke of it as assailing the rights of property, not only in Ireland, but indirectly also in England, and as departing from every principle of legislation in civilized society. Compensation for improvements he could understand, but compensation for disturbance was quite another thing; and so he ventured to say that the circumstances of the Irish tenant were one thing, and the circumstances of the English tenant were quite another. The hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) had just now quoted words recently uttered by the Judge of the Landed Estates Court, whom he (Mr. Roundell) held in great respect; and, as he understood him, he mentioned as an instance of the mischief which the Bill would do in the case of certain land which was put up for sale, that no more than 12 years' purchase was bid for it. Of course, it was impossible for them to judge of the relevancy of that statement of the learned Judge without being informed—first, whether the rent was excessive; and, secondly, as he shrewdly suspected, whether the land in question was in a distressed district. The objections which struck the English mind in particular with regard to this Bill were two—first, that the measure was novel in principle; and, secondly, that it was subversive in its tendency of the rights of property. He should attempt to show that neither of these contentions held good. He took his stand upon the Land Act. It appeared to him that the principle of the Bill was contained in the Land Act of the year 1870, and that being so, the proposal before the House was certainly not novel. He was in no way concerned to defend the Act of 1870, which stood upon the Statute Book; but wished only for his present purpose to show that the Bill under discussion was an extension of the principles of the Act, not a departure from them. The scope of that Act might be briefly described as two-fold—first, in Ulster, it gave legal effect to the existing tenant right; and outside Ulster its object was to furnish the Irish tenants, and especially the small Irish farmer, with a safeguard analogous to the Ulster tenant right in the shape of compensation for damages in case of eviction. There was a fundamental difference between the English and Irish tenant, and it was this—that the small Irish farmer had secured to him by law a property in his occupancy, a kind of vested right to compensation in case of disturbance from his holding. That was the main feature of the Act, although it did exclude, as a general rule, the principle of giving compensation for eviction in consequence of non-payment of rent. He would now endeavour to prove that the principle of recognizing ejectment for non-payment of

perty for sale." It is now further proposed to make penal any attempt on the part of the landlord to enforce the contract entered into between him and his tenant, inasmuch as the Bill puts it in the power of the Chairman of the County Court to fine the landlord to an amount perhaps 20 times as great as the amount of the rent he seeks to recover, for being so unreasonable as to look for his just rights. I will merely put a case, the figures of which speak for themselves. A tenant owes a year's rent amounting to £10, and, under the Disturbance Clause of the Act of 1876 and the present Bill, the landlord who proceeds to recover this rent may have to pay £70 to begin with, as a compensation for disturbance, and any further amount which the Chairman, in his discretion, may see fit to award, for improvements, manures, drainage, fencing, and all the various items of which these claims are usually made up; and experience of the awards in these cases has shown that in many of them the award, based upon very slight oral evidence, has far exceeded the actual disturbance compensation. Taking the very smallest proportion to which it is likely this claim would be reduced to, and putting it at a further sum of £30, you are thus going to put the landlord in the position of being fined £100, because he seeks to recover £10 which is lawfully due to him. Is that the much-boasted British sense of right and justice? Are hon. Members on that side of the House going to support such a monstrous subversion of all the principles of the rights of property as this? I ask English Members opposite, would they countenance such legislation, if it were proposed to apply it in England; and, if not, why should they look calmly on and see a principle established which will assuredly some day, not far distant, recoil upon their own heads? Sir, I do not believe that the Englishman's love of fair play and freedom of contract will permit many hon. Gentlemen opposite to endorse such a policy as this; but that they will rather adopt the manly and indignant protest of the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Grey), who gave Notice of opposing a Bill of a character precisely similar to this in principle, and which I may call the mother of this Bill, in consequence of the vacillating and uncertain reply given by Her Majesty's Government when appealed to for an expression of their policy on the principle of the Bill. Will the right hon. Gentleman who has introduced this Bill tell us what is the cause of his sudden and extraordinary change of front, and what are the reasons which have changed his opinions, openly expressed one short month ago, that suspension of eviction was almost the same thing as suspension of payment of rent? Sir, I shall be told that these penalties are not to attach to the landlord, except in the cases of the Provisoes in Clause 1, first of which is, that it shall be proved to the Court that the tenant is unable to pay, caused by distress. Now, Sir, does not everyone acquainted with Ireland know that any tenant to whom it may be inconvenient to pay his rent will find no difficulty in swearing, and in accumulating proof after proof, that it is distress and inability, and not unwillingness to pay, causes him to be in arrear. The onus probandi to the contrary will thus devolve upon the landlord; and if a man swears positively that he has not the money, and cannot make it, how is the landlord to prove that he has? I should like to tell the House a little incident which was related to me by an agent living in one of the districts scheduled to this Bill, as having come under his own notice. A tenant came into the office, and begged him, for charity's sake, not to press him for the rent, swearing by every saint in the calendar that he had done his best to make it up, but had only succeeded in making a part of it, and begged him to accept it for the present on account, putting down a roll of notes on the table. The rent was £8, and on the agent opening the roll he saw there were two £5 and two £1 notes. "Why, Pat," said he, "I only want £8, and here are £12." Pat's face immediately fell, and feeling in the pocket, he replied—"Begorra, your honour, I gave you the wrong roll"; and it then turned out that, notwithstanding his protestations of poverty, he had a second roll of four £1 notes, which he was trying it on with the agent to get him to accept, and which he probably would have done had not the tenant over-reached himself. I mention this to illustrate the extreme difficulty of disproving any tenant's statement of the state of his finances. Now, Sir, what is the 2nd Proviso?—

that is to say, in other words, that he is willing and anxious to continue without paying the rent then due, and to be allowed to go on accumulating arrears. Are these just and reasonable terms, and could anyone in their senses say that such terms are, in the words of the 3rd proviso, unreasonably refused by the landlord? I maintain that the title by which it is proposed to call this Act is entirely erroneous and misleading, and that its proper title is "A Bill for the Suspension of Payment of Rent." I say a Bill, as I do not believe the House of Commons will ever permit it to become an Act of Parliament. I hope the House will now permit me to say a few words on the subject of the much-abused class to which I have the misfortune to belong—namely, the Irish landlord, and to record my protest against the spirit in which, both in this House and out of it, Irish Members persistently and invariably speak to their discredit, in a manner calculated to stir up hatred and ill blood between those who should be, and who but for such teaching would be, the best of friends; and I hope the House will grant me a little special indulgence for trespassing on its time when I say that, though there are Members far more entitled than myself to take up its time on the general question, I believe I am the sole Representative on this side of the House of the landed interest in the scheduled districts. A poster, which is a fair specimen of those which are habitually issued and placarded over the country, came to my hands a few days ago, and if the House will allow me, I will read it, to show to those Gentlemen who are not connected with Ireland the vituperation and abuse which is systematically showered upon the Irish landlord. I may also say that the meeting called by this poster is to be held on an estate, the owner of which bears a name pre-eminently high among Irish landlords, as remarkable for kindness, charity, and generosity in all his dealings with those dependent on him, and who has habitually been one of the largest employers of labour, and is now expending large sums in this very district—I mean the present Lord Ardilaun, better known to hon. Members of this House as Sir Arthur Guinness.

Anyone not acquainted with Ireland might well believe that the Irish landlord, as a rule, is a thing to be abhorred and turned from in disgust, as incapable of any sympathy with distress and suffering, and a mere machine for squeezing the last possible shilling out of his tenantry and turning every opportunity to his own account and profit. Sir, it is only those who live in the country and among the people, and who have some connection—not a connection born yesterday—with them and their interests, who know the sacrifices that have been made and the sums that have been expended by Irish landlords in the relief of distress; and I say that the way in which their efforts are sneered at, their sacrifices made light of, and their acts and intentions wilfully perverted, distorted, and misrepresented is enough to dry up the milk of human kindness in any breast, and divert the stream of self-denying expenditure to any other land, rather than one where, no matter what is done, or however good the object, a sinister motive is found and applied, without the slightest grounds or the slightest compunction, and where facts are wilfully perverted, and the grossest misrepresentations are of daily and hourly occurrence. There was a fundamental difference between the English and Irish tenant, and it was this—that the small Irish farmer had secured to him by law a property in his occupancy, a kind of vested right to compensation in case of disturbance from his holding. That was the main feature of the Act, although it did exclude, as a general rule, the principle of giving compensation for eviction in consequence of non-payment of rent. He would now endeavour to prove that the principle of recognizing ejectionment for non-payment of rent as disturbance by the landlord was to be found both explicitly and implicitly in the existing Land Act. If he succeeded in that contention, he should have refuted the objection that the principle of this Bill was a novel one, and quite unknown to existing legislation; and it would, to a certain extent, make good the further contention that the Bill was not subversive of the rights of property. He thought, however, that he should be able to show, to the satisfaction of the House, that this principle was to be found in the existing Act. Now, he would ask the House to consider one or two main features of the 9th and 18th sections of the Land Act. It was stated, no doubt, that ejectment for non-payment of rent should not be deemed disturbance of the tenant. But several speakers, and among them the hon. Member for Leitrim, had lost sight of the important fact that further on, in the same section, it was stated that if in regard to holdings let at an annual rent not exceeding £15 the Court should certify that the non-payment of rent causing the eviction had arisen from the rent being exorbitant, then that might be treated as a disturbance by the landlord. But the case did not stop there. It would be in the recollection of the House that, in the form in which this section was sent up in the first instance to the House of Lords, it did not limit the Court to the consideration of the exorbitancy of the rent; but it empowered the Court on special grounds to consider whether such ejectment were a disturbance or not. He might fairly argue from that that, so far from the principle of the Bill being novel, it was one which a majority of that House had sanctioned in 1870, and long before the anti-rent agitation, the influence to which that Bill was attributed. Therefore, as the Land Bill originally went up to the other House it had even a wider scope than the Bill before the House. He must ask the House for a moment to consider the terms of the 18th section, commonly known as the Equities Section, which regulated the whole machinery of the Act. The Court was empowered, in case of any claim between landlord and tenant, to take into consideration any unreasonable conduct of either party, and at the end of the section the House would find words precisely similar to those in this Bill—

“ If the tenant was willing to continue in the occupation of his holding upon just and reasonable terms.”

By the 9th section, the Court was empowered to consider exorbitant rent as one of those special cases under which ejectment for non-payment of rent was a disturbance. That section gave the Court a certain discretion, within narrow limits, which the present Bill extended, but not so far as a majority of the House proposed to carry it, as the Land Bill went up to the House of Lords; for, if the Bill, as originally sanctioned by that House, had become law, under the terms “special grounds,” any other reason could have been assigned as good cause for treating ejectment for non-payment of rent as disturbance. But this latitude was avoided by the limited character of the Government Bill, for it would be remarked that the Government Bill was strictly limited both in time, locality, and object. The Act empowered the Court to treat exorbitant rent as a cause of disturbance by the landlord, and entitling the tenant to compensation; but what the Bill did was to treat severe distress, which, to use the expressive language of the lawyers, was the act of God, as entitling the tenant to compensation in case of ejectment, and thus preventing a landlord from taking advantage of the Act so as to deprive his tenant of the right of compensation, which, under the Act, he ought to receive. So far, he had dealt with the statement that the Bill was novel in principle; now he would refer to the objection, so much dwelt upon, that the Bill dealt unfairly with the Irish landlord. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Tottenham) had said under the Bill the landlord had everything to pay, and nothing to pay it. Another expression he had used was, that a tenant might emigrate with the plunder of the landlord in his pocket; and he also spoke of the Bill as an act of confiscation, and totally subversive of the rights of property. He (Mr. Roundell) must venture to make some remarks on those observations, because it appeared to him that they were not borne out by the facts of the case. It was not the fact that the landlord was compelled to pay compensation to the tenant. He understood the object of the Bill was to make the hard and unconscientious landlord conform to the practice of the good one. That was the principle of the Land Act, and that he understood to be the principle of the Bill. How could it be said that the tenant might emigrate with the plunder of the landlord in his pocket, when he must pay out of the compensation money the arrears of rent to the landlord, and only retain what he had paid for improvements of his own? There was a cardinal distinction between the state of things in England and Ireland. English Members would be surprised when he mentioned the fact that there was an Irish landlord with an income of from £15,000 to £20,000, made up of a rental averaging £5 per annum. The estimated number of small farms was nearly 400,000. When he remembered what fell from the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) as to the difference between compensation for disturbance and compensation for improvements, he could not help thinking of what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland on Friday last, about the number of evictions, and of the way in which the officers had to be protected by almost a small army. A well-known authority on the subject—Mr. Baldwin of Glasnevin—had stated as a rule that a farmer who derived all his income from land could not support himself and his family on a rental below £8 a-year, while the greater number of them below that figure eked out a miserable existence. Then, it might be asked, why did these poor people cling to their land with such limpet-like tenacity? That question was answered by the statement appearing in the evidence before the Devon Commission, that the possession of land, however small, was becoming the only security for the supply of food, and that to lose this security was to risk the very existence of the family from which it was taken. It followed that it was by no means untrue to say that eviction, in the eyes of many of the peasantry, was tantamount to a sentence of death. He would ask the House to connect the subject of the small farmers, with which the Bill was mainly to deal, with the further fact, which was admitted by all who knew Ireland, that the agrarian outrages of which so much had been heard in the distressed district, mainly occurred in connection with the small farmers. When he was in Ireland, it was his fortune to be there at a time when evictions were frequent and agrarian outrages were rife.

It was an incident of agrarian outrage that it went undiscovered, and the impunity which attended outrage had the effect of producing it. At the time to which he referred they occurred to such an extent as to amount in time almost to a state of civil war; and it was necessary, for the vindication of law and the cause of order, to pass the Westmeath Act, which was scarcely to be distinguished from a proclamation of martial law. It was because he remembered those things, in common with his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster), that he shrank from a repetition of such proceedings, and he supported the Bill before the House. The Bill was strictly limited in time, locality, and in object, and was promoted on the lines and in the spirit of the Land Act. He regretted the necessity for its introduction, and he admitted the grave difficulty of the subject; but in politics it was not a question of difficulty, but of choosing between the greater and the less difficulty; and he believed that by passing the Bill the greater difficulty would be avoided. After all, while admitting the difficulty, he was content to rest his defence of the measure on the plea put forward by the late Government in defence of their policy for the relief of distress, that it was one of exceptional legislation to meet exceptional circumstances, and, as an exceptional measure of relief, not subject to the criticisms which its provisions would excite if it were based on ordinary financial grounds.

MR. BRODRICK said, he did not think it necessary or even material to consider the question which had just been raised, whether the Bill was or was not in accordance with the spirit of the Land Act. He would much rather have heard the last speaker (Mr. Roundell) address himself to the facts brought forward by the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham), and attempt to rebut the assertions made on the authority of the best landlords of Ireland. His (Mr. Brodrick's) objection was that the supporters of the Bill took too much for granted, and adduced too little of fact and argument to support the case. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. W. M. Johnson) had appealed to the House not to treat the question as one between class and class, and he (Mr. Brodrick) shared the desire not to do so; but the Chief Secretary had leagued himself with hon. Members from Ireland who did treat the question as one between landlords and tenants, and while he (Mr. Brodrick) was sorry it had been so treated, he could not ignore the fact that the Chief Secretary appeared unable to divest himself of their sentiments and to use simple and relevant arguments. Many arguments had been brought forward; but had they been supported by facts? The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) insinuated the other night that the landlords of Ireland had, since the passing of the Land Act, been gradually putting up the rents until they were only just outside the word "exorbitant;" but he had cast such statements broadcast throughout the country without any facts or figures to prove them. The hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), when he rose in his place, late at night, to bring in his Bill, the principle of which had been accepted by the Government, complained bitterly of the action of the landlords of Ireland in regard to their tenants; but not a single fact had been brought forward in support of that suggestion. No one had shown that the suggestion had the slightest foundation. Not a single case of unrighteous and wrongful eviction had been adduced; but such a revolutionary measure ought surely to be supported by facts which would show that there was a real and genuine evil to be redressed. In reply to a question from the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) about the distress of 1847, it had been said that the Government of the day did not contemplate unusual measures to meet it; but it was added that the Land Act had not then been passed. Was it to be inferred from this that now, 10 years after the passing of the Land Act, there was less security than there was before? If landlords generally had not been exercising their rights wrongfully, why did not the right hon. Gentleman show that he was not legislating for all landlords, but only for the exceptions? It was equally untrue to say that since the passing of the Land Act the bone and sinew necessary for the improvement of the land had been supplied by the tenants. It must be patent to everybody that the essence of the legislation of 1870 was that it forced the landlord to spend money on his estate out of his own pocket, wherever loans were made to him or to the tenant, with power to the tenant to claim compensation if he were evicted. In any case the money came out of the pocket of the landlord. If this Bill were exceptional—and it was admitted that it was brought in in an exceptional time—there was all the more reason to take care that this experimental and exceptional Bill did not deal with cases other than those for which it was intended. The right hon. Gentleman told them he did not impeach landlords generally, and proposed to legislate only for exceptions; and yet by this Bill he proposed to deal with a far larger class than that which could be included under this head. To punish all landlords was not the desire of the right hon. Gentleman; but it was the desire of the hon. Members from Ireland below the Gangway on the Opposition side. They did not regard the Bill in the light of a final settlement of their claims. It was a Bill stating a principle which they desired to see carried further in the future. The hon. Member for Mayo would be found as tenacious of his object as Shylock was of his bond, though, at present, he would not claim the whole at once, but was prepared to accept a part if helped to it by the right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench. The object of these hon. Members was rather to keep the question alive by this Bill than to arrive at any final settlement; but he (Mr. Brodrick) trusted that the House would not sanction legislation which would have that effect, and stamp it with the approval of Government and Parliament. What he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland was, whether he thought in keeping the question alive in that way by bringing in a ten minutes Bill he was really acting in a way that would strengthen the hands of the law in Ireland, and promote order and good government? By the Bill landlords who had spent large sums on their estates for improvements would be placed in the same category with those who had not expended a farthing. He deprecated forcing the good landlord into the same category with the bad one, against whom it might be right to provide by law. There were three classes of estates affected by the Bill. One of these consisted of land reclaimed from the bog by the tenants. There were, undoubtedly, large tracts of country which were worth nothing to the land-

he understood to be the principle of the Bill. How could it be said that the tenant might emigrate with the plunder of the landlord in his pocket, when he must pay out of the compensation money the arrears of rent to the landlord, and only retain what he had paid for improvements of his own? There was a cardinal distinction between the state of things in England and Ireland. English Members would be surprised when he mentioned the fact that there was an Irish landlord with an income of from £15,000 to £20,000, made up of a rental averaging £5 per annum. The estimated number of small farms was nearly 400,000. When he remembered what fell from the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) as to the difference between compensation for disturbance and compensation for improvements, he could not help thinking of what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland on Friday last, about the number of evictions, and of the way in which the officers had to be protected by almost a small army. A well-known authority on the subject—Mr. Baldwin of Glasnevin—had stated as a rule that a farmer who derived all his income from land could not support himself and his family on a rental below £8 a-year, while the greater number of them below that figure eked out a miserable existence. Then, it might be asked, why did these poor people cling to their land with such limpet-like tenacity? That question was answered by the statement appearing in the evidence before the Devon Commission, that the possession of land, however small, was becoming the only security for the supply of food, and that to lose this security was to risk the very existence of the family from which it was taken. It followed that it was by no means untrue to say that eviction, in the eyes of many of the peasantry, was tantamount to a sentence of death. He would ask the House to connect the subject of the small farmers, with which the Bill was mainly to deal, with the further fact, which was admitted by all who knew Ireland, that the agrarian outrages of which so much had been heard in the distressed district, mainly occurred in connection with the small farmers. When he was in Ireland, it was his fortune to be there at a time when evictions were frequent and agrarian outrages were rife.

It was an incident of agrarian outrage that it went undiscovered, and the impunity which attended outrage had the effect of producing it. At the time to which he referred they occurred to such an extent as to amount in time almost to a state of civil war; and it was necessary, for the vindication of law and the cause of order, to pass the Westmeath Act, which was scarcely to be distinguished from a proclamation of martial law. Mr. Brodrick lord a short time ago, and their value now was due to the application of the capital and industry of the tenants and not that of the landlords. He admitted that legislation might be rightly turned in the direction of these cases. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Roundell) said it was only in the case of small farmers that evictions took place. Why, then, was not the operation of the Bill confined to that class? He knew a gentleman who held an estate of £16,000 a-year in the county of Cork, on which had been spent during the last 35 years a sum of £150,000 in absolute improvements. Within the last few years he had reduced his rents, and had succeeded in getting along without ejecting more than one tenant; and yet such a landlord as that would be placed by the Bill in the same category as one who had never expended a farthing on improving his estate. This they were, in fact, asked to do, in the face of the experience of 1847, which showed them that many good landlords were able to get rid of a certain number of tenants, whose case they themselves were convinced was hopeless, by giving them sums of money to go to America or elsewhere. It was a serious thing, too, to interfere by legislation between parties to a contract by postponing the fulfilment of one portion of the contract for an almost indefinite period of time. In a commercial transaction such a thing would be simply ruinous; and if it were allowed in the case of landlord and tenant he saw nothing but ruin to a great many good Irish landlords. This Bill, in depriving them of their rents, would also deprive good landlords of the reward which they had a right to expect for sacrificing a part of their present income for the future benefit of their property. Then there was the case of estates which bordered on the distressed districts; and on this point he would endeavour to refute the Chief Secretary by his own arguments. The tenants on one side of the line would have privileges which the tenants on the other side would not possess, and thus a sense of wrong and hardship would be created, as was found to be the case on estates on one portion of which the Ulster tenant right existed and on another part of which no such custom was recognised. But then it was said that the terms of the compensation to be awarded were to be reasonable. What were reasonable terms? What was to be the standard? Was it to be Griffith's valuation? He knew that many tenants would wish to return to that valuation, because it was made at a time when the prices of many things were not half what they now were, and when great ignorance as to the capabilities of the soil prevailed. They were asked to set up a tribunal which would have power to award two to seven years' rent by way of compensation, and the right hon. Gentleman said there would be the rent to set off against the compensation. What possible advantage could it be to a landlord to know that the rent he ought to receive was to be set off against the compensation which he ought never to have been called upon to pay? He hoped the House would not sanction legislation which would set class against class, and revive many feelings in Ireland which had perished with the expiration of the penal laws—legislation by which a power would be given to a Court of revising the rents of every landlord in Ireland, and to a Court over which a barrister would preside who had no training in land valuation, and no previous knowledge of the estates with which he would have to deal. It should also be borne in mind that Ireland contained no class like the valuers of this country, who could be brought in to act as umpires between landlord and tenant. Such legislation would establish a principle negating the wholesome rule of honesty, that what a man contracted to do he should be held bound to do; and he besought the House to guard against a proposal which, under the specious plea of charity, would relieve the distress of one class by transferring to it the property of another.

MR. O'SHEA said, he rose with much hesitation, as a new Member, for the purpose of pointing out to hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House that the Bill was not likely to cause social revolution in Ireland, and that it was not expedient to oppose the measure even on behalf of the landlords themselves. Hon. Members seemed to fancy that the Bill was a great infringement of the rights of property. Now it seemed to him that the phrase had the vice of generalizations; it covered too much, it embraced arbitrary as well as essential rights. The right hon. Members contended for could be at best but the former, for, however, they might object, it was still the fact that the Bill followed in the lines of the Act of 1870, that its principle was laid down by that Act—namely, that the tenant was given an interest, a right of property, a tenant right, or whatever it might be called, from the time of the passing of that Act. He, for one, had never heard any valid reason given for that, except that of expediency, and he argued that was now on the other side, for why should a tenant be deprived of that right, because he owed a year's rent to the landlord, rather than because he owed a year's bill to the shop-keeper? After the lucid explanation on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, it seemed strange that there should be so many men of intelligence in London unable to grasp the fact that the County Court Judge would not in every case be obliged to give the maximum rates of compensation laid down in the Schedule. The safeguard of the landlord lay in the character of the Court, which would have to distinguish between fault and misfortune, to reduce exaggerated claims and reject fictitious ones. Generally speaking, the decision of the County Court Judges were satisfactory at present—that was his opinion as a landlord. If this measure was to be permanent, it might then be fairly objected that some other tribunal of greater force should have been immediately established. But it was only a temporary measure, and already there were sufficient guarantees from the tribunals of the County Court to warrant the House giving to them an amount of confidence and trust which, he believed, would not be misplaced. He was glad to hear the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Brodrick) speak so kindly of the tenants who had reclaimed bogs; there was no class which deserved more consideration. He (Mr. O'Shea) entered into calculations, based upon the interest paid for borrowed money and the value of the labour expended, to show that it would take a very long time to exhaust the value of these improvements. A large landowner, who did not share the alarm of hon. Members opposite, had written to him (Mr. O'Shea) the other day, saying that he preferred the Government Bill as a more tentative measure, although he had little objection even to the hon. Member for Mayo's (Mr. O'Connor Power's) Bill, small as was his confidence in its author. He (Mr. O'Shea) did not think either of them would materially affect good landlords. He must confess that there were many friends of his who had a great objection to the Bill, and who thought there would be very great difficulty in getting in rents in future in Ireland, but so thought many in 1870; and, on the other hand, he was one of those who, perhaps, being equally good judges, thought differently. Now, with regard to the agitation. Some sacrifice ought to be made to allay it. As the proverbial tree escaped injury by bending to the storm, so landlords would do well to make some sacrifice now. No doubt the present generation of Irishmen were less patient than those who had gone before it. They were in constant communication with the Ireland beyond the sea, by correspondence with emigrant friends and relations, and by means of a cheap, exciting Press largely conducted by the sons of those who, by exile, escaped from the great Famine, and had brought up their children in the traditions of it. Like the Roman, the Irishman did not change his heart when he changed his sky. Irishmen in America were always vaguely looking forward to great days for Ireland, and what was more, they were willing to subscribe towards them. Under these circumstances it would be well to see if a compromise could not be arrived at which he believed might turn out to the advantage of all concerned. The Bill was a very small and temporary one; but they looked forward to the Government bringing in a much larger measure next Session. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite ought not to laugh too soon; because it was evident that Ireland must have another Land Bill passed, and that being so, it would be better to have a large and comprehensive measure, one which would benefit all classes, and renew the good feeling between landlord and tenant. No hon. Gentleman had read with greater pain than he had the record of agrarian crime in Ireland which had been lately presented to Parliament; but, at the time, hon. Gentlemen who carefully examined the Returns would see that they were largely made up of letters and notices, which, however reprehensible in themselves, really conveyed no menace to human existence; and merely glancing at the broad figures would create a false impression as to the

to do, that his own labour and the exercise of his own personal qualities was what he must rely on—when they told him he need not pay for soil which was uncongenial and would not yield him the ordinary means of livelihood, instead of teaching him to rely upon himself, they were doing him harm. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant encouraged the hope that numbers of those who were now endeavouring to drag on a miserable existence on patches of exhausted land would be induced to emigrate to places where they might find the proper means of support. He (Mr. W. H. Smith) agreed in that view; and any scheme of the kind which was sound in principle would receive, both in the House and out of it, a cordial support. Many people would put their hands into their pockets in order to achieve such an object. But the present Bill provided that the aid to be given to these struggling people should be taken out of the pockets of one class, whether they could afford it or not. From the knowledge he had been able to obtain of the landlords of Ireland, he should imagine there was hardly any class so entirely dependent on the particular property they held, and that many of them were not in a position to meet the circumstances in which this law would place them. In England it was a very common thing for men to hold property of different kinds; but he was afraid that in Ireland a landlord usually depended almost exclusively on the land. If this Bill were passed into law he could not imagine that the poorer tenants in the scheduled districts would pay any rent before 1881. ["No, no!"] At all events, there was evidence to show that that would be the case, and that the effect of the Bill would be to prevent the payment of rent till 1881 at least. The landlord would require compensation for the loss it would entail upon him. The right hon. Gentleman asked them to understand he hoped there would be many landlords who would find means to enable the poor people to emigrate. But where were the landlords to get the money? It was notorious that they had charged their estates largely in order to promote relief works, and they were now in many cases without rents. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster referred to the fact that money had been spent in past prosperous years by the landlords. He feared that if the harvest fortunately proved a good one, a great deal of the money which the tenant realized from it would be gone before the arrears of rent could be paid to the landlord. What would the tenant really understand by the Bill? Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway could supply an answer to that question. For himself, he need not tread upon the ground taken by the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham), who had told the House facts that would necessarily have a very great effect upon hon. Gentlemen opposite. The hon. Member knew very well what was the meaning of the Bill, and he knew that the tenant would regard it as something intended to relieve him of his duty of paying rent—as an indication that something would occur between this and the end of 1881 that would have the effect of destroying his obligations in a strange and exceptional way. He (Mr. W. H. Smith) had listened to the speeches of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), and of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and it had appeared to him that their arguments were inconsistent, for in one instant the Bill was said to be well within the scope of the Land Act of 1870, and almost in the same breath it was declared to be only a temporary measure intended to meet peculiar circumstances. If it was drawn in the spirit of the Land Act, it certainly would encourage the expectations of the people, and it undoubtedly did encourage them to look forward to changes which could not be granted with safety to property anywhere. In spite of the ability and moderation of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, it was a very dangerous speech—because it admitted the principle, but yet did not go far enough practically, nor offer to satisfy what were called the just claims of the people of Ireland to fixity of tenure. He did not know whether right hon. Gentlemen opposite were prepared seriously to grant fixity of tenure; but he could imagine nothing that would tend more certainly, within a generation or so, to bring about disasters, and among them the return of the horrors of the Famine of the year 1846-7. It was not such reforms as that which they required. With fixity of tenure, it would be impossible to prevent overcrowding, and the consequence would be that an overwhelming population, barely existing on impoverished land, would easily fall victims to actual starvation. Nothing was more sad than to see people who had been educated in dependence on the State suffering as they were at present; but it was clear to him that the revolutionary tendency of the Bill would aggravate rather than remedy their unhappy state. No doubt, it was dangerous to property—that would be conceded—but he was not there to maintain the rights of property over the right to good government and good laws. The worst result of the Bill was that it would shake all confidence and security, for a necessary element of success was that capital which had been restricted by reason of the conditions which had hitherto existed. If property in Ireland were properly secured, they would have all the capital which was necessary for the development of the resources of the country. He thought sufficient importance had not been attached to the phase of the question which dealt with the position in which the owners of land would be placed by this law when they came to be called upon to pay the charges on their property. He had facts in his possession which proved conclusively that the landlords were greatly alarmed at the course taken by the Government. A letter had been put into his hands to the effect that a mortgage was about to be executed as a first charge on an estate of £2,500 a-year, and that the intended mortgagees withdrew from the transaction, when all the preliminaries had been settled, solely in consequence of the action of the Government. He also knew as a positive fact that solicitors in London who were charged with the interests of their clients were considering whether it was right to allow their money to remain on mortgage in Ireland. The Bill had, in fact, so thoroughly shaken the confidence of those who possessed capital, that solicitors in charge of property were seriously reviewing their position. Again, what was to be the position of men who could not get assistance to discharge their duties as owners of property, or who were called upon to pay money at present on mortgage? He put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be necessary to introduce into the Bill such provisions as would prevent the destruction of society in Ireland by securing some of the unfortunate landowners against the consequences of foreclosing? That was no light matter, because charges on the estate had to be paid, even though bankruptcy was the result. Then it was to be noticed that the changes would affect only the districts scheduled under the Bill—that was to say, the Bill would ruin so many landlords was confined to those districts in which the landlords had specially exerted themselves to relieve distress. What was to be done with those who were just outside the limits of the Bill? If on one side of a hedge the collection of rents was postponed till the end of 1881, what chance was there that they would be paid just on the other side of the imaginary boundary? The right hon. Gentleman had referred to the large army required to enforce evictions; but would it not be equally necessary just outside the scheduled districts?—unless, indeed, it was proposed to suspend the operation of the law throughout the whole country till the end of 1881. Would they say that the tenant of one estate should be be entitled to compensation for disturbance and deny the tenant of another? He was himself convinced that in dealing with this subject they had lost sight of what was the real cause of distress, or one of the real causes. It was not confined to the influence of the seasons, which, after all, had not been so unfavourable to Ireland as to England, but due, to a very considerable extent, to unobserved economical changes going on in certain part of the country. It was well known that formerly many Irish labourers used to come over to England at harvest time, for whom, owing to various causes, employment could not now be found. Great numbers of labourers now remained at home who used to obtain work and wages in England, and that cause, therefore, of the distress, being permanent — indeed, that employment would, without the fault of anybody, gradually grow less—could not be met by the Bill. Those labourers would simply be kept on small farms on which they could hardly live, and their condition would soon be a problem of the greatest difficulty. Then, in many cases, the land had become exhausted. These questions would have to be met in some

to do, that his own labour and the exercise of his own personal qualities was what he must rely on—when they told him he need not pay for soil which was uncongenial and would not yield him the ordinary means of livelihood, instead of teaching him to rely upon himself, they were doing him harm. The right hon. What would the tenant really understand by the Bill? Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway could supply an answer to that question. For himself, he need not tread upon the ground taken by the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham), who had told the House facts that would necessarily have a very great effect upon hon. Gentlemen opposite. The hon. Member knew very well what was the meaning of the Bill, and he knew that the tenant would regard it as something intended to relieve him of his duty of paying rent—as an indication that something would occur between this and the end of 1881 that would have the effect of destroying his obligations in a strange and exceptional way. He (Mr. W. H. Smith) had listened to the speeches of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), and of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and it had appeared to him that their arguments were inconsistent, for in one instant the Bill was said to be well within the scope of the Land Act of 1870, and almost in the same breath it was declared to be only a temporary measure intended to meet peculiar circumstances. If it was drawn in the spirit of the Land Act, it certainly would encourage the expectations of the people, and it undoubtedly did encourage them to look forward to changes which could not be granted with safety to property anywhere. In spite of the ability and moderation of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, it was a very dangerous speech—because it admitted the principle, but yet did not go far enough practically, nor offer to satisfy what were called the just claims of the people of Ireland to fixity of tenure. He did not know whether right hon. Gentlemen opposite were prepared seriously to grant fixity of tenure; but he could imagine nothing that would tend more certainly, within a generation or so, to bring about disasters, and among them the return of the horrors of the Famine of the year 1846-7. It was not such reforms as that which they required. With fixity of tenure, it would be impossible to prevent overcrowding, and the consequence would be that an overwhelming population, barely existing on impoverished land, would easily fall victims to actual starvation. Nothing was more sad than to see people who had been educated in dependence on the State suffering as they were at present; but it was clear to him that the revolutionary tendency of the Bill would aggravate rather than remedy their unhappy state. No doubt, it was dangerous to property—that would be conceded—but he was not there to maintain the rights of property over the right to good government and good laws. The worst result of the Bill was that it would shake all confidence and security, for a necessary element of success was that capital which had been restricted by reason of the conditions which had hitherto existed. If property in Ireland were properly secured, they would have all the capital which was necessary for the development of the resources of the country. He thought sufficient importance had not been attached to the phase of the question which dealt with the position in which the owners of land would be placed by this law when they came to be called upon to pay the charges on their property. He had facts in his possession which proved conclusively that the landlords were greatly alarmed at the course taken by the Government. A letter had been put into his hands to the effect that a mortgage was about to be executed as a first charge on an estate of £2,500 a-year, and that the intended mortgagees withdrew from the transaction, when all the preliminaries had been settled, solely in consequence of the action of the Government. He also knew as a positive fact that solicitors in London who were charged with the interests of their clients were considering whether it was right to allow their money to remain on mortgage in Ireland. The Bill had, in fact, so thoroughly shaken the confidence of those who possessed capital, that solicitors in charge of property were seriously reviewing their position. Again, what was to be the position of men who could not get assistance to discharge their duties as owners of property, or who were called upon to pay money at present on mortgage? He put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be necessary to introduce into the Bill such provisions

as would prevent the destruction of society in Ireland by securing some of the unfortunate landowners against the consequences of foreclosing? That was no light matter, because charges on the estate had to be paid, even though bankruptcy was the result. Then it was to be noticed that the changes would affect only the districts scheduled under the Bill—that was to say, the Bill would ruin so many landlords was confined to those districts in which the landlords had specially exerted themselves to relieve distress. What was to be done with those who were just outside the limits of the Bill? If on one side of a hedge the collection of rents was postponed till the end of 1881, what chance was there that they would be paid just on the other side of the imaginary boundary? The right hon. Gentleman had referred to the large army required to enforce evictions; but would it not be equally necessary just outside the scheduled districts?—unless, indeed, it was proposed to suspend the operation of the law throughout the whole country till the end of 1881. Would they say that the tenant of one estate should be entitled to compensation for disturbance and deny the tenant of another? He was himself convinced that in dealing with this subject they had lost sight of what was the real cause of distress, or one of the real causes. It was not confined to the influence of the seasons, which, after all, had not been so unfavourable to Ireland as to England, but due, to a very considerable extent, to unobserved economical changes going on in certain part of the country. It was well known that formerly many Irish labourers used to come over to England at harvest time, for whom, owing to various causes, employment could not now be found. Great numbers of labourers now remained at home who used to obtain work and wages in England, and that cause, therefore, of the distress, being permanent—indeed, that employment would, without the fault of anybody, gradually grow less—could not be met by the Bill. Those labourers would simply be kept on small farms on which they could hardly live, and their condition would soon be a problem of the greatest difficulty. Then, in many cases, the land had become exhausted. These questions would have to be met in some other way than by the suspension of the operation of the law. In Ireland, a temporary suspension of the law meant a great deal more than a temporary suspension, as they would find when they tried to re-enforce it. The present distress had brought to the notice of the House a question as grave as any that had ever been before it; and it was the duty of one like himself, who had held office under the Crown, to state his convictions on this subject. However great his sympathy might be—and it was and ought to be great—with the suffering people of Ireland, he prayed the House to hesitate before they passed the Bill, and to recognize that it contained principles which destroyed security of property, impaired the independence of the people, and would bring disaster to this country.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) said, that he entirely agreed with some of the observations of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. H. Smith), and, like him, wished to see the people of Ireland independent, and the landlords as well as the peasant farmers in the enjoyment of security. But with respect to the observations which had been made as to a sense of insecurity having been caused by the introduction of this Bill, he could not but think that any such feeling of insecurity, if it existed at all, was largely attributable to the exaggerated statements which had been made by hon. Gentlemen opposite and their supporters. One fundamental mistake ran through the whole of their statements. It was assumed that this Bill would stop the payment of rent for two years. Hon. Gentlemen, by a circuitous process, might, perhaps, persuade themselves that such would be the result; but, unquestionably, nothing of that kind was to be found in the Bill. The landlord, if the Bill passed, would have all the remedies which other creditors had for the recovery of their debts, and all the remedies which landlords in England had for the recovery of their rents. Another observation which had been made by hon. Gentlemen, and also by the leading journal, was that the tenants throughout Ireland were absolutely indisposed to pay their rents. He must beg leave to differ entirely from that assertion. He had known instances this very year in some of the most distressed districts where the rent had been paid by persons steeped in the deepest poverty, without any pressure and without the smallest hesitation. He denied that there was any general indisposition in Ireland to pay rent, although, no doubt, in parts of the country this indisposition to pay rent did exist, and in the distressed districts there was great difficulty in doing so. The right hon. Gentleman, like the hon. Gentleman who had moved the rejection of the Bill (Mr. Chaplin), treated the principle of this measure intended to meet an emergency which came from the hand of God, as totally unknown in any civilized community. But the doctrine was not so entirely novel. By the Roman civil law, which had been well called "written reason," and formed the basis of great part of the law of all European nations, and even by the law of Scotland, if by reason of some supervening calamity, such as inundation or even extreme inclemency of the weather, a tenant's crop did not repay his labour and his seed, he was not liable for that year's rent. He remembered that in one case, where the tenant's crop had been destroyed by a tremendous fall of hail, the Scotch Courts held that he had a sufficient cause for not paying the rent. That, indeed, was not the law of England or of Ireland; but those who held as a principle that the plea of a supervening calamity was not to be listened to, nay, that it would be morally wrong to listen to it, were carrying their contention further than either reason or authority would justify. And now a word as to the extent of the distress. They were told last February by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, and truly told, that the loss upon the crops in Ireland in 1879, as compared with 1878, amounted to £10,000,000. But how large a part of that £10,000,000 must be attributed to the distressed districts swept by Atlantic storms and close to the "melancholy ocean." With regard to the potato, which was the important crop for these poor people, figures showed that it was more than one-half less last year than in the year before, being 50,500,000 cwt. in 1878, and only 22,273,000 cwt. in 1879. The loss, too, nearly all belonged to the distressed districts. During the six years ending in 1876 the estimated value of the potato crop was nearly £9,500,000 sterling; in 1877, it was about £5,250,000; in 1878, £7,500,000; and in 1879, £4,250,000. This made a loss on the three years of about £10,000,000 in potatoes alone, according to the valuation put on them in Thom's Directory. The whole valuation of agricultural land in Ireland was but £11,000,000, of which £5,000,000 was in the distressed districts of the West; so that the loss on potatoes alone in the last three years amounted to nearly the whole valuation of Ireland, and taking the distressed Western half by itself, the loss there must have greatly exceeded its entire valuation. Let hon. Gentlemen try to realize the effect of the very bad harvest of 1879 coming after two exceedingly bad harvests. The accumulated effect on the poor Irish peasant was that all his savings were gone, and that he was unavoidably in debt. It was for that class of people, the small farmers—the vast majority of whom were below £8 valuation—that the late Government proceeded to legislate last spring; and it was, he submitted, hardly open to hon. Gentlemen opposite now to say that the distress was trifling or had passed away, so that this class did not now need any special treatment. This was a Bill limited in point of time, and also in point of space. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite passed a Bill to enable the poor people of these scheduled districts to buy seed at cost price, and gave them two years to pay the money. They also lent £1,250,000 to the landlords, charging them no interest for two years, and 1 per cent afterwards. Why was all this done. Surely not for the purpose of enabling the landlords to get their rents in full. If tenants were confessedly unable to crop their land how were they to pay the rent? The object of the late Government and Parliament was avowedly to keep the people from starving; and because they thought the best way of keeping them alive was by giving them employment through the landlords, they advanced money to the latter at little or no interest. Was the House now to be told that the distress was very much exaggerated, and that the people were quite able to pay their rents? And were they not only not to interfere with the landlord, but was he to be left armed with the power of evicting the people from the fields sown with the seed Parliament had lent them, in order that he might consolidate holdings and enlarge his farms? He did not think that any landlords would venture to say that they were to get £1,250,000 without interest for two years, and that seed was to be advanced to tenants for two years merely to enable tenants the better to pay their rent. He was glad to hear the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) say what he (the Attorney General for Ireland) had no doubt was perfectly accurate, that in the management of his own estate, with 400 tenants, he had never found it necessary to evict more than two. That was not only very creditable to the hon. Gentleman, but was an important fact in the consideration of this case, because it showed that the hon. Gentleman had been quite able to get his rents paid without eviction, and that the ordinary process of law was quite sufficient to enforce his rights.

MR. TOTTENHAM: It does not follow that I have my rents because I have held my hand. As a matter of fact, I have not got them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) was rather disposed to think he had got them. However, it was proverbially difficult to deprive a Highlandman of his nether garments; and if the tenants did not pay this year, it was, he believed, chiefly because they were in distress and had not the means of payment. He knew many landlords in that part of the country who had got in their rents as fairly well as could reasonably be expected in such a year. The question, however, had been asked, was there any necessity for this interference? Was it the case that evictions had increased and were increasing? Turning to the judicial statistics, which were accessible to all, he found these facts. In 1876 the total number of evictions for non-payment of rent in all Ireland was 1,269; in 1877 they rose to 1,323; in 1878 to 1,749; and last year they rose to 2,667. But were they still increasing? Well, he had made inquiries of the Sheriffs of the five distressed counties of Donegal, Kerry, Galway, Limerick, and Mayo, and the result of his inquiries was as follows:—In 1879 the evictions in those counties were 623. This year, from January to June, the numbers were 453, which would make 906 for the year. So that, if there were a similar increase in other counties, the growth of ejectments for all Ireland would be from 1,269 in 1877 to 3,893

in this year. Was not that somewhat startling? It showed, he submitted, that the evictions were still increasing; but, putting the figures of this year aside as in some degree speculative, the statistics up to last year were sufficiently significant. Did it not seem inconsistent that the landlords, to whom the Government had lent £1,250,000 to keep their poor tenants alive, should take advantage of this season of distress and famine to clear farms and consolidate them? He ventured to think that landlords who promoted their interests in that fashion would find no compassion in that House. Proprietors who had by purchase or inheritance acquired properties in what they regarded as an excessively subdivided or over-populated condition, should be content to take the burden with the benefit. They could not ask the House or the country to allow them to take advantage of a year such as the past to effect that improvement on their estates which, in ordinary times, they would have had to pay for. The House would not, he thought, permit them to make that improvement for nothing, and not only for nothing so far as their pockets were concerned, but at a considerable cost to the ratepayers of the country. For, as his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland had told them, during the last few months a small army of police, over 8,000 in number, for whom they did not pay, had been employed in Galway alone to carry out evictions and serve processes, in order that by this help a few grasping landlords might enforce their pound of flesh, get back their land, and add farms to farms so as to get a class of larger tenants, in order to grow sheep instead of men. Proprietors who wanted to effect that operation should, he submitted, take some other time for it than a season like this. When starvation was staring the people in the face, and there were no means of paying rent, was that a time proprietors were to select for clearing their estates of surplus tenants and making larger farms? Now, he desired to point the attention of the House to the contrast presented by a distressed county in Ulster and a similarly distressed county elsewhere. There were no two counties in Ireland where there was more distress than in Donegal and Mayo. In the former, however, the tenant right prevailed, while in the latter it did not. It was a curious fact, as might be seen from the Report of the Devon Commission, that in Mayo, in 1845, the right to sell the goodwill of a farm was almost universal, whereas now it was a thing unheard of. Still, in other respects the circumstances of the two counties were very much alike—alike in being distressed, in being occupied by small holdings, and in the fact that the small farmers who had been in the habit of working in England or Scotland at hay time and harvest were last year deprived of this source of income. Well, comparing them in point of crime, in Mayo there was an increase in the indictable offences from 125 to 319, while in Donegal the number of indictable offences were this year only 10 more than the previous year. This he thought was chiefly due to the absence of tenant right in the former county and its existence in the latter. They were the same people, the same race. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: No, no.] The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock claimed to know all about them. He (the Attorney General for Ireland) believed the noble Lord went down there once or twice to fish; but he ventured to think that he knew Donegal somewhat better than the noble Lord, and he must take leave to repeat that the Western part of Donegal was in just the same state of destitution as the Western part of Mayo. The people in that part of Donegal spoke Irish just as they did in Mayo, and were, in fact, of the same Celtic stock. But how was it that the land agitation had not taken root there as it had in Mayo? He could not but think that the explanation was mainly this—that the wretched peasant of Mayo, whose ancient usage of selling the goodwill had gone, who had nothing between him and starvation but the workhouse, no tenant right, and, unlike the English peasant, no out-door relief even—knew that to be put out of his holding was almost death to him; whilst the Donegal tenant knew that if he was put out of his holding for non-payment of rent, or any other cause, he was still entitled to compensation for disturbance—he was entitled to the value of his goodwill; he had something to fall back upon, and he was, therefore, not reduced to the same point of desperation as the evicted peasant of Mayo. In Ireland, it should always be recollected, there was practically no poor relief at all for a man unless he entered the workhouse; and what was now proposed in the present exceptional distress was that the landlord, evicting for non-payment of rent and refusing to make any reasonable arrangement with his tenant, should make him some compensation for thus harshly breaking up the poor man's home. It was a remarkable circumstance as regarded Mayo, that while there were a few large proprietors who were resident, 30 per cent of the area of the county, and 36 per cent of its value belonged to absentees. There seemed to be some confusion on the part of many hon. Members as to the effect of the measure now before the House. It was said by opponents of the Bill, and especially by the late Attorney General and the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), that it would enable a tenant, while he paid the shopkeeper and money-lender, to resist the landlord's claim; but where hon. Gentlemen got that idea he could not imagine. He confessed he could not understand this objection, inasmuch as landlord and all had equally at their disposal the same means of redress—the right of appealing to the Courts of Law for obtaining their money, and the landlord, besides, could avail himself of his right of distraint. For this year of distress, and in distressed districts, it enabled the tenant, if evicted for non-payment of rent, to bring a claim before the Court, seeking compensation. To succeed in his claim, he had to show his inability to pay and that the landlord had refused all reasonable terms. But the position taken up by hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to assume that the tenant must be a rogue and the Chairman a fool. Taking for granted, however, that the Chairman was a just and reasonable man, with a capable Judge of Assize to correct him on appeal, he could not see any reason for doubting that full justice would be done to every landlord. By the closing words of the 18th section of the Land Act the landlords were enabled to protect themselves by showing that they had offered the tenant to continue in his holding on reasonable terms, and that these had been unreasonably refused by him. Now, this Bill put the converse case; and if the Chairman was competent to determine what was reasonable for the landlord, surely he could do the same for the tenant. The words "reasonable" and "unreasonable" were terms that had to be interpreted almost daily in regard to special contracts made by Railway Companies. Similar expressions were also to be found in a Bill brought in to amend the Agricultural Holdings Act by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire and the hon. Member for Leicestershire. Hon. Members felt no legislative difficulties when dealing with Railway Companies. But then they urged that the latter were a monopoly. He was afraid that there were many profane people who considered landownership also as in the nature of a monopoly. The Bill simply gave the tenant some security against a harsh landlord. Supposing the present distress, which had called forth this exceptional legislation, should be intensified by a bad harvest, were they to understand that considerate landlords would enforce their powers of ejectment? It appeared to him that hon. Gentlemen opposite had forgotten the condition that under the Bill not only must the penniless tenant's proposal be reasonable in itself, but there must be unreasonable refusal of it by the landlord, before the Bill could operate against him. The landlord would be in at least no worse position with a new tenant than with the old one, and should rather be glad to put money into the pocket of the latter by letting him sell his goodwill, which would, at the same time, be a fair reason for refusing to let him continue in the holding, and thus prevent any liability under the Bill. The landlord had no right in such a season of distress to make the tenant forfeit his property in the goodwill. It was a principle of our law that penalties were never enforced, in respect of the payment of money, when parties could otherwise be secured their just rights; and a similar protection should, under the present exceptional circumstances, be afforded to the Irish tenant who could not pay his rent. Exemption from forfeiture for non-payment of a mortgage debt on a given day, or of a bond with a penalty, had been enjoyed by the landlords themselves for centuries; and if it had not existed, their mortgagees would be owners of their estates. It was urged that the power of forfeiture was necessary in order to get rent from the Irish tenant; but he ventured to think that the Irish tenant was not so utterly wanting in all desire to do what was just and right as to refuse to yield what was fairly due unless under the terror of this fearful process. Suppose the Chairman found that a tenant was unable to pay his rent owing to the act of God—namely, through the existing distress—suppose it appeared that he had offered fair and reasonable terms to the landlord as to rent and arrears; suppose he had offered to pay as much as he could at once, and secure the payment of the rest by instalments, and that these terms had been not only refused, but unreasonably refused? Would any hon. Member in that House say he was anxious to protect the landlord acting thus unfeelingly and unreasonably? He believed, that after learning the facts which had been laid before the House by his right hon. Friend and others, hon. Gentlemen would allow that the measure was one that was needed for the present condition of Ireland; that it could only apply when there was reasonableness on one side, and unreasonableness on the other; and that they would pass it as a measure having for its object an amelioration of a state of things which had created serious discontent in Ireland, and rendered its government difficult in the extreme.

—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, Sir, a considerable number of Members are desirous of speaking on the Opposition side of the House, and the consequence is that the Government will be anxious to give up next Monday for the discussion. Thursday is already disposed of; and as on Friday there would be but limited time for the consideration of the question, we think it best to give up Monday. I hope, however, it is understood that the debate will be concluded on that day.

MR. CALLAN: Surely the great distress at present existing in Ireland is of far more importance, and requires more instant attention and promptness in pushing forward measures for relief, than the question of admitting Mr. Brad-laugh to this House. I urge on the Government the necessity of showing their appreciation of the grievous distress in Ireland by resuming this debate on Thursday, and not leaving it over until next Monday. To keep the Bill hanging on is not fulfilling the promise of the Treasury Bench, and I think it might be as well to go over until the end of the Session as to next Monday.

MR. GLADSTONE: I think the sense which the Government entertain of this question is shown by their giving up the first night they can, and that a Supply night. With regard to what has been stated by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan), he ought to bear in mind that this matter of Affirmation does not depend on us. There is another person concerned, and scenes may occur in the House if there is any postponement of that question which no one would like to see, and which we should all regret.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

It being now five minutes to Seven of the clock the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTION.

SLIGO BOROUGH.—RESOLUTION.

MR. DENIS O'CONOR rose to call attention to the circumstances under which the Borough of Sligo was disfranchised; and to move—

"That it is desirable that the West of Ireland should be no longer deprived of its due share of Parliamentary representation."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at a quarter after Nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Wednesday, 30th June, 1880.

Their Lordships met;—And having gone through the Business on the Paper, without debate—

House adjourned at a quarter before
Two o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ROBERTS, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it was not his intention to enter upon the general question of Sunday closing, which had been so recently under the notice of the House, and which he thought, it would be admitted on all hands, had been pretty well threshed out. He was quite sensible of the disadvantage under which he laboured in bringing forward a Motion somewhat similar in character to the recent Resolution of the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson). If that Resolution had been more specific, and if the Government had given any promise that, in the course of next Session, they would introduce a comprehensive measure dealing with the United Kingdom, he might not have pressed his Bill on the present occasion. The feeling in Wales was so strong, so thorough, and so unanimous, and there were so many complications and difficulties connected with the question of closing public-houses in England on Sunday that did not exist in Wales, that he felt it to be his duty to ask the House to lose no further time in passing a Bill which would be distinctly applicable to the Principality of Wales. There were two points he undertook to demonstrate. The preponderating opinion of the great majority of the people of Wales was in favour of this measure, and no sufficient reasons could be brought forward for objecting to the wishes of the people of Wales being carried out. All the religious denominations, the magistrates, and the boards of guardians were in favour of Sunday closing. Again and again they had petitioned the House. Nowhere was there greater interest felt in the progress of the Irish Sunday Closing Bill, which proved so satisfactory in its result, than in Wales; and he might say that the passing of the Irish measure, more than anything else, had prompted the people of Wales to ask for similar privileges for themselves. In North Wales a house-to-house canvass had been instituted for the purpose of ascertaining the opinions of the people with reference to the Bill now under discussion. According to the Census of 1871, the number of householders in North Wales was 101,500. Returns had been received from 78,600. If to the numbers an addition were made, on the one hand, for an increase of population, and if, on the other, a deduction were made for persons who refused to make returns, or who were absent from home, he believed he should be within the mark if he said that four-fifths of the householders of North Wales had given a written opinion upon this question. Out of the 78,600 householders who had thus given a written opinion, no fewer than 75,668 had pronounced in favour of total Sunday closing; only 991 had given an opinion against it; and only 1,943 were neutral. In 37 of the larger towns of North Wales, 24,110 householders were in favour and 647 against, proving that the towns were very little behind the rural districts. In Wrexham, remarkable for the goodness of its ale, and where the publican interest was very strong, the Returns showed 1,691 in favour and only 119 against. A remarkable fact connected with the canvass was that it showed that the working classes were the most unanimous in favour of Sunday closing. These figures referred only to North Wales; but when the Members for the Southern District came to speak, there was little doubt that they would be able to give an equally satisfactory account for South Wales. During the first Session of this year 403 Petitions, signed by 175,300 persons, had been presented to the House in favour of the Bill. Up to the 22nd of June, in the present Session, 52 Petitions, with 28,334 signatures, had been presented; and other Petitions numerous signed had been presented since that date. In fact, he might safely say that out of 700,000 people of the age of 16 and upwards in the Principality of Wales, Northern Division, 250,000 persons had petitioned the House in favour of this measure, which, he might remark, was supported equally by both political Parties in Wales. It was true that the noble Lord (Viscount Emlyn), who represented in his own person all the Conservatives of South Wales, had given Notice of his intention to move the rejection of the Bill. He regretted to learn that indisposition would prevent the noble Lord from attending to perform that duty. The noble Lord, however, did not represent the Conservative feeling of either North or South Wales in this matter. At the last General Election not only all the Liberal candidates who were now Members had declared in favour of the present Bill, but most of the Conservative candidates did the same, and a similar course was pursued in South Wales. He was not sorry, in one sense, that the noble Lord (Viscount Emlyn) was not there to move the rejection of the Bill, because his presence might give a Party aspect to the question where the Conservative inhabitants of Wales equally with the Liberal inhabitants were anxious for legislation in the direction proposed. When the Irish Sunday Closing Bill was under consideration great stress was laid on the fact that three-fourths of the Irish Representative body were favourable to that measure; but in Wales the proportion of Representatives was as 29 to 1, and it should be borne in mind that these Members very recently had been in close and constant relationship with their constituents, and, therefore, had the best opportunity of becoming acquainted with their feelings. All these facts which he had stated made out as strong a case as could possibly be presented to the House for legislation. What were the objections? It might be said that separate legislation for Wales was objectionable. But this could not be regarded as separate legislation, for the principle of the Bill had been recognized by the Legislature with regard to the United Kingdom, not only in Ireland, but in England, Scotland, and Wales, by sanctioning houses to be kept open in different localities at different hours, and making a difference between London and the rest of the country. All they asked was that in this Bill the House should recognize the principle recently affirmed by the present Parliament. Well, if they had separate legislation for London, why should they not have it for Wales? It was well known that the people of Wales had the reputation of being the most loyal, peaceable, and well-conducted of Her Majesty's subjects; and if Parliament passed this measure, it would not lessen, but, on the contrary, would strengthen, the ties which existed between England and Wales. The Prime Minister had laid down the principle that it was the duty of the Government to follow public opinion; and, looking at the facts before the House, he hoped that the Government would follow the public opinion of Wales on this question. There was no danger, so far as Wales was concerned, of legislation on the Sunday question being in advance of public opinion. This Bill was not brought forward by him as a crotchet, but at the earnest request of the people of Wales. He hoped that the Government would support the Bill. Had the Home Secretary been present, he might have confidently appealed to him in favour of the measure, as the right hon. Gentleman had voted for the Resolution that affirmed the principle of Local Option. The passing of this measure would give them great satisfaction. It would tend to promote peace and order on the Sabbath, give a day of rest to the publicans, of which they ought not to be deprived, and conduce to the happiness and contentment of the people without causing serious inconvenience to individuals. The hon. Member concluded by formally moving the second reading of the Bill.

MR. RICHARD: I rise, Sir, to second, or, if that be unnecessary, to support, the Motion of my hon. Friend, and, at the same time, to congratulate him on the marked ability and success of the speech in which he has introduced the question to the House—of the speech which is, practically, his maiden speech. There is one advantage we have now in taking up this question of Sunday closing, and it is this—that we are not advocating a hypothetical good, for we have the benefit of 27 years' experience of the working of Sunday closing in Scotland, and we have considerable experience of the same thing in Ireland. The result of this Sunday closing has shown the plan to be, in every sense, satisfactory and beneficial. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) has furnished me with some facts in reference to the operation of this measure in Scotland, which amply confirms the statement I am making. He has sent me an official Report from the Procurator-Fiscal of Edinburgh prepared for the magistrates and council of the City, showing the results of Sunday closing so far as that City is concerned. The Report gives a table showing the number of cases of "drunk and incapable" on Sundays in Edinburgh from 1852 to 1878. In the year 1852, which was the year before the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act, the number of people found drunk and incapable in Edinburgh on Sundays was 729; but in 1878 it was only 207. There was another Return showing the number found drunk between 8 on Sunday morning and 8 on Monday morning, and from this it appeared that in 1852 it was 401, and in 1878 only 67. But there is evidence with regard to the good effected in the whole of Scotland. Bailie William Collins, Lord Provost of Glasgow, has taken great pains to collect statistics in this matter; and from his statement it appears that in 17 of the largest towns of Scotland, including Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, Aberdeen, Leith, Perth, Greenock, and so on, the cases of drunkenness on Sunday during the three years before the passing of the Act in 1853 was 11,471, as compared with 4,299 in the three years after, showing a decrease of 7,172, or nearly two-thirds of the entire number. With regard to Ireland, the O'Connor Don moved for a Return of the number of arrests made on Sundays for drunkenness during the six months immediately after the passing of the Act in October, 1878, and a similar Return for the corresponding six months in 1877. The result was that in 35 counties the number of arrests before the Act came into operation was 2,364, and after the passing 707, showing a diminution of 70 per cent. We may, therefore, take it for granted as a fact established beyond dispute upon ample evidence and experience that the closing of public-houses on Sundays has had the effect of diminishing drunkenness and disorder and crime in Scotland and Ireland, and has had the further effect—we may safely assume—of adding largely to the domestic comfort of the working classes. Now, it is generally recognized that in questions of this kind affecting the moral and social condition of the people great weight is due to the preponderating opinion of the people themselves. This was the principle acknowledged in connection with the Irish Bill that we had so long under discussion in this House. The Prime Minister stated that this alone should have induced us to support the measure—the unanimity with which it was demanded by the Irish people. These were his words. He said—

"He held most strongly the conviction that, apart from the mere moral and social objects they had in view, the question was very important indeed whether on those subjects which they conceived to be of a local character—he meant local as opposed to Imperial—they were to give the same fair play to the people of Ireland—to have the same regard to their well-understood wishes which they would give to the wishes of the people of England and Scotland."

I only want to substitute the name of the people of Wales, and the application is perfect in all its forms. As my hon. Friend has said, the Home Secretary the other day adopted and affirmed the same principle. Now, my hon. Friend has given the House some very striking facts with reference to the state of opinion in North Wales regarding this matter, and he has referred to me as prepared to furnish somewhat similar evidence in regard to South Wales. Well, the evidence for South Wales was not quite so complete and so full of details as that with regard to North Wales, but it was sufficiently clear and conclusive. In November last a Conference was held in Swansea, presided over by the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. H. Vivian), which was attended by a large number of delegates from all the counties of South Wales, including men of all classes and conditions and creeds—Members of Parliament, magistrates, clergymen of the Church of England, Roman Catholic priests, Nonconformist ministers of all denominations, large employers of labour, and the representatives of the working classes. I myself presided over a public meeting in the evening, and I never attended a meeting at which there was more absolute unanimity and enthusiasm than there was at this meeting held to advocate the total closing of public-houses in Wales. The Petitions that have been presented from South Wales, with more than 100,000 signatures attached to them, also indicate the same state of opinion. I find that from Glamorganshire Petitions have been presented signed by 65,917, and from Carmarthenshire—the county represented by the noble Lord who has given Notice of opposition to the Bill—there have been Petitions signed by more than 18,000 persons in favour of Sunday closing; and it is deserving of remark that not one Petition has been presented from Carmarthen against the measure, nor, so far as I know, has there been from all Wales more than one Petition of an adverse character presented. Nowhere is the feeling in favour of the Bill stronger than among the constituents I have the honour to represent. In one large part of the borough I represent—the town of Aberdare—the subject has been brought to a crucial test by a house-to-house canvass; and here I must refer to a remark which fell from my hon. Friend the Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease), in his speech the other night. He said, in endeavouring to diminish the weight of the Returns from the house-to-house canvass, that there were only 4,069 houses, out of a total of 6,500, visited by the canvassers at which replies were received. But that is not correct. The number of canvass papers filled up was 5,051, and this must represent nearly the whole of the inhabited houses in Aberdare, for I am sorry to say that, owing to great depression in trade, there were nearly 1,000 houses vacant at that time in that part of the borough. What was the result of this canvass of 5,051 houses? Why, this was the result. We found that 4,659 persons were in favour of Sunday closing, 210 were against it, and 182 were neutral, showing 92 per cent of the householders for closing, 4 per cent against, and 4 per cent neutral. Out of 85 publicans, 45 were in favour of closing on Sunday, and 25 were against, while 12 were neutral. An analysis has been made of the Return, showing the classes of persons who were canvassed; for it is constantly urged against this agitation that it is not promoted or desired by the working classes, but only by those who assume to be philanthropic champions of the working classes. Well, what was the result of the analysis of these Returns from Aberdare? Amongst those who gave this vote were 2,138 working colliers, of whom 1,976 approved of Sunday closing, while 91 opposed it, and 71 were neutral. Of artizan householders, 776 were for closing, 74 were against it, and 23 were neutral. Of labourers, hauliers, &c., 659 were for closing, and 28 were against it, while 24 were neutral. Of farmers, 33 were for this Bill, none were against it. Of railway servants, 176 were for, 10 against, and 14 neutral. This proves conclusively that the great body of working men themselves desire this measure to be carried. The same thing was the result when the canvass was made in other parts of South Wales. There was a house-to-house canvass made in Merthyr, Cardiff, Swansea, Haverfordwest, Aberystwith, Brecon, and in portions of Radnorshire, and this showed 93 per cent of the entire householders—including publicans—in favour of total closing on Sundays. All religious bodies in Wales are united on this matter, and that is a significant circumstance, because so large a proportion of the people of Wales happily belong to one religious body or another, that an expression of opinion on the part of the religious bodies in Wales is an expression of opinion on the part of the great bulk of the people. The Church of England Temperance Society has pronounced in favour of the measure, also the Congregational Union, the Baptist Union, the Calvinistic Methodists' Association, and Wesleyan district meetings; all have proclaimed with absolute unanimity in favour of closing on Sunday, and they have all worked hard in getting up Petitions. Boards of guardians, town councils, school boards, boards of health, and various working men's organizations have united in the same expression of opinion. But then we are told you cannot legislate for one part of the country differently to the manner in which you legislate for another. The answer to that is—as my hon. Friend has pointed out—"You do that already." You have legislated separately for Scotland and for Ireland—nay, more, you have legislated differently for different parts of England and Wales; and the right hon. Gentleman the late Home Secretary, when he brought forward his Licensing Bill, said that he threw overboard the principle of uniformity altogether. And so we now come, as my hon. Friend has stated, representing the whole of the Principality of Wales—for with the exception of the noble Lord the Member for Carmarthenshire (Viscount Evelyn), and he is Member for that part of Wales simply by mistake on the part of the Liberals, all the Members from Wales support the Bill—the whole of the Representatives of the Principality are unanimous in soliciting this boon from the House of Commons. We ask for nothing that will do England any harm. On the contrary, if the measure passes it may do England some good by giving it a salutary example. We ask for nothing that will imperil the unity of the Empire or alienate Wales in any degree from the other part of the United Kingdom. We ask for power to deal with a great evil, which is corrupting our people, desolating our homes, and exercising a disastrous influence upon our highest social and moral interests; and if the House of Commons will grant us this boon I can promise that they will add still further, if that were possible, to the contentment and loyalty of the most contented and loyal as well as one of the most moral and religious portions of Her Majesty's Dominions.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Roberts.)

DR. KINNEAR said, he felt much gratified at the able manner in which the case for closing public-houses on Sundays had been presented to the House, and he would content himself with bearing testimony to the good that had been effected in the North of Ireland by the Irish Sunday Closing Act. This Bill had the unanimous support of the clergy of all denominations, and he trusted it would be carried.

GENERAL BURNABY said, that though he had presented Petitions in favour of Sunday closing, yet this was a subject which required much consideration. He questioned whether the Legislature had not already gone to the fullest tether of restriction, and contended that drunkenness was diminishing. No one, he felt sure, who had seen the smoking chimneys of a large manufacturing town would grudge the working man a glass of beer after his Sunday's walk into the country. He had visited the Northern States of America, and although the Americans were not a drunken people, he must say he observed more drunkenness there on Sundays than on other days; perhaps the stolen lump of sugar was the sweetest. If this Bill were passed he foresaw great difficulties in bringing the police to bear upon the people in this matter, as there was nothing to prevent the working man having his club and cellar key. He would remind hon. Members of the couplet—

"Muzzle not the ox which treadeth out the corn, Nor grudge the honest labourer his pipe and his horn."

MR. WARTON, in moving the rejection of the Bill, said, he did not wish to throw the slightest doubt on the sincerity of those who had taken the trouble to get up all the statistics which had been referred to; but the question really was, were they to have fractional or national legislation? They all highly respected and loved Wales; but, after all, it was but a small part of England, and he hoped this Bill was not a prelude to a further national division such as their Irish friends had formed. This was an attempt to let in by a kind of side wind the principle of Local Option. If the working men were to be allowed to decide these questions by vote then there would be an end to legislation, and there would be set up in its stead pure democracy. He rose for the purpose of making a practical suggestion. If the feeling among the working men of Wales was so overwhelming in favour of total closing on Sundays, if out of 78,000 there were 75,000 against drinking on Sundays, why did they keep on drinking on Sundays? If there was no demand for Sunday drinking he should imagine the publicans, in their own interest, would shut up their houses, and so save the great expense of keeping them open. There were six-day licences in Wales as well as in other parts of the Kingdom; but no statistics had been placed before the House to show that there had been any increase in the number of that class of licences. The Welsh people were described as the most moral and religious in the country; and at the same time it was said that drink was desolating their homes. Unless that was an oratorical flourish he confessed he could not understand it. It seemed to him that the very excellence of the Welsh people rendered this measure unnecessary. As an opponent of Local Option, he begged to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Warton.)

MR. ARTHUR PEEL confessed that he felt some difficulty in rising to address what was, for the time, practically a Welsh Parliament. It was clear there was a very strong consensus of opinion on the part of Welsh Members and the constituencies they represented on the subject, and their unanimity was rendered more striking by the absence of the noble Lord who,

he believed, had intended to move the rejection of the Bill. He was informed, however, that the cause of the noble Lord's absence was illness, which he much regretted. He wished to enter a protest, which he hoped would not be misunderstood. He thought they were getting into somewhat of a strange position in regard to the licensing question generally. They had already passed a number of abstract Resolutions, and abstract Resolutions of a particularly abstract character. The other night the Resolution on Local Option was carried by a majority which he thought was unexpected, and which reversed the opinion come to by the last Parliament. They had also passed a Resolution on Sunday closing in uncompromising terms. It was quite true that immediately afterwards an Amendment was passed unanimously, or at least without a division, recognizing the importance of making a distinction between the country and the Metropolis, and of legislating specially for the Metropolis and for the requirements of particular districts in the country. But in the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease), which was accepted, there was contained a warning which ought not to be without effect on the House. That warning was that they were not to go beyond public opinion in this matter; and the hon. Member, in speaking on this Bill, had recognized that principle when he said that legislation ought not to be in advance, but if possible a little behind, public opinion. The danger of over-stepping, by however little, public opinion in this matter, was that they would excite a re-action out of all proportion to that slight excess, and would encourage opposition to measures which the House and the country now almost universally regarded as salutary in their restrictive operation. It was, perhaps, necessary to remind the House of what the Prime Minister had said, that the question of licensing would form an essential portion of the work to be done by the present Parliament, and the right hon. Gentleman went further, and said that in his opinion an integral portion of that measure would have to be Local Option. Now, by passing such abstract Resolutions as had been passed, and by passing this Bill, they would heap up such a multitude of recorded opinions of the House that it would be extremely difficult to deal with the whole question when it was taken in hand. Hon. Members would, perhaps, say that it was a technical and official objection. He was aware that the point made by hon. Members from Wales was that this was essentially a Welsh question. But he did not know that it had been hitherto recognized that Wales should be treated in a different way from other portions of the Kingdom, and he could not but see great difficulties likely to arise from passing a Bill which laid down, in a sweeping manner, that all public-houses in Wales were to be closed during Sundays. In Ireland exceptions were made in favour of certain large towns, and in England exceptions would have to be made. Were there to be no exceptions made in Wales? ["No!"] All these things, which were accumulating on those who were responsible for dealing with the matter, tended to increase the difficulties of solving the Licensing Question. The Sunday Closing Question came up repeatedly; but, in his opinion, there was a great deal yet to be said with regard to Saturday closing. He recollected a learned Judge referring in these terms to drinking and its consequences on Saturday—"Why is it that all these offences and crimes are committed on Saturday? Because Saturday is wage day, wage day is drink day, and drink day is crime day." He (Mr. Arthur Peel) would ask the House where they were to stop? If they stopped the Sunday traffic in intoxicating drink altogether in an integral part of the United Kingdom, why should they not stop the traffic on Saturday? He had heard a consensus of opinion which had astonished him, and he felt the difficulty of resisting it. But for the reason he had given—that all these Resolutions increased the difficulty of ultimately dealing with the question as a whole—he could not vote for the second reading of the Bill. He did not wish, however, for a moment, to put himself in opposition to its principle, or in antagonism to the hon. Members who had spoken so strongly in its favour. He should not vote for the Bill on the simple ground that, if he accepted it, he should be imposing an obligation upon those who had to deal with the general question. Of course, if the House liked to accept the Bill, that would be a fact that must be taken into consideration, and the consensus of opinion from twenty-nine-thirtieths of the representation of Wales, must be a powerful factor in considering how to deal with the question. He should not oppose the second reading, as he did not wish to be regarded as setting himself against the expressed opinion of the Welsh Members, or as wishing to hinder the great social and moral improvement which, for aught he knew, might result from the measure.

Mr. OARBUTT said, there could not be a better argument than the last Election to show that the Bill was not in advance of public opinion. He believed the public had made up its mind to have this temperance question settled, and settled in a very decisive way. He believed that he owed his return for Monmouth district greatly to his promise to vote for Sunday closing. In Newport, which was one of the contributory boroughs to Monmouth, he was opposed by the London Trade Organization; but in Usk three-fourths of the publicans were in favour of the measure. A deputation from Newport had an interview with the members of the Trade in Usk, and sought to induce them to vote against him, on the ground that he was in favour of Sunday closing; but the publicans of Usk replied that that was the very reason why they intended to vote for him. The question had been asked why the working men of Wales, if they disapproved of Sunday drinking, did not abstain. The simple answer to that was that, the temptation being there, they yielded to it. What they demanded was that the temptation should be removed.

Mr. BLAKE supported the Bill, and referred to the moral, social, and physical results of the Irish Sunday Closing Bill, which had been in operation nearly three years. The consumption of liquor had fallen off in Ireland £1,250,000 per annum, and the convictions for Sunday offences had decreased 70 per cent. Every Judge on the Bench for the last two years had strongly expressed his belief that that was owing to Sunday closing. It might be said that the decrease in the rate of consumption was due to the great distress of the present period; but during the Famine years of 1846, 1847, and 1848, there was a large increase in the consumption of beer and spirituous liquors. He therefore trusted that, as the results of Sunday closing in Ireland had been so beneficent, the principle would be extended to Wales.

FIXITY OF TENURE (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Litton, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Givan, Mr. Findlater, Mr. James Richardson.)

[BILL 144.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. LITTON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he thought the question of land tenure in Ireland was of even more importance than that of distress, for the distress, though urgent, was temporary, while the former might be said to be a permanent evil, and concerned, to some extent, the causes of the very distress which was now prevailing. The question of land tenure was important also from the point of view of emigration, for the bone and sinew, which were the wealth of Ireland, were leaving it in consequence of the present state of the law. It was not alone the labouring class, who had no means, but the emigrants were the most independent and enterprising of the people—those who had sufficient means left to carry them to another land—in short, the emigrants were the very persons who should, if possible, be retained in Ireland. The unsettled condition of the Land Question tended to separate more widely, from day to day, the relations between landlord and tenant. It was to be regretted that the ties which ought to bind the occupier and the landlord together were becoming weaker and weaker; and he must confess that he was not altogether disposed to acquit from blame the hon. Gentlemen, many of whom he could respect and regard, who sat below the Gangway on the opposite side of the House, for, undoubtedly, the speeches of some of them had had a tendency to create distrust and alarm on the part of the landlords of Ireland, who naturally were driven to stand up for their rights, and were jealous of the position which they occupied; but who, if a different course had been adopted, would have been, he ventured to think, the first to come forward to endeavour to find out some true and just measure of reform which might secure to the tenants the legitimate object of their aspirations. It might be said that the position taken up by the landlords rendered it impossible that this happy result could be attained; but he did not believe that—he believed the majority of the Irish landlords were anxious to see the Land Question finally settled, and they recognized that it was to their advantage that it should be settled, and that agitation on the subject should cease. To a certain extent they were willing to recognize, he believed, the rights of the tenant to a property in the land as regarded his labour and expenditure. The question was a difficult one, and it must be treated in a bold and, at the same time, in a just manner. No mere dealing with the fringe of the question would be satisfactory. Every failure to settle the question prolonged the agitation which was the misfortune of Ireland. All would agree with him in desiring that by bold, liberal, and honest legislation that agitation should terminate. It was the desire of every Irishman—and he included every man of what was termed the “Third Party” in that House—to see the relations of landlord and tenant work harmoniously. He was not one of those who thought there ought to be any confiscation of a landlord’s property or right. In his election canvass he never met with a single tenant farmer who asked for more than a right to occupy and to hold, at a fair rent, that property which he had acquired by his labour, and there was no desire to deprive the landlord of his right in the land. All that was asked was security of tenure and recognition of the right as regarded land which was acknowledged in regard to every other species of property—namely, that a man who converted raw material into a manufactured product had a property in the result of his industry. The tenant took the land as a raw material, and converted it into the manufactured article, represented by the soil, which produced the crops. The Bill now before the House was drawn with a view to boldness and justice. It was necessary, in explanation of the Bill, that he should call attention to the relations in which landlords and tenants stood before the passing of the Land Act of 1870. Before the passing of that Act, the landlords had power to turn their tenants out at any time on a simple notice to quit, and without recognition of the labour or capital expended on the holding; but to their credit it might be said that, as a rule, that power was rarely exercised. It existed, however, down to 1870; and it formerly had been the habit of landlords, on receiving their rent, to deliver a notice to the tenant to quit, and the tenant had thus constantly hanging over him a notice under which his occupancy might be suddenly closed, and he might be turned out without any regard whatever to the fruits of his labour. But what was the right of the tenant? Why, he had no right; it was simply his duty to go. That being the relative legal position of parties, it seemed to him strange that the law should have existed so long in the country as it did. It could only be accounted for by the fact that the landlords were better than the laws. Any landlord acting in the way he had described simply appropriated the property of the tenant. In Ulster the position prior to the Act of 1870 was, according to the law, the same as it was in every other part of Ireland, though, no doubt, in most parts of Ulster, and especially on large estates, there was a recognition of a just equity between the landlord and tenant, which was the foundation of what was now called the Ulster tenant right. But that had only for its sanction the generosity of feeling entertained by the landlord. Under these circumstances, the Land Act of 1870 was brought before the House by the right hon. Gentleman who was now at the head of the Government; and it was not saying very much, because it had been already said over and over again, to assert that that was an Act of Parliament with which the name of the right hon. Gentleman would be for ever connected in the most honourable manner. That Act was complained of as having infringed the right of free contract; but he would ask the House to bear in mind that when hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House, and especially the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), spoke of interference with the freedom of contract, and applied that trite and commonplace observation to the relation of landlord and tenant as it still existed in Ireland, they wholly misapprehended the position of the case. There was, in substance, no such thing as freedom of contract as between landlord and tenant. There could be no reality in the objection of the hon. Member until he first established as between the contracting parties an independent position and equal rights. Talk about freedom of contract in such a case! Let the House fancy the miserable tenant of some 20 acres, who, by industry and frugality, had improved the letting value of his holding, and who, under notice to quit, went to his landlord or agent and asked why he was to be disturbed in his holding, and was told that he must go out on the roadside or to the poorhouse, if necessary, unless he conceded the demand of the landlord to allow an increase of rent, which increase was regulated by the improvement that had been affected in the holding by the labour and capital of the tenant. To say that that man, with the prospect before him of the charity of the workhouse, where he was separated from his wife and children, was in a position to enter into free contract with his landlord was an abuse of terms. The Land Act had advanced the question of land reform in a considerable degree. The Chief Secretary stated the other day that if that Act had not been passed Ireland would now have to be governed by martial law. He feared that unless another Land Act was passed far in advance of that of 1870 a like necessity might be found to exist in 1890; and he, therefore, asked the House to adopt generously, and in no grudging spirit, a principle which, he ventured to think, was a just principle—namely, that which would place the occupier of an agricultural holding in Ireland in that position in which it would be his interest to maintain, not merely law and order, but those good feelings which, to some extent, existed between landlord and tenant in the North, and which ought to exist and be fostered throughout the entire of Ireland. The House must be fully aware that in moving the second reading of this Bill his object was to elicit the acceptance of a principle. He could not, nor could any private Member expect to carry a Bill of this importance through the House. It should be a Government measure; but it was right that the anxiety which existed in Ireland to know what the House was about to do in regard to this Land Question should receive some greater recognition than the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the operation of the Land Act. They had had 10 years experience of that Act, and the result had been to show that it had not placed the relation between landlord and tenant upon that satisfactory footing which at the time of its passing it was hoped it might. He believed that the Chief Secretary had admitted as much the other day. The reason was that there had not been a recognition of the true principle which ought to guide the House in dealing with this question—namely, recognition to the full, legitimate, and logical extent of property on the part of the tenant in the fruits of his labour. After the Land Act was passed it was supposed that matters would improve. With respect to the Ulster custom the only thing which the Act did was to legalize that which already existed by custom; and, no doubt, it was a great matter to confer upon the tenant the legal right of demanding that which before depended upon the generosity of his landlord. But it was perhaps unknown to English Members that this legalizing of the Ulster tenant right worked in a very unequal degree throughout Ulster. There were many estates in Ulster; he alluded to the smaller estates, on which it might be said that the Ulster tenant right did not exist at all. On the larger estates, such, for instance, as the Downshire and Abercorn estates, the tenant right existed in its full extent; but throughout the great portion of Ulster the custom was unsatisfactory in regard to what were called “office rules,” which limited the right of the tenant as regarded the compensation that he could receive. The two things which the tenant class in Ireland wanted were a fixity in their tenure—that was to say, a right that they should not be disturbed, without their consent, in their holdings as long as they paid a fair rent; and a right of sale free from the restrictions imposed by office rules, which limited the compensation they had the right to receive. The compensation which they ought to receive could alone be tested fairly and honestly by a right of sale—by taking it to the market and asking the public to come forward and buy that which was proposed to be sold. The “office rules,” so far as they were worth anything to the landlord, were inconsistent with the true recognition of tenants’ right; and, therefore, the first thing to which the House ought to devote its attention was to consider how far it was fair and reasonable to allow these rules, even under the sanction of this custom, to interfere with the property which the tenant had in his holding, recognized as it was, to a limited but not to the full extent, and which the tenant had a right to claim. Out of Ulster the Land Act provided what was supposed to be an equivalent to the Ulster custom—namely, compensation in case of disturbance. He was not going to touch upon the disputed question as to whether ejectment for non-payment of rent should be deemed a disturbance. Under ordinary circumstances and ordinary conditions of society, it ought not to be a disturbance, and he did not find amongst those with whom he had been brought into contact in the North of Ireland that there was any disposition to dispute the fact that when a tenant was unable or declined to pay his rent he should be liable to eviction from his holding. He would ask what were the faults of this Land Act? Mr. J. McDonnell, who was a competent authority in Ireland on the question of the Ulster tenant right, read a paper before the Statistical Society in January 1879, in which he said that the Land Act had legalized the Ulster custom, but it had not defined that custom, and had, therefore, in reality, done nothing to settle the question. The uncertainty, the feeling of distrust on both sides was as strong as ever. In some respects, indeed, stronger; for landlords were now more disposed to look for their extreme rights than before. Now, as before, a grasping landlord would gradually eat away the tenant’s interest, and a pushing tenant would often sell as his part of the estate of a good-natured landlord. It would be a fatal mistake to construct an Irish Land Bill on the lines of the Ulster custom, which it was impossible to define, and which did not give fixity of tenure, but merely imposed a fine upon the landlord for exercising his legal right as against the property of the tenant. It should not be a case of fine, but of prohibition. The landlord had no more right to sell the property of the tenant, unless the latter was willing to have it sold, than the tenant would have a right to insist upon buying out his landlord. Mr. Robertson, residing in the county of Kildare, had urged before the Royal Commission at Dublin that it was necessary for the agricultural interests of Ireland that the tenants should have fixity of tenure at valued rents, and that the right of free sale should be conceded to them. The broad principle upon which the Bill was framed, and which he asked the House to accept as that upon which future legislation must be based, was a recognition of the existence of a property in the tenant in regard to the occupation of his holding, so long as he paid a fair rent, and the right of dealing with that property by free sale, unrestricted by any rules sought to be imposed upon him by his landlord—in Ulster or elsewhere. In seeking to give effect to these two leading principles, the Bill dealt with notices to quit, which constituted that form of legal machinery which from year's end to year's end kept the tenant in hot water. It prohibited the serving of notices to quit except in certain cases—namely, the case of a tenant who had failed to pay his fair rent, or who persisted in deteriorating his holding, or who sub-divided it. It would be manifestly unjust to deprive the landlord of his right to evict in these cases; but there was a provision in the Bill enabling tenants who were prevented by their landlords unreasonably from making a sub-division of their holdings to apply to the Court, which should have it in its power to permit a sub-division if it thought proper, subject to reasonable conditions. Some observations had been made on County Court Judges in Ireland, who were supposed by hon. Members to be—as the Attorney General for Ireland had denied—fools; but having a knowledge of most of those learned gentlemen, he was able to say that they were men of large experience, and high attainments, and were fully competent to carry out in a reasonable manner the provisions of any Bill that might be intrusted to their administration. The difficulty that had always existed on this subject was how to ascertain what was a fair rent, and that was a question upon which a good deal of difference of opinion existed. It had been suggested that the amount of fair rent should be decided by a jury. But the jury would manifestly either consist of landlords or tenants, which would be unsatisfactory. Then the alternative was proposed by taking six of one and half-a-dozen of the other; but such a course would only result in no agreement being arrived at all. There was also an objection to arbitration, which would probably prove a cause for litigation. If the arbitrators did not agree, the question would be referred to an umpire, and from him it would ultimately reach the Courts of Law. It would be much better, therefore, that the case should go before the Court at once without any delay. It had been suggested the difficulty should be met by a new valuation of Ireland; but such a proceeding would occupy a considerable amount of time, and if the Bill was delayed by such a result the delay would be inconvenient. It therefore appeared to him, and to the hon. Members whose names were upon the Bill, that the proposal, with regard to ascertaining a fair rent, as set forth in the Bill, was possibly the best as a choice of difficulties that could be adopted. He pointed out the course of procedure, in the early sections of the Bill, by which the tenant could in a summary way apply to Court to have his rent reduced, and in the same way he allowed the landlord to issue a claim to have his rent increased to a fair rent. He then proposed that the rent thus agreed upon should continue for seven years at the least, or whatever longer period the House might think proper to fix, leaving it open to either the landlord or tenant to again claim to have the rent adjusted. This was no novel proposal, for on the adjustment of the tithe rent-charge the same system was adopted. The parties having come before the Court, he then proposed a method of procedure, which he thought would commend itself to hon. Members, for ascertaining, or rather helping the Judge to ascertain, what a fair rent was. He provided for the attendance of a valuator from the Valuation Office in Dublin, who should go down, examine the premises, and then give evidence on oath as to what, in his opinion, the value of the premises was. This evidence was to guide, not bind the Chairman. He further provided that the rent, to be deemed a fair rent, should be that which a solvent and responsible tenant could at the time of inquiry afford to pay fairly, and without collusion, for the premises after deducting from such rent—first, the addition to the letting value of the premises referable to any unexhausted and suitable improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title; secondly, any increase of letting value referable to the expenditure of labour or capital of tenant, whether the same be capable of being specified in detail or not, and the Judge should further take into consideration any variation in the average price of agricultural produce or stock, if evidence of the same should be offered. The rent so ascertained was to be the fair rent. The second part of the Bill contained provisions for securing the right of free sales, without regard to office rules, which had eaten away the Ulster tenant right. It had been urged on the other side of the House that such a principle would amount to confiscation of the landlords' rights; but he contended that if there existed confiscation it was the confiscation of the tenant's property in the soil. If the present confiscation of tenants' rights were prevented, the proper position of landlords and tenants would be established for the benefit of all classes of people in Ireland. The Bill, if passed into law, would make the provisions of the Land Act to work satisfactorily, inasmuch as the great need required beyond that provided by the Land Act was to enable the tenant to retain possession so long as he paid a fair rent. By the Land Act the tenant would obtain payment for improvements, and by this Bill he would obtain a fair and reasonable hold over his property, and freedom from disturbance. The principle, indeed, was, in a measure, recognized by the Land Act, and should, therefore, be supported by hon. Members opposite. There were certain alterations which would probably be made in Committee. He did not think it would be reasonable not to have some provision by which parties, if they thought fit, might contract themselves out of the Act; and, therefore, it allowed tenants occupying holdings of the value of £100 and upwards to contract themselves out of it. A man in possession of a holding of that value would probably be in a position of life in which he could stand upon his rights as against his landlord. He would also except from his Bill all leases over 99 years, and give power to limited owners to make leases for that period when they thought it advisable to exclude the provisions of the Act. He was sorry the Irish Conservative Members were not in their places on the occasional, because he believed they were open to conviction, and because he wished to show them that this was a fair Bill, recognizing the principle of equity and justice between man and man. There were very few landlords in Ireland who, if they had their land thrown on their hands, would be competent to manage and develop it. The object of the landlord should, therefore, be to get a fair rent, and retain tenants who would be willing to continue their holdings on equitable terms rather than to endeavour to extort an unfair rental. One advantage of passing this measure would be that it would tend to diminish the loud and inflated talk—the “tall talk,” as the Americans termed it—which was indulged in by the Land League. The agitation which had existed during the last 18 months had, in his opinion, done positive mischief by chilling the hearts of Irish landlords, and prompting many of them to shut their purses against distress that might otherwise have secured their sympathy. If that agitation continued without abatement, it would simply widen the breach between landlords and tenants, and would place the former in a position of hostility towards the latter. The results no one would be able to foresee. The contest might be compared to the celebrated conflict between the Kilkenny cats. The landlords, on the one hand, would insist on getting their rents, and would throw off all compassion for the tenants, and the kindly feeling that existed before would be blunted. The tenantry, on the other hand, would have to fight their way upon whatever rights they now possessed, and the result would be to divide the country into two hostile camps. If the House would sanction the principle of this Bill he would be satisfied, and go no further at present than the second reading. He hoped that hon. Members on the opposite side of the House who were called the “Third Party” would support the Bill. Indeed, they were bound to support it unless they were biassed by the sentiment that it had not emanated from themselves, and he thought they were too generous to oppose it from such a motive. The measure ought to be regarded not as spoliation of the landlord, but as securing for him a permanent and fixed property without bringing with it the fear of agrarian outrage. In his own early days a landlord was not afraid to walk about his property in the dark; but, at the present time, there was a decided fear of this kind in some parts of Ireland. Whether hon. Members came from Ireland or not, he would urge them to view the question as one of fair play. The right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, writing to Lord Castlereagh on the 23rd March last, had denied that the Conservative Government were hostile to the Ulster tenant right, and that they were opposed to the basis of the Land Act of 1870. It was true that there had been a General Election pending then; but he did not suppose that the right hon. Gentleman had changed his views in the comparatively short time that had elapsed since his letter. He did not think he was asking too much when he asked the right hon. Gentleman and his supporters for their votes on the present occasion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Litton.)

MR. P. J. SMYTH said, he rose simply to express the hope that the Government would see their way to give full and favourable consideration to this Bill, which embodied the true principles of tenant right. It extended to the whole of Ireland the incidence of the Ulster system. That system worked well in Ulster in the interest of both landlord and tenant. They were justified, therefore, in assuming that it would work well also in the other Provinces. The Bill had, besides, the conspicuous merit that it dealt boldly and comprehensively with a great subject, and in a way calculated to effect a settlement of a burning question. It was not desirable—it was most undesirable—that the Statute Book should be encumbered with a multiplicity of small Land Bills dealing piecemeal with a vast and complicated subject. The question should be dealt with as a whole in a large and generous spirit, and in one comprehensive measure, or, in his opinion, it should not be touched at all.

MR. J. N. RICHARDSON gave the Bill his cordial and hearty support, inasmuch as it dealt with certain grievances which, unfortunately, demanded legislation. During his short sojourn in that House he had found it a general opinion that though in the Southern part of Ireland things might be in a very bad state, in Ulster everything was just as it should be. As the mouthpiece of Ulster tenant farmers, he was there to say that this was not the case in that Province—that they were not satisfied with the law as it stood. In Ulster there was great diversity of religious belief, and great difference in the class of people who cultivated the land. There were farmers as poor, perhaps, as those of Donegal, or of the West; but, on the other hand, there were hundreds or thousands of middle class farmers—yeomen—who were the backbone of any country; and during an extended canvass throughout the country, during the last Election, he had not heard, in public or in private, a single syllable about non-payment of rent, and he was referring not only to the well-to-do classes, but to the poorest and most wretched. He should be the last person to encourage such a cry; landlords were also Her Majesty's subjects and had their just rights. What the farmers said to him was—"We want to pay our rent; we acknowledge it is a debt we owe; but it ought not to be gradually raised when the increased value is the fruit of our own industry alone. If a town is extended, or a factory built, or a mine is found, the landlord is entitled to raise his rent; but we ask the Legislature to prevent the landlords taxing our own industry as has been done, and we do ask that we shall have the freedom to sell the tenant right or the goodwill independently of the restriction of any office rule." The provisions of the Bill would meet these two cases. English Members might say—certainly English gentlemen outside the House often said—that if an Irish tenant were not satisfied to pay the advanced rent he might pack up his traps and go; and this would be a very proper answer if the tenure was similar in its nature to that of England and Scotland. The difference, however, was sufficiently marked to need no comment. In Ireland, houses, buildings, stables, offices, were in many cases built, and many improvements were made by the tenant, without assistance, and yet if he went away he had to leave all behind him. It was the anomalous double ownership that had grown up which made the Irish Land Question one so difficult to deal with. If this had been the first time the State interfered with private contract, he would have been very cautious in supporting the Bill; but in 1833, when the Factory Act was introduced, contracts had been seriously limited, the working hours for women and young people being reduced to 10 per day. In 1874 the Government had further reduced those hours to 9½. At the latter period he had gone to France and Belgium with the view of ascertaining how the factories of the North of Ireland were to be enabled to compete with those of the countries named; and he had come back, having been courteously received by both French and Belgians, and having been allowed to inspect their books, convinced that at the rate of 10 hours a-day the North of Ireland could just compete with foreign manufacturers and no more. He regretted that the hon. Members for Belfast (Mr. Ewart and Mr. Corry) were not present, because he thought they would have corroborated this statement; but he believed that events themselves had amply justified the conclusion at which he had arrived. He did not wish to find fault with the Act passed in 1874; but he wanted to show that the Conservative Government had, to a very considerable extent, interfered with private contract, and that the measure now before the House did not set a precedent in this respect. Landlords in Ireland had got a very bad name at the present time; but he was sure that many of them would be glad to have the odium removed from their shoulders to the Court, which would intervene, by the provisions of this Bill, in cases of disputed rent. With regard to the operation of the Bill against the grievances of restricted sale of tenant right, he would mention just one case of the latter description to the House. In 1867 a man named John Wilson had held a farm of 80 acres on a certain estate. He built the dwelling-house and offices, thoroughly drained the land, and then informed the agent that he proposed to offer his tenancy for sale. The agent said he might do this, but required that he should not take more than £10 an acre. A man named John Robinson wished to purchase, and agreed to give £1,400 for the tenant right; but the landlord's agent said that Robinson must sign an agreement binding him to give up the farm, if the landlord wanted it at any time, and not to receive more than £10 an acre. Robinson naturally refused to buy the tenant right on this principle, and the result was that Wilson had to sell his 80 acres of land for £600 less than he otherwise would have received. An hon. Member had spoken about confiscation the other evening. If the House wanted to know what confiscation was, here was confiscation pure and simple. He could conceive nothing more calculated to make an industrious man lazy, or a tenant farmer thriftless and untidy, than to tell him that however he might toil, sweat, or dig, his land should be worth only a certain price and nothing more. There was nothing visionary or wild in the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton). The Irish peasant had a love for his home which was very strong; so strong, that it stood in the way of his interest at times, and that of his family. Still, he (Mr. Richardson) could sympathize with that feeling, for he had travelled as far as Russia in the East, and America in the West, and yet found no place for which he would exchange his Irish home; and if he could do anything to aid his brother countrymen by supporting a measure such as this, or a better Government measure, he would be very happy to do so.

COLONEL COLTHURST said that the Bill contained a principle on which alone, in his opinion, the Irish Land Question could be settled. It had frequently been asked why, in respect of Irish land, freedom of contract between man and man should be interfered with? The answer was that, in the case of 75 per cent of the poorer class of Irish tenants, such a thing as freedom of contract did not exist, and that was owing to what had been called the land hunger existing in Ireland. The inordinate desire to obtain possession of land led to what would be considered very uncommercial dealings with a view to obtain it. A small farmer wished to rent several farms. On one of these he lived, others he let below their value to dairymen, keeping them in reserve for his family, and thus diminishing the supply and increasing the demand. How was that state of things to be met? It could only be met by some tribunal which would step in between the landlord and tenant and say what was a fair and reasonable rent which should be paid for each holding. The Bill before the House would extend the Ulster custom of tenant right; and if the Government were willing to adopt the principle of the Bill, perhaps his hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone would do well to withdraw his Bill.

MR. P. MARTIN said, that during the late Parliament his Friend Mr. Isaac Butt had exhaustively explained, and on several occasions submitted to the consideration and judgment of the House, the principles on which, the great body of the Irish Members contended, the Land Question in Ireland could alone be satisfactorily settled. During these discussions the Members of the present Government must have acquired sufficient knowledge to enable them now to give expression to their views and opinions in respect to the present Bill. It certainly, in the present state of Ireland, was most desirable that the Chief Secretary should indicate, at least, in general terms, the principles which he conceived should be adopted in future legislation in the direction in which Her Majesty's Government proposed to amend the Land Act of 1870. He concurred with the hon. Member for Tyrone in the statements he had made as to the failure of the Land Act of 1870 to give effect to the intention of the framers of the measure. So long as this principle of compensation for disturbance was adhered to, and security of tenure, so long as he was willing to pay a fair rent, was denied to the Irish tenant, so long would there be discontent and agitation. He could not say the provisions in the Bill, in respect to the tribunal to ascertain and fix the rent as between landlord and tenant, were quite satisfactory; but they proceeded in the right direction in taking away that uncontrolled power now vested in the County Court Judge. He would ask the House to look at the consequences of the present system in Ireland. A tenant in one county might obtain by the decree of the present tribunal a fair and satisfactory sum as compensation; but in another county the Judge, adhering strictly to the Act of Parliament, might give an award which the tenant would receive with a sense of injustice. The result had been but too frequently to produce grave discontent, arising from the uncertainty of the decisions. There were cases on record in which the compensation had been valued at £700 or £800 by most competent witnesses, whose evidence the Judges in some counties would have accepted; yet the County Court Judge had awarded only some £70 or £80. This uncertainty checked the execution of improvements by the tenant. He therefore thought it would be wise on the part of Parliament to put an end to a great portion of the litigation of that character by adopting the principle of the present Bill, which left the question alone for the decision of the tribunal a question of rent. The House might look on what had been the practical effect of the Ulster custom in Ulster. The Chief Secretary had shown, in the strongest and most convincing manner, the beneficial effects which security conferred under the Ulster custom, and had shown what a remarkable contrast the counties where tenant right prevailed presented to the other parts of Ireland. Why not remove the burning grievance? Why not extend the benefits which the Ulster tenant possessed, so that they might be enjoyed over the whole of Ireland? This tenant right question was one of such importance to the whole of Ireland that it ought to be dealt with comprehensively and in one Bill; and he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. P. J. Smyth) was right in deprecating the introduction of a number of small Bills, and in enunciating the principle that it was the duty of the House to deal with the question once for all, and in a comprehensive fashion.

MR. FINDLATER: Sir, this Bill, if passed into law, which I hope it will be, will go far to settle the Land Question. It has, I firmly believe, been carefully prepared so as to avoid any injustice to either landlord or tenant. In Ulster the great benefits conferred by the Land Act of 1870 have been seriously interfered with, if not largely abrogated, by three great grievances. The tenant farmers with one voice complain of the hardships they suffer from want of certainty of tenure, fair rent for their holdings, and the right of free sale. They say, why should we, who have made the land what it is by the sweat of our brows, and by unremitting industry, be obliged to leave our holding at any moment the caprice of our landlord says we should? Why should we be compelled to give up the homes of our forefathers, hallowed by many family associations, if we happen to offend our landlord in any way? It is true we shall receive compensation if we do; but no money payment would atone to us for the severance of those ties which bind us to the home of our childhood and the place we have made what it is by our own toil. Surely, Sir, there is nothing unnatural, unreasonable, or unfair in this feeling. The tenacity with which the Irish tenant clings to the soil is well known. It may be foolish. It might be wiser, perhaps, if he sought some other occupation, political economists may say; but the fact exists and must be dealt with. Landlords possess the power of evicting their tenants, if they offend them in any way, without assignment or reason. Is that right or fair? The majority of landlords would not, I firmly believe, take advantage of this arbitrary power. There are exceptions, however, and, I regret to say, many exceptions. The tenant should be guarded against those unjust landlords who may come over him at any time. The present landlord may be an excellent, kind, and thoughtful man, who would do nothing unfair or unjust; but his successor may be the reverse. It is to compel the unjust landlord to do what the good one performs of his own free will that we ask you to pass this Bill. In the county I represent, the tenants told me over and over again—and I saw many of them during my canvass from one end of the county to the other—that they wanted nothing unfair or unjust. They only desired fair play as between man and man, and to be protected by the law from being disturbed in their holdings so long as they paid their rent, and performed the incidents of their tenure. They assured me they were no revolutionists, and had no desire to take the land from their landlords by force or without payment; but they hungered for release from the vile state of serfdom in which their present condition of uncertainty of tenure placed them. One and all expressed a strong and earnest desire to acquire the perpetuity of their holdings free of rent by buying out, and not expropriating their landlords, if the State would give them assistance to become the purchasers; but like thoroughly reasonable and sensible men they recognized that that could not be done in a moment. They, however, looked forward hopefully and earnestly to the State's speedy action in the matter. One of the understood incidents of Ulster tenant

“It is expected that as long as the tenant pays his rent the landlord will not use his legal power of putting an end to the tenancy.”

In moving the Legislature, therefore, to pass this portion of the Bill, we are doing no more than asking them to affirm by written law that which at present exists by the unwritten code of Ulster tenant right. Now, with respect to the second grievance, that of rents arbitrarily increased from time to time, the Ulster tenants say, although they expend their labour and money in improving the land, which constitute their holdings, when they have made them more valuable by more expenditure, it is adopted by the landlord as an excuse for raising the rent. On some estates it appears to be the practice of the office which manages its dealings with the tenants to treat the coming in of a new tenant such as the son of the old one as a sale, and to put an increased rent upon him. The tenants deem this unrighteous and unfair, and cry aloud for redress. Is there aught unreasonable in such an outcry? Well may they say what encouragement is there given to us to exert ourselves and make improvements, when the result of our exertions is only to increase the rents we pay? Surely that is a state of affairs which ought to exist no longer, and cries aloud to Heaven for redress. In common fairness between man and man the honest tenant should be secured against having the fruits of his industry unjustly appropriated by his superior landlord. The last great grievance is the want of the right of free sale of their holdings by the tenants of land in the Ulster counties. On many of the estates in Down, Antrim, and Monaghan, there exist what are called official rules. These abominable rules materially affect the right of free sale by the tenant of his interest in his holding, and prevent his getting the full market price for the interest, the value of which is the produce of his own industry. Those rules vary on different estates; but, by their provisions, the price which the tenant can take for his holding is fixed, and the peasant to whom he sells must be approved of by the landlord. The prices fixed on different estates vary from £2 to £10 an acre.

An illustration of the injustice done by this system will better explain to the House its unhappy and unjust effects than any words of mine. In the course of my canvass I was at the town of Carrickmacross, and one day in the street a tenant farmer addressed me, and after some preliminary remarks told me this story. He said—

“I have no reason to like my landlord, although he is not a bad man. My little place that I had made with my own hands I desired to sell, and I bargained with a man, a friend of mine, to give it to him for £300. That was a good price, it was £20 an acre. When I went to the office to carry out the sale they told me they could not allow me to take more than £10 an acre, and that I must sell to a man of theirs. As I had to get the money, I was obliged to take £150 for my farm, and the second tenant was charged an additional rent of £7 or £8.”

It would thus seem the landlord had capitalized and appropriated one half of the tenant's property by the imposition of this additional rent upon the new comer. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have talked a good deal of confiscation lately; but, to my mind, no more glaring instance of the confiscation of one man's property by another need possibly be cited. This is not a single case, bear in mind. In my journeys through the country where I was told this story, other tenant farmers on hearing said—“There is my case.” “My case was worse than that.” Is it not time to remedy such an injustice as I have told you? Our Bill, if you pass it into law, will do it. To satisfy the House as to what is thought about its provisions, if I may be permitted I will read a letter which I have received from an ex-County Court Judge who has recently retired, and who had a large experience of the working of the Land Act in a Northern county. He has been examined before Committees of this House upon the Land Question, and his administration of the law during his tenure of office gave universal satisfaction. He says—

“I did not expect you would have got your Land Bill forward so soon. It seems to have met with very general approval in the North, and, if carried in its entirety, it should satisfy all reasonable people. The great difficulty I see is the tribunal for fixing the rent. Too much is left to the discretion of the Chairman and to the Judge of Assize or Appeal. The form is very uncertain, and depends entirely on who the Chairman is. The latter is a very hurried and often a capricious hearing. The appeal should certainly not be left to a single Judge. Many suggest an arbitration, with the Chairman as umpire and in appeal. Throughout Down and Antrim what are called office rules are spreading. I had great difficulty in keeping them in check. On some estates there is a limit of from £2 to £10 an acre. Some landlords claim an absolute right of objection to a purchaser, without assigning any reason. Some insist on having an adjoining tenant as the purchaser. Another mode of interfering with the tenant right is by informing the purchaser when he offers that as he is able to give so much the land must be too cheap, and he is informed that if he buys the rent will be raised. No doubt the tenant can claim for disturbance, when too much rent is demanded; but I need not tell you no one likes to purchase a law suit. Most of these rules are of modern introduction, and if not abolished the tenant right in the North will be worth nothing in a very short time. The 18th section of the Land Act (the Equity Clause) is a fruitful source of irritation. It places a very formidable power in the hands of a Judge who is not in favour of the Land Acts. If Mr. Gladstone's inquiry into the working of the Land Act is well conducted all those objections will come out, and show the absolute necessity of an extensive amendment.”

Now, Sir, there is the strong expression of the opinion of an able and competent Judge in favour of the settlement of the Land Question proposed by the Bill now before the House. It will, I am sure, also command the House by the testimony of a competent and independent observer how injurious the office rules sought to be abolished are. There can be no doubt the Land Act was never intended to legalize this. Permit me, upon this point, to read to the House the words of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government, in that splendid speech in which he closed the debate upon the second reading of the Bill which was carried into the Land Act of 1870—

“The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) says . . . that our legislation with regard to the Ulster custom, legalises the private arrangements on every estate in the North. . . . There cannot be a greater—a more fundamental misconception of the whole matter. The Ulster custom is not a private rule that each chooses at any time to establish. A breach of custom is not a custom. An established custom is a thing well understood as such, and perfectly capable of receiving a legal meaning and interpretation when it is investigated as a matter of fact. Wherever a particular proprietor or an agent chooses to set up a rule which, though it be enforced on the estate, is in derogation of custom, and which has not itself subsisted so far as to acquire the character of a custom, it is condemned as a private and arbitrary practice, and is overridden by the custom the authority of which will be exerted and enforced against it.”
—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 1839.]

Sir, this was the opinion of the great statesman who framed the Act. It shows what his intentions were. The facts I have stated prove that in practice they have been frustrated. Pass this Bill, and the Ulster tenant will get the benefit of the firm, unalloyed, and comprehensive custom to which he is entitled, and not have it frittered away, if not abrogated, as it is at present, by the obnoxious office rules. I conclude by saying on behalf of the sturdy tenants whose cause I have pleaded—"We'll keep our customs. What is law itself but old established custom? * * * All things resolve in custom. We'll keep ours."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that the question before the House was, no doubt, a grave and serious one—one as to which, it was said, the House would like to know the opinion of Her Majesty's Government. The Bill of his hon. Friend was an attempt to solve the Irish Land Question, and that in a very simple form. It embodied the principle which was popularly known as the "Three F's"—namely, free sale, fair rents, and fixity of tenure; and in that form it proposed to extend to the rest of Ireland the Ulster custom. Now, though it might be desirable to extend that custom, he (the Attorney General for Ireland) thought the House could hardly at that moment expect the Government to announce their views as to what should ultimately be the form that the solution of the Irish Land Question should assume. The Government had already stated that it was their intention to immediately issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the working of the Irish Land Act of 1870. The Commission would inquire into the whole question; and, that being so, he thought the House would deem it rather premature and somewhat rash if, before the Commission had inquired, much less reported, the Government were to announce the conclusion at which they were likely to arrive. The proper and wise course was to wait till the Commission had reported, and meantime to decline to express any opinion on the subject. His right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary told the House a few days since that the Commission would be issued at once, and that he hoped to pass a temporary measure for the present year, leaving the House entirely unpledged as to future legislation, adding that it would be quite open to them—if that was the opinion of the majority—to leave things as they now were. It was, in fact, necessary, in order properly to deal with the question, that the Government should have further information; and it would be forestalling the Report of the Commission if they were now to pronounce any opinion as to what the true solution of the Irish Land Question might be. The necessity for inquiry had been admitted by the appointment of a Committee of the House of Lords for the purpose only two years after the passing of the Act of 1870. That Act had since been in operation for eight years more, and an opportunity was thus afforded of obtaining a valuable amount of information which would, he hoped, enable Parliament finally to decide as to the proper mode of dealing with the question. The Government, however, could not at present pledge themselves to any opinion on the matter. He hoped that the hon. Member who had moved the second reading of the Bill would be content with the expression of opinion which his able speech had elicited from many Members of the House. Perhaps, before the debate concluded, they might hear the opinion of some hon. Gentleman on the Opposition Bench, and then he trusted that his hon. Friend would be content to withdraw his Bill for the present, leaving Parliament unpledged and free to deal with the question as it might think best when it had adequate information before it. He could not undertake to support the measure, nor could he give any pledge on the part of the Government that they would deal with the subject in the sense desired by the promoters of the Bill.

MR. GIBSON said, he did not think it was at all unreasonable that hon. Members should desire to know what line the Government intended to take with respect to the Bill. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (the Attorney General for Ireland) seemed to complain, and with rather an injured air, that he had not got a lead from that side of the House as to the course he should adopt, and he made rather an ad misericordiam appeal to the hon. Gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill to decide the matter for himself, and thus relieve the Government from a difficulty—to be satisfied with the discussion which had taken place, with the able speech he had made, and to rest and be thankful upon his laurels. The Government had not approved the Bill; but they had not disapproved it; all that they said was—wait a little longer. The whole tendency of the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was to give this advice—Wait; a Committee of the House of Lords had made inquiry in the past—a Commission was able to make further inquiry in the future; the Government needed information, and having got it they would consider it, and act upon it either by doing something or by doing nothing. They were to have the widest possible discretion to act or not to act. But, having appointed that Commission, they would stultify themselves if they practically took away from the Commission all discretion by now assenting to the second reading of the present Bill, which dealt with pretty much every topic raised in the Land Question. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was in error when he stated that a Royal Commission had been appointed in 1872 by the right hon. Gentlemen now on the Opposition Benches; the fact was that the right hon. Gentleman opposite was in power in 1872, and therefore the Opposition did not appoint the Royal Commission of that year.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW): It was not a Royal Commission, but a Select Committee, appointed by the House of Lords.

MR. GIBSON: Very well; but then the right hon. Gentleman was Prime Minister. The Bill now before the House for second reading was not dealing with the Counties of Tyrone, Armagh, or Monaghan only, nor with the whole of Ulster; but it was intended to refer to the whole of Ireland. He (Mr. Gibson) would not discuss the Bill, as his right hon. and learned Friend had not discussed it; but this he could not refrain from saying—from a lawyer's point of view—that this was a splendid professional Bill, and that if it were passed it would be productive of universal and everlasting litigation. He reserved to himself perfect liberty of action in dealing with and criticizing whatever proposal might be hereafter made by the Government, if any were made. Meanwhile, he supposed the hon. Gentleman would act on the advice so delicately given to him and withdraw the Bill.

Mr. Gibson

[“No!”] Well, he presumed the hon. Member was of age and could answer for himself. If he did not withdraw the Bill, but went to a division, the House would probably be favoured with a further announcement from the Treasury Bench, and perhaps the Government might be forced to come to a rapid decision.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN thought that the House ought to have received some indication from the Government as to their views with regard to the Land Question raised by this Bill. He did not expect that the Government would have accepted the Bill of the hon. Member for Tyrone, but was entitled to have some opinion from the Government. The question which this Bill treated was one upon which he had pledged himself at the hustings more than once; but it must be remembered that there were in Ireland landlords and landlords. There were men who had not derived their land from confiscation; there were some also, like the O'Connor Don, who obtained their property by hereditary descent, and there were others who had obtained land through their own industry; and it was not by the cry of “landlord and tenant” that that great question was to be decided, if it had to be decided, on the inimitable principles of right and justice. He wondered why the Conservative Party, by the lips of their mouth-piece, had not given some indication of the line they would take in regard to such a Bill as that proposed by his hon. Friend. They would not, however, venture an opinion on the matter, struggling, as everyone knew they were, for a miserable feudal position in the country that any man of intellect would despise. Treating the question, as many would no doubt treat it, as a mere commercial transaction, what landlord would say, if he had a tenant from whom he received the value of the land in the nature of rent, and if that tenant wished to sell his occupation to another, it was not a fair commercial transaction? He had promised his constituents to give such a Bill his support; and though it was a measure which should not be hurried it was right for the hon. Member for Tyrone to take the opportunity presented of obtaining the opinion of the House, and thus to offer material to the Government for their use in the coming Session on the introduction of a new Land Bill.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE said, that this Bill was Conservative in the highest degree as compared with the Bill for the Relief of Irish Distress, as to the passing of which through the other House this Session he had much doubt. If no measure of the kind were passed this Session, he feared that much violence would result. In the part of the country with which he was connected in England, there was practically fixity of tenure and fair rents, and the system was eminently successful. What was a success in the one country surely would be so in the other. He could not approve of the conduct of the occupants of the two front Benches, who contented themselves with taunting each other without taking any active steps for the settlement of this question. What were those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen there for if they had not the courage of their convictions? In supporting this Bill, he had no object in view except the thorough pacification of Ireland; and he was convinced that the only way to secure that pacification was to so amend the Land Laws as to bind the landlords and tenants together for their mutual benefit.

MR. SYNAN ridiculed the idea of the Government having issued a Royal Commission to inquire into the principles involved in this Bill. The duty of a Royal Commission was to inquire into facts and not into principles. He thought the Government ought by this time to have made up its mind whether they were to adhere to the principle of the Act of 1870, and merely give compensation for disturbance, so as to secure the tenant; or whether, for the purpose of settling the question, they ought to adopt the Ulster custom, and extend it to the rest of Ireland. At all events, he supposed they would hear from the Chief Secretary in what direction they would act, and whether the present Bill contained any principle upon which the Government might shape future legislation. In his opinion, the present Bill gave ground upon which the question might be settled. It had been said that the Bill was a professional Bill; but, in his opinion, it was an anti-professional Bill. The landlord would know that if he attempted to raise his rents at all unfairly he would have to go into the County Court; and he believed the apprehension of that would prevent landlords from raising their rent unjustly. He thought the principle of the Bill, setting forth as it did the three principles upon which the Irish people wished the matter settled—namely, fixity of tenure at fair rents with free sale—was a principle upon which the future amendment of the Act of 1870 must be shaped. That principle was accepted by the Government last Session, and now the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) had nothing to say on a Bill the principles of which his own Government last year accepted. He apprehended that the Government had an excuse for waiting for the result of the Royal Commission; but, at the same time, he thought they ought to accept the principle of the Bill, leaving the details of the measure to be settled when the Report of the Commission was issued.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member who has just sat down asks me, I think, a rather unreasonable thing. He asks me that we should say now what are the principles of the Land Bills which are to be brought forward next Session. I must really decline to do any such thing. I can hardly think the hon. Member will expect me to do it. He surely cannot think that a person in a Ministry responsible for Irish affairs should suddenly, on a Wednesday afternoon, without the opportunity of consulting his Colleagues, bind the Government to the principle of a measure such as this before the House. The hon. Gentleman, in introducing this measure, had, with great clearness, stated his plan for altering the law; and it is, undoubtedly, a plan which finds much favour among certain classes in Ireland, and the enormous importance of which I do not think can be overrated. The principle of that plan, as I understand it, is that the amount of the rent of land in Ireland is to be fixed, not by the landlords or the tenants, but by arbitrators, and that there is to be fixity of tenure upon payment of the rent so ascertained. This principle has been well discussed this afternoon, and the proposal of the hon. Member has received considerable support, and especially from the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone), and that it should be supported by an English landowner in the position of the hon. Gentleman is an argument very much in its favour. But

I maintain that the Government would be doing very wrong in a matter like this to express their decided opinion when they know, and the hon. Member who brings this measure forward knows to a certainty, that the Bill could not possibly be passed into law this year. If that be the case, we certainly ought to be allowed to keep ourselves free to consider the question in all its bearings; and the House ought not to be committed to a measure which, while held up to the people of Ireland as satisfactory, could not be passed into law this year. The position of the Government is plainly this, and we have not in the slightest departed from it. At the beginning of the Session we thought the position of the Land Question in Ireland was one more than anything else in Ireland demanding the closest attention of the Government, to which we were committed, and, indeed, the attention of any Government. We did not pledge ourselves to bring in a measure; but we did pledge ourselves most seriously to consider whether a measure ought not to be brought forward; and we stated that we did not conceive that in this short Session, having only just taken Office ourselves, that we could attempt to make up our minds as to what kind of measure should be brought forward. We should have been very glad to have left the Land Question entirely alone. I do not wish to touch on the debate of yesterday any more than is necessary. We should have preferred to have left the Land Question alone; but we found that, owing to the temporary and exceptional circumstances of the year, the government of Ireland would be, in our opinion, far more difficult if we did not make a temporary modification of the law. That does not in any way change our opinion, which is this—We have pledged ourselves to make the Land Question one of the very principal questions for consideration next Session. We shall take advantage of the Commission to ascertain the facts; and now we are asked this Wednesday afternoon, before we have been able to study the question as we ought to do, and to have an opportunity of consulting amongst ourselves, we are suddenly asked to decide beforehand, not only to say we will bring in a measure next year, but also to state what sort of a measure it will be. My hon. Friend who has just sat down

says one of the reasons why we ought to do that was because something of the kind was brought forward in the Irish Land Act. But I must remind him that while it was brought forward it was defeated by an enormous majority; and that is rather a strange reason for asking the Government to suddenly agree to a principle which they felt it their duty to oppose before, and which the House at that time agreed in rejecting by a large majority. I do not want to be misunderstood in this matter. I am very much struck with the many arguments brought forward from the position of those hon. Gentlemen who have advocated it; but it is decidedly a question upon which we ought to be left free to consider, and it is just one of those subjects that when the House legislates upon it we ought to be prepared to carry the Bill through, and not merely to adopt what is called the principle of the Bill on the second reading when it could not be carried into law. This year, therefore, I must urgently press on the hon. Member who brought the Bill forward to withdraw his Motion, to be content with the hearing he has obtained, not only for the Bill, but for the principles belonging to it. It is impossible for us to assent to the second reading of the measure; and in order that the House may be left entirely free to consider it I will move the Previous Question.

Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put." — (Mr. William Edward Forster.)

MR. CALLAN did not wish to misunderstand the Chief Secretary for Ireland in the remarks made; but he believed it would be impossible to understand clearly what the Chief Secretary for Ireland meant, except that he should remain unpledged either to principle or expediency. He had hoped that when a Bill was brought forward dealing with Ireland, and having the support of the Irish Liberal Party, there would have been a clear expression of opinion upon the subject; but instead, they found mere professions that the Government would give their earnest attention and best consideration to the policy of introducing a Bill next year. As the Attorney General for Ireland spoke upon the Bill for fixity of tenure, he had hoped he would have availed himself of the opportunity afforded him of withdrawing or modifying the remarks he had formerly made, which were—

“My hon. and learned Friend, in the Preamble of his Bill, refers to the existing law as ‘a hindrance of agriculture.’ Well, Sir, I will not adopt as my own the forcible language of Philocelt, a well-known Irish writer, in reference to ‘fixity of tenure,’ which, he said, would ‘smite Ireland as with a curse;’ but I do very much fear that, under the stereotyped, perhaps I might even say paralyzing system, that these proposals would fix upon us, the last state of poor Ireland would, in respect of agriculture, at least, be worst than the first.”

What did the chief Legal Adviser then say? He said—

“They—the proposals to give fixity of tenure, fair rents and free sale—were referred to and examined in the luminous speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich when he introduced the Irish Land Bill of 1870. He there showed the injustice and the impolicy of any such virtual transfer of property as must be involved in the compulsory establishment of ‘fixity of tenure,’ and for himself and the Liberal Party which he led pronounced emphatically against it. Instead of disturbing and unsettling the foundations of property, my right hon. Friend and those who acted with him carried through Parliament the Irish Land Act, the substantial effect of which I have already stated.”—[3 Hansard, cxxx. 682-5.]

Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman lead the Party now against those demands? The right hon. and learned Gentleman, not having availed himself of the opportunity of disavowing or recanting his former opinions, were they now to understand that the best consideration of the Government was to be given to the advisability of introducing a Bill next year which would not embrace what the right hon. and learned Gentleman had said would “smite Ireland as with a curse?” Why did they not, in a manly and straightforward manner, say what their intention was, and not let them and the people of Ireland be deluded in the coming Session with false and illusory hopes?

MR. METGE, as a Representative of a large Irish county, and a landlord, disagreed, not with the principles of the Bill, but with the Bill itself, because it would not answer the purpose intended, nor would any other Bill like it. The 500,000 small tenants in Ireland were now told that, instead of having some immediate measure of relief, they must wait until the Government had made up their minds what they would do with regard to this subject. What Irishmen wanted was a final settlement of this question, under which the small tenants would obtain a sufficient quantity of land on which to support themselves and their families, and to become owners of it; or, at all events, to obtain such fixity of tenure at as low as possible a rent as was consistent with the just rights of the landlords. Many of those whom he had come there to represent had been driven into infertile plains, where hardly any man could live. They were now to be told when the famine came that the Government would wait until the next week or two before proceeding with the Distress Bill. What was fixity of tenure to such men? No; the Land Question must be settled permanently; tinkering with a worn-out system would never gain the object wished for—namely, the settlement of the present agitation going on in the country. That agitation, however, was making hon. Members listen to what the people had to say, and was making those listen who would not a few years ago. He did not concur with the sweeping assertions that had been made against the Land League. Neither did he support the League; but he said it had done its work. First of all, as far as the charitable funds were concerned, the League had laid them out in a way that did honour to any Committee, and the objects set before the Committee had been carried out honourably and fairly, as far as distributing funds for the relief of distress went. The League had worked honestly and well. Ireland had passed through a season of trial such as no other country could have borne. Famine, if not actual starvation, had haunted her threshold more than hon. Members had any idea of, and on the top of that they were to have a land system that could heave them out by the force of law. Were they to expect that the whole people of Ireland would go down without a word of complaint, as did the men on the Royal George, in all their strength and vigour? If the agitation was to be allayed it must be by a strong and comprehensive measure, and such a measure as that he would support.

MR. LITTON thought that the reasons given by the Government for declining to express any opinion with regard to this Bill were unsatisfactory. Instead of saying that they had not had time to consider the question fully, the Government would be more frank if they were to state that they had not formed any views with regard to it. Fixity of tenure, the free sale of land, and a fair rent ought to be the leading features of any future legislation on this question. He should be wanting in his duty to the tenant farmers of the North of Ireland if he did not take the opinion of the House on this Bill. He, therefore, must divide the House on the subject.

MR. PARNELL: Sir, I trust the hon. Member for the County Tyrone (Mr. Litton), who has charge of the Bill, will excuse me if I venture to speak after he has addressed the House; but I wish to say a few words in explanation of my reasons for not being able to vote in favour of a Bill which he has brought forward. I agree that the Government is entitled to some sympathy in the attitude which they have taken up. The Bill pretends to be a final settlement of the Irish Land Question, and it seems to have been brought forward as such by the hon. Member who is in charge of it without a sufficient idea of the exigencies of the moment. It differs in that respect from the Bill for compensation for disturbance of the Government, which, as I take it, does not profess to be even a temporary settlement of the Land Question, but only an alleviation of the tension and pressure in that system. Is there any hon. Gentleman in this House who will say that a Government which has just come into Office is not entitled to time for consideration of a tangled and difficult question, such as the Irish Land Question, before it endorses a principle about which there is great difference of opinion in Ireland, and which has not been unanimously accepted in that country as a final settlement of the Land Question. I have listened with great interest to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Metge), who stated his belief that this measure would only touch the case of large tenants in Ireland. For myself, I think that if the machinery proposed by the Bill was workable, and could be properly put into operation, it would be of advantage to the tenants in the North as well as in the South, and would include those who occupy farms of a large size as well as those of more moderate dimensions. I deny, however, entirely that it would be of the slightest use to the 300,000 small tenants, who have really made the Irish land what it is, and whose sufferings have placed the Irish Land Question in its position before the British public. I do not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of the final settlement of the Land Question; but I have in times past voted on more than one occasion for the Bill of Mr. Butt—a Bill similar to the one before the House; but I consider that Mr. Butt's Bill was a considerable improvement on this one in many working points, and one of them was that it threw the onus on the landlord to bring the tenant into court. I think, however, that one of the real difficulties, next to insecurity of tenure, in respect of the Irish Land Question, is that the land is badly distributed. What happened after the Irish Famine? During that Famine the landlords took the opportunity of making extensive clearances, especially in the County Meath and other districts in which there were large tracts of land devoted to grazing. The residue of the people went to the hillsides and bogs of Connaught, where their descendants are now living on land consisting of bog and mountain, which they have redeemed. There are in Ireland 250,000 small tenants who can hardly pay any rent at all; and it would be purely mockery to go to these men with this Bill. In order to remedy the state of things in the West of Ireland we require either emigration or migration. There are in Ireland 4,500,000 acres light grazing land occupied by graziers in farms of 1,000 or 2,000 acres. These lands, which were formerly in cultivation, are not suitable to be permanently laid down in pasture. They require to be broken up and cropped; and what I propose is that the tenants on the poor lands in the West of Ireland should be given an opportunity of migrating to those grazing lands. I believe the better settlement of the Land Question lies in giving the tenants of Ireland an opportunity of becoming the owners of the land. I wish to enable this to be done by the issue of debentures at 3½ per cent guaranteed by the State. I believe that after this year many landlords will be willing and anxious to sell their lands on easy terms. The present Bill will be of no use to more than a minority of Irish tenants who have an interest in the soil and are undoubtedly deserving, but who have not made the Land Question in Ireland what it now is. I think that the Government are entitled to have an opportunity of considering the question as a whole, and of seeing whether they could not enlarge the Land Act of 1870, so as to enable it to meet the objects of the promoters of this Bill, and also to provide some means by which tenants could purchase their holdings on fair and reasonable terms. I believe that the existing Irish land system cannot possibly continue; and if the House passes this Bill it will only be prolonging a system which has worked, and is still working, incalculable evil to Ireland. In England, tenants are comparatively prosperous and contented, because, owing to the remembrance of the feudal system, the landlords, while insisting on their rights, do not altogether forget their duties; in Ireland, where the feudal system does not survive, the landlords claim their rights but forget their duties. The Irish system has failed in every European country where it has been tried; and I must add that it has been attended in Ireland with more evil than in any other country in which it has been in operation. I believe that the agitation now going on in Ireland will make the farmers see that the only way of settling the Land Question is by their acquiring the ownership of their holdings. I must again express my opinion that the Government is now entitled to an opportunity of considering the whole subject; and that, under the circumstances, it would be better not to press the second reading of this Bill; and if next Session they do not bring forward satisfactory proposals we shall know how to proceed.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA admitted that, having read the Bill, he could not say that if it became law it would do much good, while it would stand in the way of some reforms which it would be desirable to introduce; but, at the same time, it would meet the wants of some classes of tenants. He thought it would be of little avail taking a division on the Bill, because no legislation on that subject was to take place this Session. Still, if the measure was pressed, he would vote for the hon. Member for Tyrone. There were many classes of tenants who could only be benefited by the establishment of peasant proprietorship. He did not see how the tenants of the West of Ireland could be transferred to the grazing lands; but, at the same time, he was convinced that if fair means and opportunity were provided, the tenants of Ireland would largely purchase their holdings.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that taking the statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and the speech of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), they might be described as being in a state of some confusion. The Government pleaded that they were not in a position to give a positive opinion on the merits of the present Bill. Some of those on that side of the House were, perhaps, in a somewhat similar position; and they would, therefore, be placed in a position of some difficulty if the hon. Member for Tyrone insisted on going to a division. He regarded the Bill as an improvement on the present system; but, at the same time, he did not think that it would effect a settlement of the question. He would vote for the Bill if it were pressed to a division; but he trusted that such a course would not be adopted, as it would place many of the Irish Members in a position of much difficulty.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) ACTS 1872 AND 1878 EXTENSION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. PEDDIE, Bill to amend and extend the Education (Scotland) Acts of 1872 and 1878, ordered to be brought in by Mr. PEDDIE, Mr. WILLIAM HOLMS, Colonel ALEXANDER, Mr. HENDERSON, and Mr. MARK STEWART.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 252.]

SOUTH WESTERN (OF LONDON) DISTRICT POST OFFICE BILL.

Select Committee on the South Western (of London) District Post Office Bill nominated:—Mr. JOSEPH PEASE, Mr. HOLMS, Lord JOHN MANNERS, and Two Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection:—Three to be the quorum.—(Lord Richard Grosvenor.)

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

opposite (the Earl of Galloway) then came down, and moved that the Earldom as it stood should be brought down to the Roll of 1565. The Report of the Select Committee distinctly said that no Order was made with reference to the old Earldom, and distinctly affirmed that the old Earldom was still on the Roll. Let the noble Lord (the Earl of Mar and Kellie) put his Earldom on the Roll, and leave the old Earldom to take care of itself. He objected to the assertion that the Scotch Peers treated this question on personal grounds. The point to be decided was one involving more than personal interests for Scotch Peers—namely, what was the right place on the Union Roll for the Mar Peerage? The matter could not be left in its present position. He hoped their Lordships would not stultify themselves by insisting on the Resolution which had been carried the other day.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he was unable to understand what was the difficulty raised with regard to the point of Order. A few weeks ago the House came to the conclusion that it was incumbent on it to rescind a certain Order; but in order to carry that opinion into effect—as it was not binding—it was necessary that there should be a separate and new Motion to rescind. When the Motion was placed on the Paper, the noble Earl (the Earl of Redesdale) gave Notice of an Amendment. He did not see that the noble Earl could be accused of being out of Order in moving an Amendment to a new Motion brought before the House, consequent on the Resolution of the 14th of June. He did not intend to enter at any length into the merits of the question. Like most other Members of the Scotch Peerage, he thought the question one of great importance, apart from all personal considerations. He did not think that those who took the part of Mr. Goodeve Erskine acted from mere personal motives, for he believed that they desired to see the Scotch Peerage Roll made up properly for the honour of the Scotch Peerage. He could, to a certain extent, sympathize with those noble Lords. When the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees (the Earl of Redesdale) spoke of “personal motives,” he did not speak of personal motives in an unworthy sense; but he was bound to say, not having read the evidence before the Committee, that he was unable to give an opinion on a legal question which ought to be decided by a legal tribunal. He did not think it would redound to the honour of the Scotch Peerage to snatch a victory by a chance vote. On the contrary, he thought they should abstain from any hasty expression on so important a subject. For himself, he would be glad if Mr. Goodeve Erskine could secure his Scotch Peerage; but the proper course must be taken to that end. One of the subordinate questions raised was where his name should stand on the Roll at Holyrood. The noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) would know that that was a question which must be gone into with the fullest evidence and material for coming to a conclusion. For one, he (the Duke of Argyll) knew that his name occupied a position on the Roll which he ought not to do, and the same was the case with the noble Duke (the Duke of Sutherland). Noble Lords knew that those were not solitary instances, and if they were to go into that question it must be done in judicial form. If Mr. Goodeve Erskine wanted to keep his place he must issue a new Commission. This question should not be made a political or personal one; and he believed that on the 14th of June the House was hurried into giving a vote without having before it adequate information on the subject. He felt strongly the plea raised by the noble Earl (the Earl of Redesdale), to be zealous of the honour of the House when dealing with questions of a judicial character.

THE EARL OF MANSFIELD said, that the real reason why this question had been brought forward was that justice had not been done. He had looked into the decision of the Committee of Privileges, and he contended that it was contrary to justice in every way; and he could show from documents, legal and historical, that there was no proof that the date 1565 was correct for the Earl of Kellie's title of the Earl of Mar. He wished to ask how the Order of the Committee in the House was originally given out? He had heard that no Resolution of the House was come to, and that there was nothing recorded upon the Journals of the House. Although the House had not come to any decision with regard to the ancient Earldom of Mar, Mr. Goodeve Erskine, satisfied with the discussion which had taken place, with the able speech he had made, and to rest and be thankful upon his laurels. The Government had not approved the Bill; but they had not disapproved it; all that they said was—wait a little longer. The whole tendency of the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was to give this advice—Wait; a Committee of the House of Lords had made inquiry in the past—a Commission was able to make further inquiry in the future; the Government needed information, and having got it they would consider it, and act upon it either by doing something or by doing nothing. They were to have the widest possible discretion to act or not to act. But, having appointed that Commission, they would stultify themselves if they practically took away from the Commission all discretion by now assenting to the second reading of the present Bill, which dealt with pretty much every topic raised in the Land Question. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was in error when he stated that a Royal Commission had been appointed in 1872 by the right hon. Gentlemen now on the Opposition Benches; the fact was that the right hon. Gentleman opposite was in power in 1872, and therefore the Opposition did not appoint the Royal Commission of that year.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW): It was not a Royal Commission, but a Select Committee, appointed by the House of Lords.

MR. GIBSON: Very well; but then the right hon. Gentleman was Prime Minister. The Bill now before the House for second reading was not dealing with the Counties of Tyrone, Armagh, or Monaghan only, nor with the whole of Ulster; but it was intended to refer to the whole of Ireland. He (Mr. Gibson) would not discuss the Bill, as his right hon. and learned Friend had not discussed it; but this he could not refrain from saying—from a lawyer's point of view—that this was a splendid professional Bill, and that if it were passed it would be productive of universal and everlasting litigation. He reserved to himself perfect liberty of action in dealing with and criticizing whatever proposal might be hereafter made by the Government, if any were made. Meanwhile, he supposed the hon. Gentleman would act on the advice so delicately given to him and withdraw the Bill.

[“No!”] Well, he presumed the hon. Member was of age and could answer for himself. If he did not withdraw the Bill, but went to a division, the House would probably be favoured with a further announcement from the Treasury Bench, and perhaps the Government might be forced to come to a rapid decision.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN thought that the House ought to have received some indication from the Government as to their views with regard to the Land Question raised by this Bill. He did not expect that the Government would have accepted the Bill of the hon. Member for Tyrone, but was entitled to have some opinion from the Government. The question which this Bill treated was one upon which he had pledged himself at the hustings more than once; but it must be remembered that there were in Ireland landlords and landlords. There were men who had not derived their land from confiscation; there were some also, like the O'Connor Don, who obtained their property by hereditary descent, and there were others who had obtained land through their own industry; and it was not by the cry of “landlord and tenant” that that great question was to be decided, if it had to be decided, on the inimitable principles of right and justice. He wondered why the Conservative Party, by the lips of their mouthpiece, had not given some indication of the line they would take in regard to such a Bill as that proposed by his hon. Friend. They would not, however, venture an opinion on the matter, struggling, as everyone knew they were, for a miserable feudal position in the country that any man of intellect would despise. Treating the question, as many would no doubt treat it, as a mere commercial transaction, what landlord would say, if he had a tenant from whom he received the value of the land in the nature of rent, and if that tenant wished to sell his occupation to another, it was not a fair commercial transaction? He had promised his constituents to give such a Bill his support; and though it was a measure which should not be hurried it was right for the hon. Member for Tyrone to take the opportunity presented of obtaining the opinion of the House, and thus to offer material to the Government for their use in the coming Session on the introduction of a new Land Bill.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE said, that this Bill was Conservative in the highest degree as compared with the Bill for the Relief of Irish Distress, as to the passing of which through the other House this Session he had much doubt. If no measure of the kind were passed this Session, he feared that much violence would result. In the part of the country with which he was connected in England, there was practically fixity of tenure and fair rents, and the system was eminently successful. What was a success in the one country surely would be so in the other. He could not approve of the conduct of the occupants of the two front Benches, who contented themselves with taunting each other without taking any active steps for the settlement of this question. What were those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen there for if they had not the courage of their convictions? In supporting this Bill, he had no object in view except the thorough pacification of Ireland; and he was convinced that the only way to secure that pacification was to so amend the Land Laws as to bind the landlords and tenants together for their mutual benefit.

MR. SYNAN ridiculed the idea of the Government having issued a Royal Commission to inquire into the principles involved in this Bill. The duty of a Royal Commission was to inquire into facts and not into principles. He thought the Government ought by this time to have made up its mind whether they were to adhere to the principle of the Act of 1870, and merely give compensation for disturbance, so as to secure the tenant; or whether, for the purpose of settling the question, they ought to adopt the Ulster custom, and extend it to the rest of Ireland. At all events, he supposed they would hear from the Chief Secretary in what direction they would act, and whether the present Bill contained any principle upon which the Government might shape future legislation. In his opinion, the present Bill gave ground upon which the question might be settled. It had been said that the Bill was a professional Bill; but, in his opinion, it was an anti-professional Bill. The landlord would know that if he attempted to raise his rents at all unfairly he would have to go into the County Court; and he believed the apprehension of that would prevent landlords from raising their rent unjustly. He thought the principle of the Bill, setting forth as it did the three principles upon which the Irish people wished the matter settled—namely, fixity of tenure at fair rents with free sale—was a principle upon which the future amendment of the Act of 1870 must be shaped. That principle was accepted by the Government last Session, and now the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) had nothing to say on a Bill the principles of which his own Government last year accepted. He apprehended that the Government had an excuse for waiting for the result of the Royal Commission; but, at the same time, he thought they ought to accept the principle of the Bill, leaving the details of the measure to be settled when the Report of the Commission was issued.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member who has just sat down asks me, I think, a rather unreasonable thing. He asks me that we should say now what are the principles of the Land Bills which are to be brought forward next Session. I must really decline to do any such thing. I can hardly think the hon. Member will expect me to do it. He surely cannot think that a person in a Ministry responsible for Irish affairs should suddenly, on a Wednesday afternoon, without the opportunity of consulting his Colleagues, bind the Government to the principle of a measure such as this before the House. The hon. Gentleman, in introducing this measure, had, with great clearness, stated his plan for altering the law; and it is, undoubtedly, a plan which finds much favour among certain classes in Ireland, and the enormous importance of which I do not think can be overrated. The principle of that plan, as I understand it, is that the amount of the rent of land in Ireland is to be fixed, not by the landlords or the tenants, but by arbitrators, and that there is to be fixity of tenure upon payment of the rent so ascertained. This principle has been well discussed this afternoon, and the proposal of the hon. Member has received considerable support, and especially from the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone), and that it should be supported by an English landowner in the position of the hon. Gentleman is an argument very much in its favour. But

I maintain that the Government would be doing very wrong in a matter like this to express their decided opinion when they know, and the hon. Member who brings this measure forward knows to a certainty, that the Bill could not possibly be passed into law this year. If that be the case, we certainly ought to be allowed to keep ourselves free to consider the question in all its bearings; and the House ought not to be committed to a measure which, while held up to the people of Ireland as satisfactory, could not be passed into law this year. The position of the Government is plainly this, and we have not in the slightest departed from it. At the beginning of the Session we thought the position of the Land Question in Ireland was one more than anything else in Ireland demanding the closest attention of the Government, to which we were committed, and, indeed, the attention of any Government. We did not pledge ourselves to bring in a measure; but we did pledge ourselves most seriously to consider whether a measure ought not to be brought forward; and we stated that we did not conceive that in this short Session, having only just taken Office ourselves, that we could attempt to make up our minds as to what kind of measure should be brought forward. We should have been very glad to have left the Land Question entirely alone. I do not wish to touch on the debate of yesterday any more than is necessary. We should have preferred to have left the Land Question alone; but we found that, owing to the temporary and exceptional circumstances of the year, the government of Ireland would be, in our opinion, far more difficult if we did not make a temporary modification of the law. That does not in any way change our opinion, which is this—We have pledged ourselves to make the Land Question one of the very principal questions for consideration next Session. We shall take advantage of the Commission to ascertain the facts; and now we are asked this Wednesday afternoon, before we have been able to study the question as we ought to do, and to have an opportunity of consulting amongst ourselves, we are suddenly asked to decide beforehand, not only to say we will bring in a measure next year, but also to state what sort of a measure it will be. My hon. Friend who has just sat down

says one of the reasons why we ought to do that was because something of the kind was brought forward in the Irish Land Act. But I must remind him that while it was brought forward it was defeated by an enormous majority; and that is rather a strange reason for asking the Government to suddenly agree to a principle which they felt it their duty to oppose before, and which the House at that time agreed in rejecting by a large majority. I do not want to be misunderstood in this matter. I am very much struck with the many arguments brought forward from the position of those hon. Gentlemen who have advocated it; but it is decidedly a question upon which we ought to be left free to consider, and it is just one of those subjects that when the House legislates upon it we ought to be prepared to carry the Bill through, and not merely to adopt what is called the principle of the Bill on the second reading when it could not be carried into law. This year, therefore, I must urgently press on the hon. Member who brought the Bill forward to withdraw his Motion, to be content with the hearing he has obtained, not only for the Bill, but for the principles belonging to it. It is impossible for us to assent to the second reading of the measure; and in order that the House may be left entirely free to consider it I will move the Previous Question.

MR. CALLAN did not wish to misunderstand the Chief Secretary for Ireland in the remarks made; but he believed it would be impossible to understand clearly what the Chief Secretary for Ireland meant, except that he should remain unpledged either to principle or expediency. He had hoped that when a Bill was brought forward dealing with Ireland, and having the support of the Irish Liberal Party, there would have been a clear expression of opinion upon the subject; but instead, they found mere professions that the Government would give their earnest attention and best consideration to the policy of introducing a Bill next year. As the Attorney General for Ireland spoke upon the Bill for fixity of tenure, he had hoped he would have availed himself of the opposite (the Earl of Galloway) then came down, and moved that the Earldom as it stood should be brought down to the Roll of 1565. The Report of the Select Committee distinctly said that no Order was made with reference to the old Earldom, and distinctly affirmed that the old Earldom was still on the Roll. Let the noble Lord (the Earl of Mar and Kellie) put his Earldom on the Roll, and leave the old Earldom to take care of itself. He objected to the assertion that the Scotch Peers treated this question on personal grounds. The point to be decided was one involving more than personal interests for Scotch Peers—namely, what was the right place on the Union Roll for the Mar Peerage? The matter could not be left in its present position. He hoped their Lordships would not stultify themselves by insisting on the Resolution which had been carried the other day.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he was unable to understand what was the difficulty raised with regard to the point of Order. A few weeks ago the House came to the conclusion that it was incumbent on it to rescind a certain Order; but in order to carry that opinion into effect—as it was not binding—it was necessary that there should be a separate and new Motion to rescind. When the Motion was placed on the Paper, the noble Earl (the Earl of Redesdale) gave Notice of an Amendment. He did not see that the noble Earl could be accused of being out of Order in moving an Amendment to a new Motion brought before the House, consequent on the Resolution of the 14th of June. He did not intend to enter at any length into the merits of the question. Like most other Members of the Scotch Peerage, he thought the question one of great importance, apart from all personal considerations. He did not think that those who took the part of Mr. Goodeve Erskine acted from mere personal motives, for he believed that they desired to see the Scotch Peerage Roll made up properly for the honour of the Scotch Peerage. He could, to a certain extent, sympathize with those noble Lords. When the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees (the Earl of Redesdale) spoke of “personal motives,” he did not speak of personal motives in an unworthy sense; but he was bound to say, not having read the evidence before the Committee, that he was unable to give an opinion on a legal question which ought to be decided by a legal tribunal. He did not think it would redound to the honour of the Scotch Peerage to snatch a victory by a chance vote. On the contrary, he thought they should abstain from any hasty expression on so important a subject. For himself, he would be glad if Mr. Goodeve Erskine could secure his Scotch Peerage; but the proper course must be taken to that end. One of the subordinate questions raised was where his name should stand on the Roll at Holyrood. The noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) would know that that was a question which must be gone into with the fullest evidence and material for coming to a conclusion. For one, he (the Duke of Argyll) knew that his name occupied a position on the Roll which he ought not to do, and the same was the case with the noble Duke (the Duke of Sutherland). Noble Lords knew that those were not solitary instances, and if they were to go into that question it must be done in judicial form. If Mr. Goodeve Erskine wanted to keep his place he must issue a new Commission. This question should not be made a political or personal one; and he believed that on the 14th of June the House was hurried into giving a vote without having before it adequate information on the subject. He felt strongly the plea raised by the noble Earl (the Earl of Redesdale), to be zealous of the honour of the House when dealing with questions of a judicial character.

THE EARL OF MANSFIELD said, that the real reason why this question had been brought forward was that justice had not been done. He had looked into the decision of the Committee of Privileges, and he contended that it was contrary to justice in every way; and he could show from documents, legal and historical, that there was no proof that the date 1565 was correct for the Earl of Kellie's title of the Earl of Mar. He wished to ask how the Order of the Committee in the House was originally given out? He had heard that no Resolution of the House was come to, and that there was nothing recorded upon the Journals of the House. Although the House had not come to any decision with regard to the ancient Earldom of Mar, Mr. Goodeve Erskine, ment would be more frank if they were to state that they had not formed any views with regard to it. Fixity of tenure, the free sale of land, and a fair rent ought to be the leading features of any future legislation on this question. He should be wanting in his duty to the tenant farmers of the North of Ireland if he did not take the opinion of the House on this Bill. He, therefore, must divide the House on the subject.

MR. PARNELL: Sir, I trust the hon. Member for the County Tyrone (Mr. Litton), who has charge of the Bill, will excuse me if I venture to speak after he has addressed the House; but I wish to say a few words in explanation of my reasons for not being able to vote in favour of a Bill which he has brought forward. I agree that the Government is entitled to some sympathy in the attitude which they have taken up. The Bill pretends to be a final settlement of the Irish Land Question, and it seems to have been brought forward as such by the hon. Member who is in charge of it without a sufficient idea of the exigencies of the moment. It differs in that respect from the Bill for compensation for disturbance of the Government, which, as I take it, does not profess to be even a temporary settlement of the Land Question, but only an alleviation of the tension and pressure in that system. Is there any hon. Gentleman in this House who will say that a Government which has just come into Office is not entitled to time for consideration of a tangled and difficult question, such as the Irish Land Question, before it endorses a principle about which there is great difference of opinion in Ireland, and which has not been unanimously accepted in that country as a final settlement of the Land Question. I have listened with great interest to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Metge), who stated his belief that this measure would only touch the case of large tenants in Ireland. For myself, I think that if the machinery proposed by the Bill was workable, and could be properly put into operation, it would be of advantage to the tenants in the North as well as in the South, and would include those who occupy farms of a large size as well as those of more moderate dimensions. I deny, however, entirely that it would be of the slightest use to the 300,000 small tenants, who have really made the Irish land what it is, and whose sufferings have placed the Irish Land Question in its position before the British public. I do not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of the final settlement of the Land Question; but I have in times past voted on more than one occasion for the Bill of Mr. Butt—a Bill similar to the one before the House; but I consider that Mr. Butt's Bill was a considerable improvement on this one in many working points, and one of them was that it threw the onus on the landlord to bring the tenant into court. I think, however, that one of the real difficulties, next to insecurity of tenure, in respect of the Irish Land Question, is that the land is badly distributed. What happened after the Irish Famine? During that Famine the landlords took the opportunity of making extensive clearances, especially in the County Meath and other districts in which there were large tracts of land devoted to grazing. The residue of the people went to the hillsides and bogs of Connaught, where their descendants are now living on land consisting of bog and mountain, which they have redeemed. There are in Ireland 250,000 small tenants who can hardly pay any rent at all; and it would be purely mockery to go to these men with this Bill. In order to remedy the state of things in the West of Ireland we require either emigration or migration. There are in Ireland 4,500,000 acres light grazing land occupied by graziers in farms of 1,000 or 2,000 acres. These lands, which were formerly in cultivation, are not suitable to be permanently laid down in pasture. They require to be broken up and cropped; and what I propose is that the tenants on the poor lands in the West of Ireland should be given an opportunity of migrating to those grazing lands. I believe the better settlement of the Land Question lies in giving the tenants of Ireland an opportunity of becoming the owners of the land. I wish to enable this to be done by the issue of debentures at 3½ per cent guaranteed by the State. I believe that after this year many landlords will be willing and anxious to sell their lands on easy terms. The present Bill will be of no use to more than a minority of Irish tenants who have an interest in the soil and are undoubtedly deserving, but who have not made the Land Question in Ireland what it now is. I think that the Government are entitled to have an op-

EARLDOM OF MAR.—RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY rose to move—

"That, in accordance with the Resolution agreed to by this House on the 14th June last, 'That it is incumbent upon this House to rescind their Order of 26th February 1875, which ran as follows, viz: "That at the future meetings of the Peers of Scotland assembled under any Royal Proclamation for the election of a Peer or Peers to represent the Peerage of Scotland in Parliament, the Lord Clerk Register, or the Clerks of Session officiating thereat in his name, do call the title of Earl of Mar according to its place on the Roll of Peers of Scotland called at such election, and do receive and count the vote of the Earl of Mar claiming to vote in right of the said earldom, and do permit him to take part in the proceedings of such election,"' this House resolve that the said Order be rescinded, and that intimation to that effect be made to the Lord Clerk Register of Scotland."

The noble Earl said, he was in a position in which he was, perhaps, entitled to claim their Lordships' sympathy, and he should ask their indulgence while he attempted to put before them the position in which the House was placed on the subject of his Resolution. Just a month ago, on the 1st of June, he gave Notice in that House that he intended to move two Resolutions with regard to the Mar Peerage. He did not wish to disguise the fact that he was very anxious to call the attention of the public to this question; and for the purpose of calling public attention to it he not only put a Notice upon the Paper, but in addition—having made the public declaration between 5 and a quarter past 5 o'clock in the usual manner—took measures to insure the Notice getting into the hands of the reporters. That Notice he had given for the 14th of the month, so that there would be ample opportunity for everybody to know that the question was coming on; and two days previous to bringing on the Resolution he took means to let every Member of their Lordships' House know that the subject was to be discussed—a means with which all their Lordships were familiar. Of course, he had no notion whatever as to the opinions of any noble Lord on the subject. He would not weary the House by reciting what the Resolutions were; but the particular one which was the subject of his Notice this evening was to the effect that in accordance with the Report of the Select Committee specially appointed to inquire into the matter three years ago—namely, in 1877—it was incumbent on the House to rescind the Order of February 26, 1875, and that an Order to that effect should be sent to the Lord Clerk Register of Scotland. At this time he had put to the Resolution six words, which he afterwards withdrew, and these were, "and the said Order is hereby rescinded." But, upon reading over his Notice, he had said to himself—"Now, it would be rather an affront to their Lordships to add these words; for if their Lordships agreed with me that it is incumbent on them to rescind the Order, they will, as a matter of course, carry that Resolution into effect;" and he need not add that it would have been perfectly easy for him, after the Resolution was carried, to have moved simply that the words he had left out be added. If he had done that he was sure the Motion for the addition would have been carried without a dissentient vote. However, a week passed, and a noble Friend of his opposite (the Marquess of Huntly), who had always taken a very deep interest in the question, in his place asked the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack what Order he had sent to the Lord Clerk Register in consequence of the Resolution agreed to by the House? He would remind their Lordships that on the 14th ultimo the debate lasted for over two hours. It was a very full debate; and upon going to a division the numbers were—Contents, 49; Not-Contents, 41—which was a majority of 8; but had it not been for the accident of one Peer going into the wrong Lobby the voting would have been 50 to 40, or a very substantial majority, and one which on most questions would be considered very decisive. A week after say what other more proper Order should be substituted for it, could not be imagined. If the noble Earl had ventured to propose some other Order, there would have been only a choice of two courses open to him. If he had proposed to change the place of the title of Mar which now stands upon the Union Roll, by moving it to a lower position on that Roll, he would have prejudiced any future claim by Mr. Goodeve Erskine, who might hereafter come forward to show that there were two Earldoms of Mar, and that the Earldom now on the Roll was in a position, not lower, at all events, than that in which the more ancient Earldom, claimed by him, ought to be. This was the very thing which the Earl of Mar and Kellie, by his Petition in 1877, had asked the House to do, and which the Committee, then appointed to consider that Petition, for that very reason advised the House not to do. If, on the contrary, he had taken the other alternative, he would, in the name of the House, without any new evidence whatever, and without any judicial grounds before the House, have prejudged the matter in the teeth of the decision arrived at in 1875, by placing on the Union Roll two Earldoms of Mar; for whatever else was doubtful, this was certain—that Lord Cairns (then Lord Chancellor), Lord Chelmsford (a former Chancellor), and the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees, grounded their decision on reasons absolutely inconsistent with the hypothesis of there being, at the date of the Decree of Ranking, two Earldoms of Mar. If they had not believed that the evidence then before them proved the extinction, and failed to prove the restoration, of the ancient Earldom of Mar, it would have been impossible for them to hold that a Mar Peerage was created in 1565. He did not say whether they were right or not. He (the Lord Chancellor) adhered to what he had said on a former occasion—namely, that, as far as the judgment of the House was concerned, it had decided only that, the Earl of Kellie was entitled to a Peerage created in 1565; and that, if anyone else could now prove his right to a Peerage of Mar of earlier date, it was open to him to come forward and claim it. Noble Lords who took an interest in this question, and more especially the noble Earl who spoke last but one (the Earl of Mansfield), asked them in a debate of that sort to proceed on the ground that injustice was done by their former decision. Their Lordships were asked extra-judicially, when probably not half-a-dozen of them had even attempted to read or consider the evidence, to decide against the deliberate judgment of Lord Cairns and the other two learned Lords, and to reverse a judicial decision of that House, on the ground that it was unjust. If anything in the world required to be done judicially, it would be such a reversal of a former Order, and the reasons avowed for such reversal formed the most cogent argument against the course proposed by the noble Earl. Noble Lords, who thought themselves qualified to sit in judgment on the decisions of that House, did not appear to have taken the trouble to inform themselves accurately on some even of the simplest elements of the case. The noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) had said he thought his Motion followed naturally from the Report of the Committee of 1877; but he (the Lord Chancellor) was astonished at that assertion. The Select Committee of 1877 were asked by Lord Kellie to put the title of Mar lower down on the Roll, and the Select Committee thought that the object of the request was, apparently, to prejudice the claim of Mr. Goodeve Erskine. They said, in effect—"If Mr. Erskine asserts his right to be Earl of Mar, let him claim to vote; let there be protests against his claim, and then the matter must come to this House to be determined." It was, therefore, adjudged that nothing should be done on Lord Kellie's Petition; but the noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) seemed to think the logical consequence of that decision was that the contrary course should be taken. The whole of the noble Earl's Motion was founded on the argument that it was impossible that the Peerage created in 1565 could be in the place on the Union Roll in which the Peerage of Mar was now found. That would be a very good argument if it were certain that all the Peerages were put on the Roll their proper order; but the Peerage of Mar was in a position on the Roll wholly inexplicable by any theory of that Peerage. The original Peerage was much older than 1404. It was dealt with in 1404 in a somewhat extraordinary manner by the Countess Isabel, the last of the ancient line who ever held the title

"Further consideration has led this House to consider that it would be inexpedient to rescind the Order of the 26th February 1875, which was made after the House had resolved and adjudged that Walter Henry Earl of Kellie Viscount Fenton Baron Erskine and Baron Dirleton in the Peerage of Scotland had made out his claim to the earldom of Mar in the Peerage of Scotland created in 1565, as consequential to such resolution and judgment, and that to rescind an Order so made in relation to a right to a Peerage adjudged after long investigation, and which Order has been acted upon at several elections of Scotch Peers, without any further inquiry and unsupported by any new evidence, would be contrary to the practice of this House and establish an objectionable and dangerous precedent."

The noble Earl said, that, after what had fallen from the noble Earl, it was necessary that he should explain why he had given Notice of his Amendment. He believed the question to be one of the deepest importance to the character of that House. They must remember that that House was the highest Court of Judicature in the Kingdom, and they must take the greatest care that nothing was done in regard to judicial questions which affected the character of the House or its power to give judgment on these matters. From the manner in which this question was handled, he thought many noble Lords had been influenced by wrong impressions. For instance, it had been very much the fashion to treat the Committee of Privileges as if it was not the House; whereas, in fact, it was a Committee of the Whole House. The House had always treated questions of Peerage in that way; and so remarkably careful had it always been to guard against miscarriage, that instead of requiring a quorum of only three, as at the ordinary Sittings of the House, it insisted, when in Committee upon Privilege, upon a quorum of seven. These questions of disputed Peerages were referred by the Sovereign to the House of Lords, as the highest Court of Judicature in the Kingdom, in order to obtain the opinion of that high Court; and when the question was decided by the House, notice was sent to the Queen of the decision come to, and that decision was final, and always acted on. He must ask their Lordships to consider what would be the effect if any Peer was, whenever he pleased, to get up and move that a judicial decision of the House be rescinded. The noble Earl now proposed the rescinding of a judicial Order; and the facts stated showed that it was necessary for the House to make such Order, as otherwise there would be nothing but confusion in the Scotch Peers' elections. Objection was taken that the name of the Earl of Mar on the Roll of Peers was not placed according to the date at which the House had determined the Peerage was granted. There were two ways in which the question as to the date must be considered by those who took this matter up. Nobody could doubt that the date on the Roll was not the proper place of the Peerage awarded by the House to Lord Kellie; but it was also not the date of the Peerage claimed by Mr. Goodeve Erskine. From what took place before the Commission of Ranking, it was quite evident that the Lord Mar of that day was very anxious to get the old Earldom conferred on him; and, with that object in view, he adduced before that Commission three important documents. One was the Charter of Isabel of 1404; the second was the Act of Parliament of 1585, ratifying the whole right and title made to John, Earl of Mar, of the comitators as heir by progress to Dame Isabel; and the other was an extract of the retours of 20th March, 1588, whereby John, Earl of Mar, was declared her lawful heir. Therefore, the Commission had before them all the particulars of his descent, and all the evidence he could produce of his claim as heir to Isabella; but they refused to give him the date of 1404. On the contrary, the date which they assigned to the Earldom of Mar was 1457, thereby altogether refusing to admit that the Charter of Isabel of 1404 had anything to do with the Earldom then before them. There was no evidence whatever, from anything that had taken place in the Parliament of Scotland, or, since the Union, in the House of Lords, of any person being recognized as possessed of the ancient Earldom, since the death of the last heir male in 1377, which had, therefore, been now extinct for 500 years. During the interval, the Crown created several Earls of Mar; and down to the time when Queen Mary made Lord Erskine Earl of Mar on the eve of her marriage, no member of the family of Erskine was Earl of Mar. These and various other circumstances connected with the case being brought before the Committee of Privileges, the Committee came to the decision that Lord Kellie had made out his claim to the Earldom of

Mar created by Queen Mary. Those persons who took up the case of the other claimant did not quite accurately state the facts. They seemed to conceive that because he got returned as heir, to his uncle he was entitled to his Peerage; whereas it did not really show he was heir to the Peerage unless he could prove that the Peerage went to heirs general. The Order which the House was now asked to rescind had been in existence for five years, and had been acted on in several Scotch elections. After so long an interval, on account of some personal feeling, noble Lords came before the House, and urged their Lordships to say that it was desirable to rescind that Order. ["No, no!"] Well, he asked, why was not the subject brought forward before? For five years the decision of the House had been unchallenged; and now that it was challenged, what was the object of it? He believed it was to prevent Lord Mar having any place to answer from when the Union Roll was called. If the Motion were carried, and the Earl of Mar and Kellie answered to the Peerage on the Roll, his vote would be objected to. Well, was the Earldom of Mar, then, to have no place on the Union Roll? A Circular had been sent round to their Lordships, calling on them to maintain the "integrity of the Scotch Peerage," and stating that it was being placed in danger. Who, he asked, was endangering the integrity of the Scotch Peerage? and how was it being endangered? In his opinion, it was an entire misconception to use such terms as those. He desired particularly to impress on their Lordships not to do anything which would in any way affect the judicial character of that House. There was no point on which they required to be more careful than on that. In this country the House of Lords was the Supreme Court of Appeal; and their Lordships should be careful not to allow the impression to go abroad that in a matter of a judicial character the House would be guided without consulting those capable of giving advice. The noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) seemed to think that any noble Lord was capable of giving advice on a judicial question. To carry his Motion would be, in effect, to establish a dangerous precedent. The noble Earl asked the House, without hearing further evidence, and without conference with anyone capable of giving a judicial opinion, to rescind a judicial Order of the House. This was contrary to the established practice of the House, and would, if it were agreed to, establish a precedent as dangerous as it was new.

Amendment moved,

To leave out all the words after "That" for the purpose of inserting the following words: "further consideration has led this House to consider that it would be inexpedient to rescind the Order of the 26th February 1876, which was made after the House had resolved and adjudged that Walter Henry Earl of Kellie Viscount Fenton Baron Erskine and Baron Dirleton in the Peerage of Scotland had made out his claim to the earldom of Mar in the Peerage of Scotland created in 1565, as consequential to such resolution and judgment, and that to rescind an Order so made in relation to a right to a Peerage adjudged after long investigation, and which Order has been acted upon at several elections of Scotch Peers, without any further inquiry and unsupported by any new evidence, would be contrary to the practice of this House and establish an objectionable and dangerous precedent."—(The Earl of Redesdale.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN observed, that when noble Lords commenced addressing the House on the Mar Peerage they invariably commenced by referring to one Earl and then drifting on to speak of all the personages mixed up in the vexed question of the Mar Peerage. He ventured to think that the House was not quite in Order. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Galloway) did not, when he entered into the question and introduced his Motion, deal with the merits of the case; but had rather confined himself to the question whether the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees (the Earl of Redesdale) was in Order in putting his Amendment on the Paper. When the noble Earl moved his Amendment he went into the merits of the question, and entirely avoided going into the question of Order. The noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) intended to raise a mere formal point of procedure. If the result of the debate on the 14th of June had been the opposite of what it had been, he (the Earl of Camperdown) had no hesitation in saying that the noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) would have received a severe and well-deserved castigation from the noble Earl at the Table, if he had re-opened the whole question on a formal and technical point or a point of Order. He did not even know if he could discuss the merits of the Amendment at the present stage of the debate. The first question for the House to decide was whether the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees was in Order in bringing forward his Motion?

LORD BLACKBURN said, he believed the Motion which the noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) had placed on the Paper would do harm rather than good to the integrity of the Scottish Peerage. The question, "Who was entitled to the ancient Earldom of Mar?" was one which could not be decided except by a tribunal competent to take evidence, and decide upon the evidence before it. The question was not who should be the heir, but who should be Earl of Mar. Lord Kellie petitioned the Crown that he should be Earl of Mar. His Petition was referred to that House; and everyone must have known that the question referred to them was one which could not be determined without evidence. The House, in the ordinary course, referred the Petition to a Committee of Privileges, which was the ordinary and Constitutional mode of dealing with such a Petition. During the seven years that the question was before the Committee, an enormous mass of documentary evidence had been collected. He would not now say what the effect of that evidence would be; but it was at least so considerable in bulk that probably no noble Lord had read it through. Judgment had been given by the legal Peers, and the then Lord Chancellor (Earl Cairns) expressed an opinion upon the point raised with great clearness. He (Lord Blackburn) could not now absolutely affirm that the noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) was wrong; but he could not say he was right. All he could at present venture to say was, that no man who had not read the evidence before the Committee of Privileges was competent to pass an opinion on the subject. The method now adopted was not the one by which the point could be satisfactorily decided. In a Court of Justice the practice always was to examine a man's title. Mr. Goodeve Erskine said he was the Earl of Mar. It was open to him to petition the Crown; the Petition would be sent down to the House, and the House would refer it to a Committee of Privileges. Against that the previous decision would be no bar. Let him not be misunderstood. When he said it would be no bar, he did not mean to say it would not be an important element. The Petitioner had to make out his case in every instance. In this he would not only have to persuade the Committee that he was right, but to make them say that the former decision was wrong. If this question had to be re-tried, let that be done in a proper manner. Let not their Lordships make a rush without evidence, and merely on the authority of antiquaries and persons who knew no law. Those who wanted the House to rescind the Order of the 26th of February, 1875, said they did not want to interfere with the judgment of the House. That was very much as if, in relation to the judgment of a Court of Law, persons said they did not want to interfere with it; but only wanted to prevent its execution, and to see that the Sheriff did not carry it into effect.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY wished that the noble and learned Lord (Lord Blackburn) had remained a little longer in his place the other evening, and had made himself more acquainted with the facts of the case. What they wanted to do was to put this Peerage upon the Roll. That had not yet been done; consequently, the Order of the House had not been carried out. He reminded the noble Earl at the Table (the Earl of Redesdale) that he quite misunderstood the reason why the question was allowed to slumber for five years after the Report of the Select Committee. The course which the affair took was as follows:—The Earl of Kellie came before the Committee of Privileges, and asked to be placed on the Union Roll as Earl of Mar, created in 1565; but the ancient Earl of Mar did not come as a claimant before this House at all. He merely protested against his Peerage being so put on the Roll. The Committee of Privileges went into the question, but they did not decide anything about the old Peerage; all they did was to allow the noble Earl (the Earl of Kellie) to have a Peerage of Mar of 1565. The House did not decide anything, either negatively or affirmatively, with regard to the ancient Earldom of Mar. At the last election at Holyrood, the Earl of Mar came forward to vote, and some noble Lords protested, and a "scene" followed. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Galloway) then came down, and moved that the Earldom as it stood should be brought down to the Roll of 1565. The Report of the Select Committee distinctly said that no Order was made with reference to the old Earldom, and distinctly affirmed that the old Earldom was still on the Roll. Let the noble Lord (the Earl of Mar and Kellie) put his Earldom on the Roll, and leave the old Earldom to take care of itself. He objected to the assertion that the Scotch Peers treated this question on personal grounds. The point to be decided was one involving more than personal interests for Scotch Peers—namely, what was the right place on the Union Roll for the Mar Peerage? The matter could not be left in its present position. He hoped their Lordships would not stultify themselves by insisting on the Resolution which had been carried the other day.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he was unable to understand what was the difficulty raised with regard to the point of Order. A few weeks ago the House came to the conclusion that it was incumbent on it to rescind a certain Order; but in order to carry that opinion into effect—as it was not binding—it was necessary that there should be a separate and new Motion to rescind. When the Motion was placed on the Paper, the noble Earl (the Earl of Redesdale) gave Notice of an Amendment. He did not see that the noble Earl could be accused of being out of Order in moving an Amendment to a new Motion brought before the House, consequent on the Resolution of the 14th of June. He did not intend to enter at any length into the merits of the question. Like most other Members of the Scotch Peerage, he thought the question one of great importance, apart from all personal considerations. He did not think that those who took the part of Mr. Goodeve Erskine acted from mere personal motives, for he believed that they desired to see the Scotch Peerage Roll made up properly for the honour of the Scotch Peerage. He could, to a certain extent, sympathize with those noble Lords. When the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees (the Earl of Redesdale) spoke of “personal motives,” he did not speak of personal motives in an unworthy sense; but he was bound to say, not having read the evidence before the Committee, that he was unable to give an opinion on a legal question which ought to be decided by a legal tribunal. He did not think it would redound to the honour of the Scotch Peerage to snatch a victory by a chance vote. On the contrary, he thought they should abstain from any hasty expression on so important a subject. For himself, he would be glad if Mr. Goodeve Erskine could secure his Scotch Peerage; but the proper course must be taken to that end. One of the subordinate questions raised was where his name should stand on the Roll at Holyrood. The noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) would know that that was a question which must be gone into with the fullest evidence and material for coming to a conclusion. For one, he (the Duke of Argyll) knew that his name occupied a position on the Roll which he ought not to do, and the same was the case with the noble Duke (the Duke of Sutherland). Noble Lords knew that those were not solitary instances, and if they were to go into that question it must be done in judicial form. If Mr. Goodeve Erskine wanted to keep his place he must issue a new Commission. This question should not be made a political or personal one; and he believed that on the 14th of June the House was hurried into giving a vote without having before it adequate information on the subject. He felt strongly the plea raised by the noble Earl (the Earl of Redesdale), to be zealous of the honour of the House when dealing with questions of a judicial character.

THE EARL OF MANSFIELD said, that the real reason why this question had been brought forward was that justice had not been done. He had looked into the decision of the Committee of Privileges, and he contended that it was contrary to justice in every way; and he could show from documents, legal and historical, that there was no proof that the date 1565 was correct for the Earl of Kellie's title of the Earl of Mar. He wished to ask how the Order of the Committee in the House was originally given out? He had heard that no Resolution of the House was come to, and that there was nothing recorded upon the Journals of the House. Although the House had not come to any decision with regard to the ancient Earldom of Mar, Mr. Goodeve Erskine, as the noble Duke who had just sat down called him, but, as he preferred to call him, the Earl of Mar, was placed in the position that he could not present himself at the election of Scotch Peers and insist on having his claim to vote admitted. If noble Lords would only look into the question and consider it, they would see the injustice of what had been done. He knew of no individual, however, who had not, after examination, adopted his view of the matter. In Edinburgh all the lawyers in Parliament House were of one opinion; and when it was said that the House was acting against the legal authorities, he would remind the House that the decision of the Committee was come to against the opinions of the Attorney General for England and the Solicitor General for Scotland. They wished to see the Earl of Mar placed in a position in which he could claim to vote for the Earldom of Mar; and at present he could not do that. In conclusion, he expressed his intention of supporting his noble Friend on his right.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, that the passing of the Resolution of the noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) would only add to the unseemly wrangles and scenes that had taken place, and would only increase the difficulties of the Lord Clerk Register. He pointed out that the proper course for Mr. Goodeve Erskine to pursue was to tender his vote before the Lord Clerk Register and raise his claim to the Earldom of Mar; then the proper number of Peers should protest against its being accepted; and then the question would be brought before the House of Lords for consideration. What would be the practical result if the Resolution of the noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) should be carried? Why, there would be more confusion than at present; and, so far as the Roll of 1705 and the Union Roll were concerned, they had no legal force at all. They were not authoritative documents to show the precedence of Scotch Peers. As a Resolution, if carried, would not put an end to the difficulties, it could have no good purpose whatever. It could not prevent the Earl of Kellie answering as Earl of Mar when the title was called over; therefore, he would again suggest that Mr. Goodeve Erskine should present himself at Holyrood; that a protest should be made to the reception of his vote; and that the rights and the wrongs of his case should be brought for decision before the House of Lords, and he would be glad if he could prove his claim to the title.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he might claim to speak impartially on this subject. In the first place, he was not a Scotch Peer, neither was he one of the Lords who took part in the hearing or the judgment of Lord Kellie's case. He was, in fact, disabled from doing so by the circumstance of his having been counsel for Mr. Goodeve Erskine as an opponent to Lord Kellie's claim. He had felt much interest in Mr. Erskine's claim, and wished very heartily for his success; and as far as his opinion when counsel went—which was not for a moment to be put in competition with that of the judicial tribunal—he had not formed an unfavourable opinion of Mr. Erskine's claim. He contended, therefore, that he was now able to offer impartial advice; and occupying the position he did, he felt it his duty to offer that advice, for it appeared to him that their Lordships had inadvertently become entangled in a dangerous position, which, if they did not extricate themselves from it, might be, in a high degree, detrimental to the character of their Lordships in one of their functions as to which it was essential they should be beyond censure or suspicion—he meant their judicial capacity. He could not agree with the noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) that the Motion he had now made could have been regarded as a matter of form, even if no opposition had been offered; because he himself ventured, on a former occasion, to which reference had been made, to point out that it would be impossible for the House simply to rescind the Resolution of the 26th February, 1875, without substituting something else for it. He had hoped that that intimation of his opinion would not be lost on the noble Earl if he came forward to make a Motion; but it was clear to him that the noble Earl was embarrassed by his own success, and that he did not know what other Order to substitute for that which he proposed to rescind. The noble Earl talked of the Amendment as being unprecedented; but anything more unprecedented or dangerous than, on a Motion like this, after a general debate to rescind a judicial Order, without venturing to say what other more proper Order should be substituted for it, could not be imagined. If the noble Earl had ventured to propose some other Order, there would have been only a choice of two courses open to him. If he had proposed to change the place of the title of Mar which now stands upon the Union Roll, by moving it to a lower position on that Roll, he would have prejudiced any future claim by Mr. Goodeve Erskine, who might hereafter come forward to show that there were two Earldoms of Mar, and that the Earldom now on the Roll was in a position, not lower, at all events, than that in which the more ancient Earldom, claimed by him, ought to be. This was the very thing which the Earl of Mar and Kellie, by his Petition in 1877, had asked the House to do, and which the Committee, then appointed to consider that Petition, for that very reason advised the House not to do. If, on the contrary, he had taken the other alternative, he would, in the name of the House, without any new evidence whatever, and without any judicial grounds before the House, have prejudged the matter in the teeth of the decision arrived at in 1875, by placing on the Union Roll two Earldoms of Mar; for whatever else was doubtful, this was certain—that Lord Cairns (then Lord Chancellor), Lord Chelmsford (a former Chancellor), and the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees, grounded their decision on reasons absolutely inconsistent with the hypothesis of there being, at the date of the Decree of Ranking, two Earldoms of Mar. If they had not believed that the evidence then before them proved the extinction, and failed to prove the restoration, of the ancient Earldom of Mar, it would have been impossible for them to hold that a Mar Peerage was created in 1565. He did not say whether they were right or not. He (the Lord Chancellor) adhered to what he had said on a former occasion—namely, that, as far as the judgment of the House was concerned, it had decided only that, the Earl of Kellie was entitled to a Peerage created in 1565; and that, if anyone else could now prove his right to a Peerage of Mar of earlier date, it was open to him to come forward and claim it. Noble Lords who took an interest in this question, and more especially the noble Earl who spoke last but one (the Earl of Mansfield), asked them in a debate of that sort to proceed on the ground that injustice was done by their former decision. Their Lordships were asked extra-judicially, when probably not half-a-dozen of them had even attempted to read or consider the evidence, to decide against the deliberate judgment of Lord Cairns and the other two learned Lords, and to reverse a judicial decision of that House, on the ground that it was unjust. If anything in the world required to be done judicially, it would be such a reversal of a former Order, and the reasons avowed for such reversal formed the most cogent argument against the course proposed by the noble Earl. Noble Lords, who thought themselves qualified to sit in judgment on the decisions of that House, did not appear to have taken the trouble to inform themselves accurately on some even of the simplest elements of the case. The noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) had said he thought his Motion followed naturally from the Report of the Committee of 1877; but he (the Lord Chancellor) was astonished at that assertion. The Select Committee of 1877 were asked by Lord Kellie to put the title of Mar lower down on the Roll, and the Select Committee thought that the object of the request was, apparently, to prejudice the claim of Mr. Goodeve Erskine. They said, in effect—"If Mr. Erskine asserts his right to be Earl of Mar, let him claim to vote; let there be protests against his claim, and then the matter must come to this House to be determined." It was, therefore, adjudged that nothing should be done on Lord Kellie's Petition; but the noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) seemed to think the logical consequence of that decision was that the contrary course should be taken. The whole of the noble Earl's Motion was founded on the argument that it was impossible that the Peerage created in 1565 could be in the place on the Union Roll in which the Peerage of Mar was now found. That would be a very good argument if it were certain that all the Peerages were put on the Roll their proper order; but the Peerage of Mar was in a position on the Roll wholly inexplicable by any theory of that Peerage. The original Peerage was much older than 1404. It was dealt with in 1404 in a somewhat extraordinary manner by the Countess Isabel, the last of the ancient line who ever held the title before 1565; and the evidences produced before King James the First's Commission of Ranking, on whose Decreet the Union Roll was founded, carried it back to 1404, and not earlier. But it was placed, by the Decreet of Ranking, and upon the Union Roll, next below the Earldom of Errol, which was not created till above half a century after 1404. If the Union Roll ought to be corrected, and if that could not be done by an application to the Court of Session, it ought to be done in a manner quite different from that proposed by the noble Earl. The Queen was the fountain of honour; and if there were errors in the Decreet of Ranking, which was made in 1606 under Royal authority, let there be a Petition presented to the Crown to have those errors corrected, and possibly the Crown might be advised to issue a Commission of Review, or might, if it were thought fit, refer any particular question of precedence for the determination of this House. If, under such a reference or otherwise, the House should ever have any duty to discharge in the matter, it must proceed in a more judicial manner than that recommended by the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY, who rose amid cries of "Divide!" reminded their Lordships that he had reserved his remarks on the merits of the case, and that, therefore, he was entitled to be heard. The judgment of the Committee to which the Lord Chancellor and another noble and learned Lord, who had quoted the words of the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) upon the occasion, referred was given five years ago, and he believed that opinions on that subject had altered very much since then. He would like to recall what the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) said in the debate last year—namely—

"That the Peerage on the Roll which is called the Mar Peerage is not the Peerage which has been attached in this House to the Earl of Mar and Kellie; and, therefore, the Earl of Mar and Kellie should not be allowed to answer that call."—[3 Hansard, ccxlviii. 137.]

He considered that that confirmed his argument, that the Order was not consequential upon the judgment of the Committee of Privileges, as suggested in the Amendment of the Chairman of Committees.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR observed, that when the noble Earl quoted that same passage from the noble and learned Earl's (Earl Cairns') speech on the 14th of June, the noble and learned Earl himself, after hearing the quotation, told him (the Lord Chancellor) that his words must have been incorrectly reported.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY replied, that although the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) was sitting below him when he read the quotation, he did not offer to challenge its accuracy. It was rather late in the day for them to be told now, in the noble and learned Earl's absence, that the report was not correct. Replying to some of the noble Earl's (the Earl of Redesdale's) criticisms, the noble Earl observed that Her Majesty the Queen had now been upon the Throne over 40 years. Supposing Her Majesty, having created a Peerage in the year 1840, had now appointed Ranking Commissioners to see that each Peer was put according to his proper precedence upon the Roll of Peers; and supposing that a Peer created by Her Majesty in 1840 came before those Commissioners in 1880, and claimed to be put on the Roll for the year 1730—would he have a chance of succeeding in such a claim? ["No!"] Well, this was exactly a similar case. It was exactly 40 years after 1565—namely, in 1605—that the Mar Peerage of 1565 was put upon the Decreet of Ranking. It was upon the authoritative documents he produced that he was put upon the Union Roll. ["Divide!"] He knew their Lordships were weary of this discussion; but he must say a word in reply to what fell from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. It was not for him (the Earl of Galloway) to say what new Order should be substituted for the Order he proposed to rescind. All that he said was that the latter was at variance with the judgment of the Committee of Privileges; and he simply asked their Lordships to support and give effect to the Report of the Committee of Privileges. It had been said that it was open to the owner of the title of the ancient Earldom to go to Holyrood to vote, and thus have the validity of his vote tested. Well, the holder of this ancient Earldom did go to Holyrood; but what happened? The Lord Clerk Register declined to accept his vote, or to allow him to take part in the proceedings, threw his voting list on the floor, and told him he was a Peer of his own creation. Therefore, this course which he now proposed was the only possible way of getting over the difficulty, and paving the way for a decision. If they removed the barrier offered by that Resolution, then they would give the claimant of the title the opportunity of doing that which noble Lords said he could do already, but which he had shown himself to have been a witness of his not having been allowed to do. He hoped their Lordships would not be carried away entirely by the opinions of noble and learned Lords. He asked them, remembering what had been the practical result hitherto, to support his Resolution, in order that an end might be put to this continual confusion.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON wished to confirm the statement of the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor, that his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns) denied the accuracy of that part of the report of his speech in Hansard which the noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway) had quoted. In proof of that, he would quote another passage inconsistent with it—namely—

“Now, the Roll of the Peers of Scotland is a public document, and in that Roll there is only one entry of the Earl of Mar. It may be in its right or wrong place—I cannot say anything about that—it is there, and it is to that that this Resolution must have necessarily referred.” —[Ibid. 138.]

For himself, he thought their Lordships on the present occasion would do well to follow the advice given on that question by the late Lord Chancellor, by the present Lord Chancellor, and also by the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees.

On Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 52; Not-Contents 80; Majority 28.

THE PRISONS ACT, 1875 — MAGISTRATES' SENTENCES—THE CASE OF CATHERINE CONNOLY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether the report in the daily journals of the 26th of June respecting a sentence passed on Catherine Connoly by Mr. Barstow was correct?

THE EARL OF FIFE, in reply, said, he thought it was only right that he should state that the offence with which this woman was charged was one of a serious nature against prison discipline—namely, conveying tobacco into a prison. When she was charged she made no defence, nor did she state that she was the wife of the prisoner to whom she brought the tobacco; but merely stated that she had been persuaded by a man to put it into the cake she brought. It must be pointed out that even a wife could not be allowed to break the law of prison discipline with impunity, and that if such an idea were to prevail it would be necessary to forbid the visits of wives to husbands in prison, and thus the innocent would suffer for the guilty. Under the circumstances of the case, and considering especially that the husband was already in prison, and that the home would be rendered altogether destitute, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with the entire concurrence of the magistrate who tried the case, had ordered the remission of the remaining portion of the sentence. The woman was accordingly liberated yesterday.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Lord Justice Coleridge and Mr. Justice Grove, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Report relating to the Elections for

The Borough of Nottingham,
The Borough of Leominster;
The Borough of Bury St. Edmunds;
The Borough of Wilton; and
The Borough of Horsham:

From Mr. Baron Fitzgerald and Mr. Justice Barry, two of the Judges selected in pursuance of the same Act, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for

The County of Down:

And from Mr. Justice Denman and Mr. Justice Lopes, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of the same Act, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for The Borough of Bewdley.

BOROUGH OF NOTTINGHAM ELECTION, &c.

Court of Common Pleas, Westminster.

28th June 1880.

Sir,

We have the honour to report to you that the Petitions against the Returns of Members for the following places have been withdrawn by leave of the Court.

The Borough of Nottingham;
The Borough of Leominster;
The Borough of Bury St. Edmunds;
The Borough of Wilton; and
The Borough of Horsham.

We have also to report that, in our opinion, the withdrawal of none of these Petitions was the result of any corrupt arrangement or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other Petition.

With reference to the withdrawal of the Nottingham Petition, the Lord Chief Justice received through the Post the letter which he incloses to you herewith. We express no opinion whatever upon the value or worthlessness of the communication, but, inasmuch as it is not anonymous, and refers to an Election Petition, we have thought it proper to transmit it to you. The allegations made in it were denied on oath by the Petitioners and the Petitioners' Agents; and we see no reason to doubt the truth of their assertions. The Respondent made no statement or affidavit and desired his Petition to proceed; but, as we saw no reason to believe the Petitioners to be in any default, or to be in any way connected with the letter or the statements in it, we did not accede to this desire and allowed the Petition to be withdrawn.

We are, Sir,

Your obedient humble servants,

COLERIDGE,

Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

W. R. GROVE,

Judge of the Common Pleas.

The Right Honble.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

Nottingham,

June 22nd, 1880.

To Lord Justice Coleridge.

My Lord,

I hope you will pardon me troubling you but having seen an announcement in the Nottingham papers of an application to withdraw the Nottingham Petition, I thought it only my duty to inform your Lordship of a report that is gaining currency in the town, namely, that the Liberals have agreed to pay over a sum of $10,000 on condition that the Petition is unconditionally withdrawn.

I may add that the application to withdraw the Petition has given great dissatisfaction to a many, as bribery is supposed to have prevailed to an alarming extent. Hoping your Lordship will not think me presumptuous in thus writing to you.

I remain,

My Lord,

Your humble Servant,

JAMES NORMAN.

Lord Justice Coleridge.

COUNTY OF DOWN ELECTION.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, and The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1879.

Election for the County of Down, holden on the 7th day of April 1880.

Blakely McCartney, Petitioner; Charles Stewart Vane Tempest, commonly called Lord Viscount Castlereagh, Respondent.

The matter of the Petition above-mentioned was heard before us, Francis Alexander FitzGerald, one of the Barons of the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland, and Charles Robert Barry, one of the Justices of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland, being two of the Judges for the time being on the rota for the trial of Election Petitions in Ireland, at Downpatrick, on the 17th, 18th, 19th, 21st, 22nd, 23rd, 24th, 25th, 26th, 28th, and 29th days of June 1880, and at the conclusion of the trial on the last-mentioned day we differed, and do hereby certify to the Right Honorable The Speaker of the House of Commons that we so differed, as to whether the said Charles Stewart Vane Tempest, commonly called Lord Viscount Castlereagh, was duly elected and returned as a Member to serve in Parliament for the County of Down at the Election to which the Petition relates, and that I, the said Francis Alexander FitzGerald, was and am of opinion that the said Viscount Castlereagh was duly elected and returned, and that I, the said Charles Robert Barry, was and am of opinion that the said Viscount Castlereagh was not duly elected.

We further certify that I, the said Francis Alexander FitzGerald, was and am of opinion that the corrupt practice of undue influence was not proved to have been committed at such Election by the said Viscount Castlereagh, or with his knowledge and consent, or on his behalf, and that I, the said Charles Robert Barry, was and am of opinion that the corrupt practice of undue influence was proved to have been committed at such Election on behalf of the said Viscount Castlereagh, but not by him or with his knowledge or consent.

Further we report that, save as aforesaid, no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed at such Election by or with the consent or knowledge of any of the candidates at said Election.

Further we report that we have no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the Election to which this Petition relates.

Dated this 30th day of June 1880.

F. A. FITZGERALD,

Baron of the Exchequer Division of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice in Ireland.

CHARLES R. BARRY,

Justice of the Queen's Bench Division of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice in Ireland.

BEWDLEY ELECTION.

Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

To The Right Honble.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

We, the Honble. George Denman, and Sir Henry Lopes, kt., Judges for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Act, certify,—

That upon the 23rd day of June and following days we held a Court at Bewdley for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the Borough of Bewdley, between William Francis Spencer and John Blundell, Petitioners; and Charles Harrison, Respondent.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, we certify that we determined that the said Respondent was not duly elected and returned, and that the said Election is void.

And we hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

And whereas charges were made in the said Petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Act, report in writing to you as follows:—

1. That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge of any Candidate at the said Election.

2. That the following persons were proved at the said trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices at the said Election: viz. Thomas Nellist and Frederick Cole, of bribery.

3. That we have no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the said Election to which the said Petition relates.

GEORGE DENMAN.
HENRY C. LOPES.

York,

30 June, 1880.

And the said Certificates and Reports were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL —THE WINE DUTIES.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD gave Notice that to-morrow he would ask the Prime Minister, Whether, considering the uncertainty which prevails in regard to the French Commercial Treaty, he proposes to omit from the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill the provisions bearing upon the Wine Duties; and whether, in the event of proposing changes, he will announce them at the earliest moment, so as to terminate the state of uncertainty that is now affecting the interest of the wine trade?

MR. GLADSTONE: Perhaps it will be convenient that I should say now what I should have to say at a later period. I propose on a future day—on Monday—to re-commit the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill pro forma. I shall then name a day for its re-consideration; and in the new Bill I do not propose to include the provisions relating to the Wine Duties, being aware of the great inconvenience which would result

Further, if the alleged intention to drop the Bill was unauthorized, on what day it might be expected that the debate on the second reading would be resumed?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I may as well answer that Question at once. The Government have no intention of abandoning the Bill; but it is not entirely in their power as yet to fix a day for the resumption of the debate on the second reading.

HOUSE OF PARLIAMENT—THE ELECTRIC LIGHT.

MR. D. GRANT asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he will take into his consideration the advisability of substituting the electric light for the purpose of illuminating the House in place of the gas as now used in the roof?

MR. ADAM: The question of lighting the House and approaches by the electric light has received, and is receiving, careful consideration. I will take care that it continues to receive full attention; but I am not prepared at present to recommend any definite course of action on so important a question, involving much change and alteration of existing arrangements, and which ought not to be finally adopted without going through the test of careful experiment.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND)— NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MR. VILLIERS STUART asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he would explain to the House under what circumstances and for what reason a retiring gratuity was last to establish a convict establishment at Galway in place of the establishment at Spike Island?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he understood the late Government did not make a distinct pledge on the subject, but only intimated that it would receive favourable consideration. When the Government came into Office they found the subject was still under consideration. As the present Government were not responsible for anything done by the late Government, they did not feel bound by the opinions of the late Government; and, besides that, it must be remembered that the subject of the question was only a part of the whole matter of prisons. All he could say was that when the question came to be considered, the claims of Galway would receive very careful attention.

THE FINANCE ACCOUNTS—ANALYZED ACCOUNTS.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, When the Finance Accounts for the year 1879-80 will be presented; when the Analysed Account of Public Income and Expenditure for the year 1879-80 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 376, of Session 1879), ordered by the House, will be presented; and, whether he would direct that this Analysed Statement be incorporated in the volume of Finance Accounts?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The Treasury expect to be in a position to present the Finance Accounts in about a fortnight. The Analyzed Account to which the Question refers will be ready about the same time; and, being presented to Parliament in a separate form, there seems to be no reason for printing it over again in the Finance Accounts.

FRENCH MERCANTILE MARINE.

DR. CAMERON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he would lay upon the Table, with as little delay as possible, a translation of the "Projet de loi sur la Marine Marchande," at present being promoted by the French Government?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Bill in question is now under discussion in the Chamber of Deputies, and alterations are frequently made in it. As soon as it is finally passed by the Chamber it shall be laid on the Table of the House, even without waiting for its going to the Senate.

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE GREEK FRONTIER.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the Plenipotentiaries now assembled in Conference have arrived at a unanimous agreement with reference to a line for the rectification of the Turko-Greek frontier?

MR. BOURKE asked, Whether the Papers relating to the Berlin Conference can now be laid before Parliament?

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON asked, Whether, as the Conference now sitting at Berlin has agreed, with reference to the Greco-Turkish frontier question in connection with the Treaty of Berlin, as to the boundary line which should be adopted by both Countries, the hon. Gentleman can state whether all the Powers are prepared to use their united influence on both Governments to bring to a successful issue their decision?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In answer to the hon. Member for Salford and the hon. Member for the City of London, I have to state that the Plenipotentiaries of the Powers in Conference at Berlin have arrived at a unanimous conclusion with regard to the line of Frontier between Greece and Turkey for submission to their respective Governments. But no final decision has yet been come to by the Powers as to the steps to be taken in order to bring the conclusions of the Conference to the notice of the Turkish and Greek Governments. With regard to the Question of the right hon. Member for King's Lynn, I fear that it would be quite impossible to lay the Correspondence before the House at the present stage of the proceedings. Negotiations are still going on with regard to some subsidiary questions, and we have not yet received the full and final Reports of the Conference.

In reply to Lord JOHN MANNERS,

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would see whether the Austrian Staff Map, showing the boundaries, could not be laid on the Table of the Library.

And whereas charges were made in the said Petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Act, report in writing to you as follows:—

1. That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge of any Candidate at the said Election.

2. That the following persons were proved at the said trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices at the said Election: viz. Thomas Nellist and Frederick Cole, of bribery.

3. That we have no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the said Election to which the said Petition relates.

GEORGE DENMAN.
HENRY C. LOPES.

York,

And the said Certificates and Reports were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

QUESTIONS.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL —THE WINE DUTIES.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD gave Notice that to-morrow he would ask the Prime Minister, Whether, considering the uncertainty which prevails in regard to the French Commercial Treaty, he proposes to omit from the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill the provisions bearing upon the Wine Duties; and whether, in the event of proposing changes, he will announce them at the earliest moment, so as to terminate the state of uncertainty that is now affecting the interest of the wine trade?

MR. GLADSTONE: Perhaps it will be convenient that I should say now what I should have to say at a later period. I propose on a future day—on Monday—to re-commit the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill pro forma. I shall then name a day for its re-consideration; and in the new Bill I do not propose to include the provisions relating to the Wine Duties, being aware of the great inconvenience which would result from prolonged uncertainty.

HARES AND RABBITS BILL.

MR. J. HOWARD gave Notice that to-morrow he would ask the Home Secretary, Whether there is any foundation for the statement in The Mark Lane Express of this week—

“We learn upon authority—which we fear is too good to be doubted—that it is the intention of the Government to drop the Hares and Rabbits Bill for this Session.”

Further, if the alleged intention to drop the Bill was unauthorized, on what day it might be expected that the debate on the second reading would be resumed?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I may as well answer that Question at once. The Government have no intention of abandoning the Bill; but it is not entirely in their power as yet to fix a day for the resumption of the debate on the second reading.

HOUSE OF PARLIAMENT—THE ELECTRIC LIGHT.

MR. D. GRANT asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he will take into his consideration the advisability of substituting the electric light for the purpose of illuminating the House in place of the gas as now used in the roof?

MR. ADAM: The question of lighting the House and approaches by the electric light has received, and is receiving, careful consideration. I will take care that it continues to receive full attention; but I am not prepared at present to recommend any definite course of action on so important a question, involving much change and alteration of existing arrangements, and which ought not to be finally adopted without going through the test of careful experiment.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND)— NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MR. VILLIERS STUART asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he would explain to the House under what circumstances and for what reason a retiring gratuity was last year refused by the Commissioners of National Education to Mr. John Coleman, National School teacher, of Knockanore, in the county of Waterford, who, after twenty-five years of efficient service and blameless life and conduct, has been compelled to retire through loss of eyesight, and is now left destitute in his old age, and with no resource but the poorhouse; and, whether an annual sum is not voted by Parliament to meet such cases?

to be given as retiring gratuities to meritorious National School teachers. I am sorry to say that in regard to the case of Coleman it is not correct to say that he had passed 25 years of efficient service and blameless life and conduct. In 1866 serious charges were brought against him, one of them being that he had been convicted of drunkenness in the town of Youghal. The Commissioners were able to go into the application for these annuities in his case, and they found he had been also fined in 1873 for falsifying the ages of his pupils, and that in 1877 10 per cent had been deducted from his results fees. I would ask my hon. Friend and other hon. Gentlemen interested in individual cases whether it would not be better to come to me in the first instance, and if they are not satisfied with my answer they can give Notice of any Question. At present it not only takes up the time of the House, but it leads to statements about individuals which might otherwise be avoided.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND)—ASSISTANT TEACHERS.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention had been called to the Resolution of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, forwarded to the Commissioners of National Education last December, condemnatory of the recent action of the Board in requiring an average attendance of seventy instead of fifty scholars to secure the payment for the services of an assistant teacher in national schools; whether the Right honourable Gentleman, in view of this Resolution from so influential a body, will direct the Education Board to modify the Rule; whether the work of teaching in national schools, owing to the system of payment by results, is not greater than it was in 1863; and, whether it is true that half the inspecting staff, during the years the results system has been in operation, have left the service through infirmity, or have died?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have seen, Sir, the Resolution of the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops with regard to the question referred to by the hon. Gentleman, and I have also seen a Memorandum from the Commissioners of National Education, stating the grounds on which they do not agree with that Resolution. It would not be fitting for me, or anyone appointed to a responsible office, to decide upon the Resolution without full inquiry into the matter. Payment for results has increased the salaries of teachers. I do not think that the labour of conscientious hard-working teachers is greatly increased owing to payment for results, though, no doubt, the additional payments will stimulate those who were apathetic before. It is not correct to say that half the inspecting staff have left the service through infirmity, or have died since the system of payment for results had come into operation. The number of inspectors is 98, and the total number of vacancies from all causes is 26, or little more than one-fourth, in the eight years.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)—EXECUTION CREDITORS.

MR. PARNELL asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the cases of Garde v. Dunlea, and Garde v. Baylor, in the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice, Ireland; whether verdicts for £500 were given by direction of the Judge against both defendants at the last Clonmel Assizes; whether a new trial has now been refused Mr. Baylor; whether the cases arose because the defendants, who are merchants of Fermoy, county Cork, executed decrees for amounts under £14 and £6 for debts justly due to them by a tenant of plaintiff's, and thus, as was held, rendered themselves each liable for the full amount of a year's rent (£500), owed by this tenant to Mr. Garde, his landlord; if the Government intend to take steps to remedy the present state of the Law in Ireland, under which it appears possible for landlords, whose tenants are in arrear, to recover these arrears from any other creditors of the tenant who may attempt legally to enforce their claims; and, whether, as a verdict for the amount of the year's rent due to Mr. Garde in the cases under notice, £500 was returned against both Mr. Baylor and Mr. Dunlea, the landlord will be entitled to obtain the £500 from each separately, and afterwards to recover the same sum from his tenant?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): In answer to the Question of the hon. Member, I may say my attention has been directed to the cases referred to, and the facts are substantially as stated by him. The actions were brought by the landlord under the authority of a statute passed in the reign of Queen Anne, by which a tenant's goods are exempt from execution unless the execution creditors undertake to pay the rent due to the landlord not exceeding one year's rent. The question whether the liability was for the entire year's rent, or only the value of goods seized, was now the subject of an appeal from the judgment of the Exchequer Division. As to the question whether the Government will take steps to remedy the present state of the law in Ireland, I am not prepared to say they will do so. The law in England and in Ireland is in this respect identical; and, no doubt, it is one of those matters which may have to be considered in dealing with the Land Question. As to the final portion of the Question, whether the landlord can recover the full year's rent from each of the creditors, and afterwards from the tenant also, I venture to think he must be content with something less than three times his rent.

MADAGASCAR—TREATY OF 1865.

MR. T. FRY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will lay upon the Table a Copy of such proposals as may have been made by the Government of the Queen of Madagascar for the revision of the Treaty of 1865, with any Correspondence that may have taken place thereon?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Correspondence is still going on with regard to the proposals, and it would not be convenient to lay the Papers before the House in their present shape.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS — PLYMOUTH ELECTION PETITION.

MR. PULESTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the following remarks of the learned Judge in the judgment given in the case of the Plymouth Election Petition, viz.:—

"I have never unseated an innocent Member for the Acts of his agent without feeling that the law which so punishes both of the Member and the constituency for the single act of an agent is unduly severe;"

and, whether he will take the matter into consideration before the introduction of a new Ballot Act?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: My attention has not been called to the judgment of the learned Judge except by the Question of the hon. Member; but, assuming that his words are correctly stated, I must express my entire dissent from the view of the learned Judge. I believe every man in this House to be innocent; but I cannot think it would be safe to hold that a Member, or a candidate, should not be responsible for the action of his agent. It is perfectly plain that an agent by a single act might corrupt a whole constituency; and, therefore, I cannot promise that in a new Ballot Act I will propose to repeal the old law by which the responsibility is thrown upon a Member or a candidate.

TRAINING SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to reduce the charge applicable for the present Government Training Schools, which do not enjoy the confidence of the Catholic, with a view to taking on the charge for those schools, which are acceptable to them, and are now in efficient operation?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, this whole question of training schools, and of the money allowed by the State for them, is one which requires very close attention, and it shall have it. With regard to the Marlborough Street model schools, I do not think that the charge for them can be reduced without materially diminishing their efficiency, and I believe they do much good. As to model schools generally, I do not think any Government ought to be called upon to give an opinion without full consideration.

COLONY OF VICTORIA—THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

MR. COURTNEY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that the Victorian Assembly, elected early in March last, has thrown out the Reform Bill brought in by the Ministry called to power upon the election of that assembly; and, whether the Ministry have recommended another dissolution to the Governor; and, if so, whether the Governor has resolved to act upon that recommendation?

MR. GRANT DUFF: Yes, Sir; these statements are perfectly correct.

BURMAH.

MR. BRYCE asked the Secretary of State for India, What is the present state of diplomatic relations between the Government of India and the King of Burmah; and, whether, having regard to the conciliatory disposition evinced for some months past by the King of Burmah, Her Majesty's Government will consider the propriety of directing the British Envoy to return to Mandalay?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, in consequence of the attitude of the Government of Burmah towards the British Resident at Mandalay and other causes, the relations of the Indian Government to the Government of Burmah last year were extremely strained. On the death of Mr. Shaw in June 1879, Colonel Harold Browne was immediately despatched to succeed him; but, in consequence of the difficulties of his position, that gentleman was recalled, and an Assistant Resident left at the capital to transact current business. The latter found his position at Mandalay so precarious, that it was impossible for him to remain any longer without danger to his own life and that of his assistants; and, consequently, in October 1879, the British Mission was withdrawn. In consequence of certain riotous assaults since that period in Upper Burmah on British flotilla steamers, demands for redress had been addressed to the Government of Burmah; but the result was not yet known. The Indian Government would consider the propriety of appointing a British Resident as soon as certain stipulations which it was considered right and necessary to insist upon with regard to the treatment of the Mission should be accepted. A special Mission had been sent by the King of Burmah to the Frontier; but, although it was said to have full powers, it appeared that the Envoy had not been definitely instructed by the King to assent to the preliminary conditions which the Indian Government considered indispensable to the re-establishment of a British Mission at Mandalay. The whole question of our relations with Burmah was now under the consideration of the Government of India; and, no doubt, the Viceroy would be greatly assisted by the advice of the Chief Commissioner of British Burmah, who had lately been appointed a provisional member of the Council of the Governor General.

THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT—DECORATION OF THE CENTRAL HALL.

MR. SCHREIBER asked the First Commissioner of Works, When he intends to complete the mural decoration of the central hall of the Houses; whether he is in possession of designs for the three vacant panels; and, at what cost each panel can be filled in with Mosaics?

MR. ADAM: The question as to the best mode of filling in the vacant panels in the Central Hall has given rise to much discussion, and was very fully inquired into in 1870 and 1871; but no definite conclusion was arrived at. I am of opinion that the vacant spaces should be filled up; but I am unable, without further consideration, to state when this can be done. No designs exist for the vacant panels. The cost of the panel already filled in was about £675; but I am unable at present to say what will be the cost of filling in the vacant panels.

INDIA—CORPORAL PUNISHMENT IN INDIAN GAOLS.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, considering the contemplated abolition of flogging in Her Majesty's Naval and Military Services, the Government will take any and what measures to abolish punishment by the lash or bamboo amongst Her Majesty's Indian subjects?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In answer to the Question the hon. and learned Member gave Notice of the other day, and which does not appear on the Paper, I may state that I have made inquiries, and find that corporal punishments in India are inflicted under different regulations from those which have been hitherto in force in regard to the Army and Navy. As far as I am able to ascertain, the punishment is usually inflicted, not with a "cat-o'-nine-tails," but with a light cane; certainly in all cases of juvenile offenders that is so, and even when the punishment is inflicted on adults it is of a mild description. So much in answer to the general question of the hon. and learned Member. I may say that the experiment of discontinuing the punishment was tried on several occasions, both partially and in the whole of India. From 1862 to 1864 the punishment was not inflicted. During that time complaints were made by all the Local Governments of the difficulty experienced in the interval. It has not been, therefore, continued or adopted by the Government of India without full consideration. Among the considerations which have rendered it necessary was the difficulty of inflicting any suitable punishment in a tropical climate. Imprisonment and solitary or separate confinement were to be avoided as far as possible, owing to the mortality which occurred being very high in crowded gaols, among prisoners who had been accustomed to spend almost their whole lives in the open air. It would be impossible to take any hasty or precipitate step in this matter. All I can undertake to do is to call for full Reports from the Government of India and the local Governments as to the circumstances in which the punishment is inflicted, and the necessity that now exists for maintaining it. I will further ask them for any suggestions they may have to make as to its modification or possible discontinuance.

FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—ARKLOW HARBOUR.

MR. M'COAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, To say, having regard to the admission contained in the Preamble to a Bill introduced by the late Government in 1876 for the improvement of Arklow Harbour, that said harbour was an important station and place of refuge for vessels employed in prosecuting the sea fisheries on the east coast of Ireland, and should be deepened, extended, and otherwise improved, and also having regard to the opinion expressed by his Grace the Duke of Marlborough when, as Lord Lieutenant, he visited Arklow in November 1878—"That the improvement of Arklow Harbour would be a work of national importance as well as local benefit," whether prompt measures will be taken by the Government to acquire, by arbitration or otherwise, possession of the harbour from its present proprietors, in order that works of improvement of such admitted public importance may be proceeded with without further delay?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: As the hon. Member is probably aware, the Bill introduced by the late Government for the improvement of Arklow Harbour contemplated the transfer of the harbour to the Board of Works for improvement, at an estimated cost of £26,000, one-half to be a free grant and the other half to be advanced by way of loan on certain specified security; and that, on the completion of the works, the harbour should be handed over to a body of local Commissioners. The Bill was ultimately withdrawn, in consequence of certain conditions demanded by the Wicklow Copper Mining Company, who are the owners of the harbour, with which the Government were unable to comply. The Company made a fresh proposal last year, to which also the Government were not able to agree. The effect of this proposal was that, while retaining the harbour as their own property, the Company should obtain the grant which it had been proposed, under the Bill of 1876, to make on the condition of the harbour being constituted public property and vested in local Commissioners. The Government would be ready to consider any proposals for an agreement, whether by arbitration or otherwise, which may be brought before them, if they are such as could be fairly entertained; but they are not prepared to take the initiative in the matter.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION — BOARD SCHOOLS—CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

SIR CHARLES REED asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Jeffry v. Taylor, decided at the Southwark Police Court on Wednesday June 16th, in which a head teacher was fined for inflicting corporal punishment in school hours; and, whether, under the circumstances, he is prepared to advise that the conviction be quashed, and to state the law with reference to the infliction of corporal punishment in schools?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: As to the state of the law generally, I imagine that in schools the schoolmaster is justified in inflicting a reasonable amount of corporal punishment; but it is for the magistrate, on a complaint being made by a parent, to determine whether that punishment is reasonable or not. That is generally the state of the law on the subject. I have inquired into this particular case; and it appears that the parents complained of the punishment of the child, who had been kept at home, and who had been punished by the schoolmistress, on return to school, with a cane. It appears from the statement of the magistrate, that the schoolmistress had not obeyed two separate regulations, which require that every occurrence of corporal punishment shall be formally recorded in a book kept for the purpose, and that the punishment must not be inflicted during school hours. The magistrate thought the punishment not unreasonable, and inflicted the smallest penalty, with 2*s.* costs. Under these circumstances, I do not think there is any reason to advise that the conviction be quashed.

INDIAN RAILWAYS—PORTUGAL—THE PORT OF GOA.

MR. M. SCOTT asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether negotiations have been entered into by the Supreme Government of India and the Portuguese Government for the construction of a Railway to connect the Port of Goa with any town within the territory of British India; and, if such negotiations are completed; and, whether he will be so good as to lay the Agreement between the two Governments, and other Papers connected with the subject, upon the Table?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: A Treaty has been concluded between Great Britain and Portugal, dated 26th December, 1878, under Article 6 of which Treaty it is agreed that whenever the Portuguese Government give notice to the British Government that a Joint-Stock Company has been formed for the construction of a Railway to connect the Port of Marmagoa to the town of New Huble, and upon Her Majesty's Government being satisfied that the concession by Portugal to the Company is suitable, and that the capital is forthcoming, Her Majesty's Government, on the part of the Government of India, engages to grant facilities in the construction and working so much of the undertaking as lies within British Indian territory, and to use its influence with Native Chiefs in obtaining for the Company similar facilities for so much of the line as may run through their territories; especially it is provided that the Indian Government shall provide land in their territory required for the Railway. It also undertakes to continue the Railway to the town of Bellary, where it will join the system of the Madras Railway Company. Since the conclusion of the Treaty, some Correspondence has passed between the India Office and the promoters of the proposed Company, which has been forwarded to the Government of India. The Treaty between the British Government and Portugal appeared in The London Gazette of 4th October, 1879. Until the Correspondence with the proposed Company is completed, I should think it premature to lay it on the Table.

IRELAND—AMNESTY TO POLITICAL PRISONERS.

MR. CALLAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, taking into consideration the generous amnesty extended to the rebel subjects taken in arms by the American Government, the large and all embracing amnesty granted to the Communist prisoners by Republican France, and the long periods of solitary imprisonment endured by those known as the Fenian prisoners in the United Kingdom, Her Majesty's Government will not now advise Her Majesty that the fitting time has at length arrived when a full and complete amnesty should be extended to all the Irish political prisoners, and that Messrs. O'Leary, O'Meara Condon, Clarke-Luby, O'Donovan Rossa, and the other Fenian prisoners, should be allowed to return to the United Kingdom and reside in their native land?

MR. GLADSTONE: My attention is called by the Question of the hon. Gentleman to three circumstances—first, the generous amnesty extended to its rebel subjects taken in arms by the American

been hitherto in force in regard to the Army and Navy. As far as I am able to ascertain, the punishment is usually inflicted, not with a "cat-o'-nine-tails," but with a light cane; certainly in all cases of juvenile offenders that is so, and even when the punishment is inflicted on adults it is of a mild description. So much in answer to the general question of the hon. and learned Member. I may say that the experiment of discontinuing the punishment was tried on several occasions, both partially and in the whole of India. From 1862 to 1864 the punishment was not inflicted. During that time complaints were made by all the Local Governments of the difficulty experienced in the interval. It has not been, therefore, continued or adopted by the Government of India without full consideration. Among the considerations which have rendered it necessary was the difficulty of inflicting any suitable punishment in a tropical climate. Imprisonment and solitary or separate confinement were to be avoided as far as possible, owing to the mortality which occurred being very high in crowded gaols, among prisoners who had been accustomed to spend almost their whole lives in the open air. It would be impossible to take any hasty or precipitate step in this matter. All I can undertake to do is to call for full Reports from the Government of India and the local Governments as to the circumstances in which the punishment is inflicted, and the necessity that now exists for maintaining it. I will further ask them for any suggestions they may have to make as to its modification or possible discontinuance.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION — BOARD SCHOOLS—CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

SIR CHARLES REED asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Jeffry v. Taylor, decided at the Southwark Police Court on Wednesday June 16th, in which a head teacher was fined for inflicting corporal punishment in school hours; and, whether, under the circumstances, he is prepared to advise that

now the Prime Minister was about to propose a Resolution which was substantially the same as the other Question; and he had no doubt that the Speaker, with that impartiality which he always exercised, would put the Prime Minister down in the same manner. Was the Resolution proposed by the Prime Minister the same as that upon which the judgment of the House had been taken? He maintained that it was. The subject of the former Resolution was Mr. Bradlaugh. The subject of the present Resolution was that—

“Every person returned as a Member of this House, who may claim to be a person for the time being by Law permitted to make a solemn Affirmation or Declaration instead of taking an Oath.”

The Prime Minister's Resolution described a class, but a class of which Mr. Bradlaugh was a member, and of which, at the present moment, he was the only existing member. It described Mr. Bradlaugh, not by name, but by his attributes; and did the Resolution become less disorderly because he was distinguished in that way? It might be said that the Resolution applied not to one man, but to half-a-dozen other persons. Would a Resolution which in itself was disorderly become less disorderly because something was added to it? And if they could not put the Question that Mr. Bradlaugh be permitted to affirm, could they put the Question that half-a-dozen persons be permitted to affirm? Suppose the Question was that “A” should be struck off a Select Committee because he was a lawyer, and that the House rejected such a proposition, was it open to any hon. Member then to propose that all lawyers should be struck off the Committee, even though “A” was the only Member on it? He appealed to the common sense of hon. Members whether the meaning of the Rule was not that that which was substantially the same Question should not be put a second time after the judgment of the House had been expressed? Was not the Resolution of the Prime Minister substantially and really a Resolution that Mr. Bradlaugh be permitted to make an Affirmation? To rescind the Resolution of last week would be perfectly in Order; but to do what the Prime Minister now proposed to do would be to set a precedent that would be disorderly. A Resolution which was disorderly did not become the less disorderly because it was decided upon in the solemn conclave of a Cabinet Council. Therefore, it would be his duty, when the Prime Minister rose to propose his Resolution, to ask the Speaker, as a question of Order, whether the Prime Minister could be permitted to put such a Resolution to the House? He thought the House would act very wisely if, instead of postponing the Orders of the Day, it were to proceed now to consider the Employers' Liability Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: Having listened to the hon. and learned Gentleman stating an argument which I find no necessity whatever for me to answer, I would beg, Sir, to put the Question to you now whether the Resolution which I am about to propose is a Resolution conformable to the Orders of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member for Chatham has correctly stated the Rule of the House to be that the same Question may not be twice offered in a Session. But the point which the House has to consider is this—whether the Resolution now proposed to be offered to the House is substantially the same as that on which a vote of the House was taken on the 22nd of June. On comparing the two Resolutions, I find essential differences between them. On the former occasion the House imposed a restraint upon a particular individual as to his claim to take the Oath or to make an Affirmation. On the other hand, the Resolution now proposed to be offered to the House is a measure of relief extending to every person returned as a Member of this House, who may claim to be a person for the time being by Law permitted to make a solemn Affirmation or Declaration instead of taking an Oath. In this respect the two Resolutions present marked differences. I may add, further, that the Resolution about to be offered provides that a Member shall be permitted without question to make Affirmation, and that, in doing so, he shall be subject to any liability by statute. I need scarcely remind the House that there are numerous precedents of cases in which the House has modified or partially rescinded former Resolutions. This appears to me to be such a case, and I see no good ground for interposing to prevent the Resolu-

Government. No doubt, Sir, that was a very noble act on the part of the American Government; but I must observe that it had reference entirely to a great quarrel decisively disposed of by a civil war, and not to any state of facts continuing or likely to continue in that country. My attention is also called to the amnesty granted to the Communist prisoners by Republican France. No doubt, a proposal of that kind is before the French Legislative Body; but, so far as my information goes, I believe that that proposal has not yet been accepted or become law. With respect to the Irish portion of the case, which forms the main subject of the Question, I beg that my answer may not be understood to extend beyond the terms in which it is couched. That answer is, I am sorry to say, that we do not consider the present period, with the circumstances which prevail at the present time in a portion of Ireland, as a fitting or convenient period for entertaining the subject of granting a further amnesty.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS (IRELAND).

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the Postmaster General, If he can state whether the total amount deposited in Savings Banks in Ireland in 1879 has increased as compared with previous years; and, if so, the amount of that increase; and, whether there has been any increase in the amount of savings deposited in the eight counties, in the year 1879, in which distress is said to be most keenly felt, and the amount of such increase?

MR. FAWCETT: In reply to the Question of the noble Lord, I find there has been an increase in the deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks in Ireland in every year since their establishment. In the year ending the 31st of December last, the increase in the deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks was £91,500. I find that this is a larger increase than has taken place in any year since 1870, excepting the years 1871, 1876, and 1877. The latest available Return is for the quarter ending the 31st of March of the present year. The increase in the deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks has not only been maintained, but has gone on in an increasing ratio; for in this quarter the increase has been

£32,000, or at the rate of £128,000 a-year. This increase may be said to have spread itself almost over the whole of Ireland, for it occurs in every county except two—Kildare and Longford; and in these two counties the decrease has been very insignificant, amounting to only £700. With regard to the eight counties scheduled as distressed counties—Clare, Cork, Donegal, Galway, Kerry, Mayo, Roscommon, and Sligo—I find that in every one of these distressed counties there has been an increase in the deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks. This increase amounts, in the aggregate, to £24,600; but when we look to the old Savings Banks—the Trustee Savings Banks—these conclusions are considerably modified; for in these Savings Banks there has been a decrease in the last year of £86,000, which brings out the result that, taking them and the Post Office Savings Banks together, there has been throughout Ireland an increase of £5,500. In five of the distressed counties there are no Trustee Savings Banks, and in one of the three in which there are the increase in the Post Office Savings Banks deposits considerably more than counterbalances the diminution in the old Savings Banks; and, therefore, we arrive at this net result—that, taking the eight distressed counties, and taking all the Savings Banks deposits, there is an increase in six of those distressed counties and a diminution in two. But, as the Question of the noble Lord relates to the savings of the Irish people, I ought to state further, from information furnished by Dr. Neilson Hancock, that during the three years, 1877, 1878, and 1879, there has been in the general bank deposits and in the note circulation of Ireland a diminution of about £5,200,000, and in 1877 and 1878 there was a diminution in the amount invested in Government Stock of £1,400,000; but in the last year, 1879, there has been an increase of £603,000 in the amount invested in Government Stocks.

CRIMINAL LAW—CONVICT ESTABLISHMENT AT GALWAY.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any, and, if so, what, steps have been taken to carry out the promise of the late Government to establish a convict establishment at Galway in place of the establishment at Spike Island?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he understood the late Government did not make a distinct pledge on the subject, but only intimated that it would receive favourable consideration. When the Government came into Office they found the subject was still under consideration. As the present Government were not responsible for anything done by the late Government, they did not feel bound by the opinions of the late Government; and, besides that, it must be remembered that the subject of the question was only a part of the whole matter of prisons. All he could say was that when the question came to be considered, the claims of Galway would receive very careful attention.

THE FINANCE ACCOUNTS—ANALYZED ACCOUNTS.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, When the Finance Accounts for the year 1879-80 will be presented; when the Analysed Account of Public Income and Expenditure for the year 1879-80 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 376, of Session 1879), ordered by the House, will be presented; and, whether he would direct that this Analysed Statement be incorporated in the volume of Finance Accounts?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: The Treasury expect to be in a position to present the Finance Accounts in about a fortnight. The Analyzed Account to which the Question refers will be ready about the same time; and, being presented to Parliament in a separate form, there seems to be no reason for printing it over again in the Finance Accounts.

FRENCH MERCANTILE MARINE.

DR. CAMERON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he would lay upon the Table, with as little delay as possible, a translation of the "Projet de loi sur la Marine Marchande," at present being promoted by the French Government?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Bill in question is now under discussion in the Chamber of Deputies, and alterations are frequently made in it. As soon as it is finally passed by the Chamber it shall be laid on the Table of the House, even without waiting for its going to the Senate.

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE GREEK FRONTIER.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the Plenipotentiaries now assembled in Conference have arrived at a unanimous agreement with reference to a line for the rectification of the Turko-Greek frontier?

MR. BOURKE asked, Whether the Papers relating to the Berlin Conference can now be laid before Parliament?

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON asked, Whether, as the Conference now sitting at Berlin has agreed, with reference to the Greco-Turkish frontier question in connection with the Treaty of Berlin, as to the boundary line which should be adopted by both Countries, the hon. Gentleman can state whether all the Powers are prepared to use their united influence on both Governments to bring to a successful issue their decision?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In answer to the hon. Member for Salford and the hon. Member for the City of London, I have to state that the Plenipotentiaries of the Powers in Conference at Berlin have arrived at a unanimous conclusion with regard to the line of Frontier between Greece and Turkey for submission to their respective Governments. But no final decision has yet been come to by the Powers as to the steps to be taken in order to bring the conclusions of the Conference to the notice of the Turkish and Greek Governments. With regard to the Question of the right hon. Member for King's Lynn, I fear that it would be quite impossible to lay the Correspondence before the House at the present stage of the proceedings. Negotiations are still going on with regard to some subsidiary questions, and we have not yet received the full and final Reports of the Conference.

In reply to Lord JOHN MANNERS,

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would see whether the Austrian Staff Map, showing the boundaries, could not be laid on the Table of the Library.

SOUTH AFRICA—MEDALS TO IRREGULAR FORCES.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether medals will be issued to the irregular forces raised by the Government who have served in the Cape, Transvaal, and Zulu campaigns?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my hon. Friend, I may inform him that medals will be issued to such of the Colonial Forces, European or Native, as were regularly organized and disciplined as combatants, whether raised by the Colonial Government or by the General Officer commanding.

EAST INDIAN RAILWAYS—REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.

MR. NORWOOD asked the Secretary of State for India, If he is now in a position to lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Departmental Committee on East Indian Railway (Freight, &c.), to which he promised his consideration on the 24th May last?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that since a Question was put at the end of May he had, as he promised he would, communicated with the Members of the Committee, and examined the Report and the evidence on which it was founded. Much of the evidence was obtained under the promise of secrecy. The Members of the Committee were of opinion that there would be no objection to produce the Report with certain omissions, and they had obtained the assent of most of the gentlemen who gave evidence to this course being taken; yet permission had not been obtained for the production of the evidence obtained under the promise of secrecy. Much of the evidence was taken in such a manner as to render it impossible to produce it. Only a portion was taken down in shorthand, and the rest was taken in the form of notes not suitable for forming part of a Parliamentary Paper. Under these circumstances, and finding the Committee had with some freedom the system of payment of some of the Guaranteed Companies, he thought it would not be for the public advantage, but rather the reverse, to lay this Report on the Table by the evidence on which it was founded; and he regretted, therefore, that he was unable to do so. He might, however, state that the Committee's conclusions, and the conclusions which had been generally adopted by the India Office and by the Guarantee Companies, were decidedly favourable to the system of obtaining freight, as a rule, by competitive tenders. That had been for some time the practice of the India Store Department itself; and after discussion and formulation of this system it had been decided to continue it, and to extend it to the different Guaranteed Railway Companies.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY—ADMISSION OF THE PUBLIC.

MR. COOPE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he is now able to lay upon the Table of the House the Resolutions adopted by the Trustees of the National Gallery as to giving increased facility for the admission to the public; and, whether he is prepared to state what action the Government is now willing to take in the matter?

MR. ADAM: The copy of the Resolutions passed by the Trustees of the National Gallery, and their remarks explanatory of them, have been laid on the Table of the House, and will shortly be printed. The initiative in this matter rests with the Trustees, and not with the Government; but the latter will be prepared to consider any proposals that may be made to them on the subject, with the view of giving, if possible, increased facilities to the public and students.

RETURN OF EJECTMENTS (IRELAND).

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as regards the Returns for Ejectments in Ireland, quoted by him, Whether they related to the scheduled districts only, or to the whole of Ireland; and, whether he can state if they all relate to agricultural tenancies; what proportion were for overholding leases; and what proportion made by middlemen; also in how many cases there was more than two years' rent due?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The Return is substantially the same as the one I quoted from, and relates to the whole of Ireland. I was mistaken in saying that all the cases related to agricultural tenancies, for, on inquiry, I find that out of 1,060 evictions in this year 25 were in towns and cities. The Return is, however, necessarily incomplete. It does not give all the evictions that have taken place in Ireland, but only those reported to the Constabulary, and many take place without the Constabulary knowing anything of them. I cannot state what number of evictions relate to one holding; but a Return which was ordered by my Predecessor, and which I hope will be in the hands of Members in a day or two, will show the number of evictions for causes other than non-payment of rent; nor can I say what proportion were for overholding of leases or made by middlemen. With regard to the Return, I am taking, and the officials in Dublin are taking, all the steps they can to get it as soon as possible, but both the Local Government Board and the Constabulary are very hard at work; and, between keeping the people alive and keeping the peace, I am sorry to say the Returns must, to some extent, give way.

RAILWAYS (IRELAND) — SOUTHERN RAILWAY (CLONMEL & THURLES).

MR. P. J. SMYTH asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he can state whether the Southern Railway (Clonmel and Thurles) was opened to-day; or whether, notwithstanding that the certificate of the Board of Trade was granted some days ago, additional obstacles have been put in the way by some of the larger Companies concerned?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The Board of Trade authorized the opening of the Southern Railway for public traffic on the 25th June; but as regards the other points referred to in the Question of the hon. Member, I have received no official information. I may, however, be allowed to say that if there is any difficulty, as suggested in the Question, between the Railway Companies, the Board of Trade, having regard to the great public interests involved, would be glad, at the invitation of the Companies, to mediate between them, and see if they can bring their difficulties to a satisfactory conclusion.

THE CITY COMPANIES—THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. COURTNEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department,

When the Government propose to nominate the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the City Companies?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had been some time in communication with the gentlemen whom he intended to propose as Commissioners, and those communications had necessarily taken some time. He hoped, however, before many days were over to be in a position to nominate the Commission.

STATE OF IRELAND—AGRARIAN CRIME.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return of all agrarian crimes and outrages committed in the counties of Mayo, Sligo, and Galway, from 31st January 1880 to present date, and of the number of meetings called for the purpose of promoting the land agitation reported by the constabulary within the same counties since 30th June 1879, and of the number of cases in which resistance was offered to the police when protecting process servers, bailiffs, and others in the execution of their duty; and a Copy of the charge of the Judges of Assize to the Grand Juries of the counties of Mayo and Galway at the Spring Assizes of 1880?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I am sorry to say that the Question of the hon. Member escaped my notice until I came down to the House to-day, but I see no reason why we should not give almost all the particulars he mentions. My only doubt is whether we can sufficiently define "a meeting called for the purpose of promoting the land agitation." With respect to other matters mentioned, I shall be glad to give the Returns to the 30th of June; and if he will communicate with me, or give me Notice of further Questions, I may be able to give him more complete information.

TREATY OF BERLIN—TURKEY AND GREECE—THE TRANSFERRED PROVINCES.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If Her Majesty's Government will take steps, with or without the assistance

SOUTH AFRICA—MEDALS TO IRREGULAR FORCES.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether medals will be issued to the irregular forces raised by the Government who have served in the Cape, Transvaal, and Zulu campaigns?

Much of the evidence was taken in such a manner as to render it impossible to produce it. Only a portion was taken down in shorthand, and the rest was taken in the form of notes not suitable for forming part of a Parliamentary Paper. Under these circumstances, and finding the Committee had discussed with some freedom the system of management of some of the Guaranteed Companies, he thought it would not be to the public advantage, but rather the reverse, to lay this Report on the Table unsupported by the evidence on which it was founded; and he regretted, therefore, that he was unable to do so. He might, however, state that the Committee's conclusions, and the conclusions which had been generally adopted by the India Office and by the Guarantee Companies, were decidedly favourable to the system of obtaining freight, as a rule, by competitive tenders. tenancies, for, on inquiry, I find that out of 1,060 evictions in this year 25 were in towns and cities. The Return is, however, necessarily incomplete. It does not give all the evictions that have taken place in Ireland, but only those reported to the Constabulary, and many take place without the Constabulary knowing anything of them. I cannot state what number of evictions relate to one holding; but a Return which was ordered by my Predecessor, and which I hope will be in the hands of Members in a day or two, will show the number of evictions for causes other than non-payment of rent; nor can I say what proportion were for overholding of leases or made by middlemen. With regard to the Return, I am taking, and the officials in Dublin are taking, all the steps they can to get it as soon as possible, but both the Local Government Board and the Constabulary are very hard at work; and, between keeping the people alive and keeping the peace, I am sorry to say the Returns must, to some extent, give way.

RAILWAYS (IRELAND) — SOUTHERN RAILWAY (CLONMEL & THURLES).

MR. P. J. SMYTH asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he can state whether the Southern Railway (Clonmel and Thurles) was opened to-day; or whether, notwithstanding that the certificate of the Board of Trade was granted some days ago, additional obstacles have been put in the way by some of the larger Companies concerned?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The Board of Trade authorized the opening of the Southern Railway for public traffic on the 25th June; but as regards the other points referred to in the Question of the hon. Member, I have received no official information. I may, however, be allowed to say that if there is any difficulty, as suggested in the Question, between the Railway Companies, the Board of Trade, having regard to the great public interests involved, would be glad, at the invitation of the Companies, to mediate between them, and see if they can bring their difficulties to a satisfactory conclusion.

THE CITY COMPANIES—THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. COURTNEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department,

When the Government propose to nominate the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the City Companies?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had been some time in communication with the gentlemen whom he intended to propose as Commissioners, and those communications had necessarily taken some time. He hoped, however, before many days were over to be in a position to nominate the Commission.

STATE OF IRELAND—AGRARIAN CRIME.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return of all agrarian crimes and outrages committed in the counties of Mayo, Sligo, and Galway, from 31st January 1880 to present date, and of the number of meetings called for the purpose of promoting the land agitation reported by the constabulary within the same counties since 30th June 1879, and of the number of cases in which resistance was offered to the police when protecting process servers, bailiffs, and others in the execution of their duty; and a Copy of the charge of the Judges of Assize to the Grand Juries of the counties of Mayo and Galway at the Spring Assizes of 1880?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I am sorry to say that the Question of the hon. Member escaped my notice until I came down to the House to-day, but I see no reason why we should not give almost all the particulars he mentions. My only doubt is whether we can sufficiently define "a meeting called for the purpose of promoting the land agitation." With respect to other matters mentioned, I shall be glad to give the Returns to the 30th of June; and if he will communicate with me, or give me Notice of further Questions, I may be able to give him more complete information.

TREATY OF BERLIN—TURKEY AND GREECE—THE TRANSFERRED PROVINCES.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If Her Majesty's Government will take steps, with or without the assistance of the other Powers, to ascertain by means of a plebiscite among the inhabitants of the Provinces which, without consulting Turkey, it is proposed to transfer from the rule of the Sultan to that of the King of Greece; and, whether it is the wish of these people to be thus dealt with?

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to the plébiscite proposed by the hon. Gentleman to be held in certain portions of the Turkish Empire, we have no power and no intention of taking any step of the kind. We do not think that means exist for obtaining such a result. With respect to the second part of the Question, all I can say at present is, that so far as the Representative of Her Majesty's Government was concerned, and so far as the Representatives of the other Powers assembled in Berlin were concerned, they proceeded with the most careful attention in their power, and according to the best evidence they possessed, with respect to the wishes of the people to be dealt with in the manner proposed.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS — CONSTITUTION OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE asked the Secretary of State for War, Why the Select Committee on the Contagious Diseases Acts is not yet appointed, a month having elapsed since the First Lord of the Treasury gave the assurance of its appointment?

MR. CHILDERS, in reply, said, that the Select Committee had been appointed a few days ago; but there had been a difficulty in filling up two of the vacant places in consequence of two Members who were Members of the Committee last year not having been returned to this Parliament. He would place the names of two Members on the Paper that evening.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE REV. JAMES MEREST.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been drawn to a memorial addressed to the Home Office by the Rev. James Merest; and, if so, whether he will institute an inquiry into his case?

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The case of the Rev. James Merest has been for many years before the Home Office, and has been decided over and over again. My Predecessors thought it a case in which they could not interfere, and I see no reason for departing from their view.

RUSSIA AND CHINA—RUMOURED HOSTILITIES.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to put a Question to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as it is in reference to a matter of considerable public interest. Can the hon. Baronet give the House information as to whether there is any foundation for the report that hostilities have broken out between Russia and China?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, that a week ago a report reached this country that the Chinese had crossed the Russian Frontier and captured a fort; but that rumour was afterwards declared to be wholly unfounded. Her Majesty's Government had received no official information as to the report appearing in that morning's papers in reference to a collision between Russian and Chinese Forces; but they had received information from St. Petersburg that afternoon, to the effect that it was believed that there was no foundation for the statement.

DISTRESS (IRELAND) — ALLEGED DEATH FROM STARVATION IN ROSCOMMON.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that a Question had been placed on the Paper which had not been asked him. It was to ask him—

“Whether the Local Government Board will order a public inquiry into the alleged death from starvation of Mrs. Toolan, of Doon, in the Boyle Union, County Roscommon; whether it is true that only twenty-two families have received out-door relief in the Boyle Union, although it embraces seven parishes, and that in one of them, the parish of Boyle, seven hundred families are receiving relief from a local committee; and, whether a sworn investigation will be ordered into the manner in which the Boyle Board of Guardians and their relieving officers have performed their duties to the destitute poor during the existing distress, in view of charges of neglect made publicly against them?”

He had made inquiry, and had seen a letter from the husband of the poor woman, written to the Board of Guardians, describing the report as slanderous, false, and malicious. The husband said he had plenty of provisions in his house, and that his deceased wife had had a good bed and proper nursing. With reference to other parts of the Question, he had to say that it was not true that in Boyle Union only 22 families were in receipt of out-door relief; 622 persons were in receipt of out-door relief, and about 700 persons were receiving relief from a local Committee.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENTARY AFFIRMATION.

RESOLUTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: In moving—

“That the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Motion relating to the Parliamentary Affirmation;”

it may be convenient that I should mention that, in consequence of the state of Public Business, the necessity of getting forward with the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Bill, and at the same time the great difficulty in which we stand for appointing a very early day for it, my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) is obliged to ask you and the House to hold a meeting on Saturday. [“Oh, oh!”] This is only information, which has no relation whatever to the Motion, which is that the Orders of the Day be postponed.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE wished to know what would be the course of Business to-morrow?

MR. GLADSTONE: That will depend mainly upon what is done to-night. If we do not get through the Employers' Liability Bill to-night, it must be taken to-morrow.

MR. GORST said, he thought it would now be convenient if he raised the point of Order of which he had given Notice. He believed that the Resolution of the Prime Minister relating to the question of Parliamentary Affirmation was disorderly, and of a kind that the Speaker ought to refuse to put from the Chair. The course adopted throughout the Bradlaugh incident by the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) had been to resist any attempt made by the Government to induce the House to break the law for the purpose of smuggling Mr. Bradlaugh into the House. He had done his best to second the laudable efforts of the right hon. Baronet; and he now rose to prevent a new precedent being established that would be dangerous to the Order of the House. The Rule of the House was perfectly simple and clear—the Rule not only of this House, but also of the other House of Parliament—and it was that, if a Question had been considered by the House, and a definite judgment had been pronounced upon it, that substantially the same Question could not be put to the House during the current Session. [MR. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] He was pleased that the Prime Minister should think proper to cheer that statement, as it was what he did not expect. He was quite aware the burden of proving that the Resolution of the Prime Minister was a breach of that Rule rested upon him, and he should proceed in due course to do that; but first let him call the attention of the House to what were said to be the exceptions to that Rule. Now, there were no real exceptions to the Rule at all; and if the Prime Minister's Resolution were put, it would be the first exception that had occurred. There was an interesting case mentioned in Sir Erskine May's book on Parliamentary Usage, which occurred in 1844, when the same subject was considered by the House. It was a case of a letter sent from Italy to Mr. Thomas Duncombe, having been opened under a Warrant by Sir James Graham. A Motion was put respecting the matter, and then an Amendment was put that a Committee should be appointed to consider the particular case of Mr. Duncombe's letter. Both the Motion and the Amendment were withdrawn; and if that had not been so, the House would not have been able to pronounce a judgment on the second Resolution, which was afterwards moved by Mr. Duncombe, that a Select Committee should be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the particular case of his letter. That was in Order, because the first Motion had been withdrawn. A third Resolution, moved by Mr. Duncombe, was that the House should express its regret that a Secretary of State had opened letters. Of course, that was an entirely different question; and the fourth Resolution was a Motion for an Address to the Crown, praying for a copy of the Warrant authorizing a

Secretary of State to open letters to be laid on the Table. A fifth Resolution was to bring in a Bill to secure the inviolability of letters passed through the Post Office. Therefore, although it was five times before the House, no Motion on which the House had expressed a judgment was ever before the House. He would now call attention to two recent precedents. The first was in the year 1870, when Mr. R. Torrens moved—

“That, in order to arrest the increase of Pauperism, and to relieve the distressed condition of the working classes, it is expedient that measures be adopted for facilitating the Emigration of poor families to British Colonies.”

On the 17th of May in the same year, Mr. W. M. Torrens moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She may direct measures to be taken to provide passages to the Colonies for intending Emigrants, who shall be approved by competent authority, at cheap and uniform rates of charge.”

The Speaker called the attention of the House to that second Resolution, and told the House—

“There is a Rule that no Question may be proposed which is the same in substance as has been resolved in the affirmative or negative in the same Session.”

Therefore, the proposal for facilitating the emigration of poor families could not be put. Another precedent was set in the last Parliament, when a Resolution was passed by the House with regard to an appointment in the Stationary Office. On the 16th of July, 1877, the House resolved—

“That, having regard to the recommendations made in 1874 by the Select Committee on Public Departments (Purchases, &c.), this House is of opinion that the recent appointment of Controller of Her Majesty's Stationery Office is calculated to diminish the usefulness and influence of Select Committees of this House, and to discourage the interest and zeal of officials employed in the Public Departments of the State.”

On the 23rd of July, 1877, that Resolution was read at the Table of the House, and thereupon a Motion was made to rescind it. It was then resolved—

“That this House, while most anxious to maintain the usefulness and influence of its Select Committees, and to encourage the interest and zeal of officials employed in the Public Departments of the State, after hearing the further explanation concerning the recent appointment of the Controller of Her Majesty's Stationery Office, withdraws the censure conveyed in the said Resolution.”

Mr. Gorst

But the same Question was not on that occasion put in the same manner as it was proposed to put the Question to the House to-day. The Prime Minister would be following the precedent set last Session if he were to have the Resolution passed last week read at the Table, and if he were then to propose that, as he had been informed Mr. Bradlaugh had since become a member of the Society of Friends, it was desirable to rescind the Resolution. But let him call the attention of the House to what it was the House discussed. The question that was considered last week was whether Mr. Bradlaugh, who had been returned as a Member of the House, and who claimed for the time being to make a solemn affirmation, should be permitted to make and subscribe either a declaration or an oath under the Parliamentary Oaths Act. There were, in fact, two questions considered by the House—Should Mr. Bradlaugh be permitted to make an Affirmation; or should he, under the circumstances that were mentioned, be permitted to make an Oath? The House expressed on those two questions a definite and final judgment. What that judgment was was not at all germane to his present argument; but what he contended for was, that the House having expressed a definite and final judgment, it therefore became disorderly for any Member of the House, whether the Prime Minister or a private Member, to propose to the House, during the current Session, a Resolution the same, or substantially the same, as the one the House had pronounced judgment upon. They had had an example of the Rule recently. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) endeavoured to propose to the House a Motion that was the same as one that had been decided upon. Mr. Labouchere gave Notice on the 22nd of June that he should ask the Speaker whether he should be in Order in moving that Mr. Bradlaugh now be allowed to make an Affirmation, and the Speaker replied that—

“Such a Motion would be in direct opposition to the vote of the House last night, and would therefore be out of Order, because it is substantially the same Motion which the House has already pronounced judgment upon.”

The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was thus put down, and now the Prime Minister was about to propose a Resolution which was substantially the same as the other Question; and he had no doubt that the Speaker, with that impartiality which he always exercised, would put the Prime Minister down in the same manner. Was the Resolution proposed by the Prime Minister the same as that upon which the judgment of the House had been taken? He maintained that it was. The subject of the former Resolution was Mr. Bradlaugh. The subject of the present Resolution was that—

The Prime Minister's Resolution described a class, but a class of which Mr. Bradlaugh was a member, and of which, at the present moment, he was the only existing member. It described Mr. Bradlaugh, not by name, but by his attributes; and did the Resolution become less disorderly because he was distinguished in that way? It might be said that the Resolution applied not to one man, but to half-a-dozen other persons. Would a Resolution which in itself was disorderly become less disorderly because something was added to it? And if they could not put the Question that Mr. Bradlaugh be permitted to affirm, could they put the Question that half-a-dozen persons be permitted to affirm? Suppose the Question was that “A” should be struck off a Select Committee because he was a lawyer, and that the House rejected such a proposition, was it open to any hon. Member then to propose that all lawyers should be struck off the Committee, even though “A” was the only Member on it? He appealed to the common sense of hon. Members whether the meaning of the Rule was not that that which was substantially the same Question should not be put a second time after the judgment of the House had been expressed? Was not the Resolution of the Prime Minister substantially and really a Resolution that Mr. Bradlaugh be permitted to make an Affirmation? To rescind the Resolution of last week would be perfectly in Order; but to do what the Prime Minister now proposed to do would be to set a precedent that would be disorderly. A Resolution which was disorderly did not become the less disorderly because it was decided upon in the solemn conclave of a Cabinet Council. Therefore, it would be his duty, when the Prime Minister rose to propose his Resolution, to ask the Speaker, as a question of Order, whether the Prime Minister could be permitted to put such a Resolution to the House? He thought the House would act very wisely if, instead of postponing the Orders of the Day, it were to proceed now to consider the Employers' Liability Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: Having listened to the hon. and learned Gentleman stating an argument which I find no necessity whatever for me to answer, I would beg, Sir, to put the Question to you now whether the Resolution which I am about to propose is a Resolution conformable to the Orders of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member for Chatham has correctly stated the Rule of the House to be that the same Question may not be twice offered in a Session. But the point which the House has to consider is this—whether the Resolution now proposed to be offered to the House is substantially the same as that on which a vote of the House was taken on the 22nd of June. On comparing the two Resolutions, I find essential differences between them. On the former occasion the House imposed a restraint upon a particular individual as to his claim to take the Oath or to make an Affirmation. On the other hand, the Resolution now proposed to be offered to the House is a measure of relief extending to every person returned as a Member of this House, who may claim to be a person for the time being by Law permitted to make a solemn Affirmation or Declaration instead of taking an Oath. In this respect the two Resolutions present marked differences. I may add, further, that the Resolution about to be offered provides that a Member shall be permitted without question to make Affirmation, and that, in doing so, he shall be subject to any liability by statute. I need scarcely remind the House that there are numerous precedents of cases in which the House has modified or partially rescinded former Resolutions. This appears to me to be such a case, and I see no good ground for interposing to prevent the Resolution now proposed to be offered to the House.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Motion relating to the Parliamentary Affirmation. —(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. GLADSTONE: If I did not reply to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite it was from no want of general respect for him, but because I felt that, considering the vehemence and strength of the language he thought himself entitled to use, and considering the extraordinary charges he thought himself warranted in making, and the peremptory manner in which, while professing to appeal to the Chair, he declared on his own authority what was Order and what was not, I felt that, under these circumstances, it would be inexpedient to enter upon a discussion so wide, because it would tend to introduce heat into this debate. There is one thing upon which I feel convinced that we are all agreed, and there is another upon which I hope we may, to a great extent, be agreed. That on which I hope we are all agreed is that there will be no advantage to the dignity of this House in a renewal of lengthened and heated discussion on this occasion. Contenting myself with that brief and simple appeal, I shall endeavour to act in the spirit of the sentiments I have uttered, and avoid every word that can give offence; and not only so, but entirely to refrain entering into the general argument which, as I think, has been completely exhausted. My duty will be to describe the particular situation of the House, to enumerate the facts of the case, and to explain the duty that we think is incumbent on the Government in this matter. We are all agreed on the primary and paramount duty of maintaining the dignity of the House; and the dignity of the House, as it may be considered in many points of view, may also be regarded from one that is fundamental and anterior to all others—that, namely, which concerns the police of the House and the maintenance of the exterior decency of our proceedings. Sir, it is a sense of the stringency of that obligation which has induced my Colleagues to take this matter into their consideration, and which now induces me to submit a proposal to the House, notwithstanding the fact that we were not the majority that brought about this position of affairs, and that we might on every general principle anticipate that that majority would be prepared to deal with that position of affairs which it created. Let us see whether that has been so. I do not question for a moment anything that has been said by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, or by anyone else, as to the perfect sincerity with which he has declared his views on the decency of certain proceedings. We are agreed that the dignity of the House must be maintained in respect to the decency of its proceedings; but how has that been done for the last four days? As I believe, entirely by the knowledge on the part of a particular individual that the Motion which I am now about to submit to the House was a Motion about to be made. But for that knowledge, I believe I am correct in saying—though I do not possess, and have not sought to possess, any private channels or means of information—that we should have been subjected to the pain and grief of witnessing a repetition of the unbecoming scene which occurred in this House a short time back. Now, let us consider how it is that this duty comes into the hands of the Government, devolving upon it—I may say deputed to it—by those who constituted the recent majority. The majority of the House adopted the Resolution that Mr. Bradlaugh be neither permitted to affirm nor to take the Oath. Mr. Bradlaugh declined obedience to the Resolution; he appeared in the House; he committed an undeniable offence against the Order of the House, and declared his intention to repeat that offence again and again until he had effected his entry into the House of Commons. Upon that, he was committed without opposition—at any rate, almost with the general, if not unanimous, assent of the House—to the custody of the Serjeant at Arms. He remained in that custody a little more than 24 hours; and then the Leader of the Opposition rose in his place, and moved that he be released—that he be released, not upon apology, reparation, or promise not to repeat his offence, but with the full knowledge and clear recollection of his own announcement that that offence would be repeated from time to time, until the object with which it was committed was gained. My right hon. Friend, in making that Motion, said he felt he had vindicated the dignity of the House. It is my absolute duty to accept, however difficult it may be, that assertion of my right hon. Friend, and I do accept it; but I must say I believe he is one of a very few who would consider that to commit Mr. Bradlaugh and release him after 24 hours, and in the face of his announcement that his offence would be repeated toties quoties until his object was gained—I think there are very few who would feel that thereby the dignity of the House was maintained. If I had felt that it was, I should gladly have abstained from troubling the House of Commons now; but what I felt, and what my Colleagues felt, was, on the contrary, that we were subject from day to day to a certain and obvious violation of the dignity and decency of our proceedings, and that it was necessary for us—the majority of the Leaders of the Opposition having apparently considered it their duty to withdraw—to make a proposal to the House. Let me first say that I do not see any means of supporting our dignity or of upholding the Order of our proceedings by a repetition of what was done last week. Were Mr. Bradlaugh to repeat the act which led to his committal, I presume someone would move for a repetition of the committal. How long would the committal last? And would anything be gained to anyone if again the Motion were to be made, after another period of 24 hours, to release Mr. Bradlaugh? I can see no way of deliverance from the difficulty in which we are placed by this method of committal one day and release without apology or amendment on the next. Then it is said by some that the remedy ought to be sought by the method of legislation. I do not presume to restrain any Members of the House in that respect. If they can see their way to make a proposal, as many of the most important subjects relating to the Law of Parliament have been repeatedly dealt with by private Members, far be it from us to shut off from any Members the opportunity of moving or rendering a service to the House. We do not see that any advantage can possibly arise from our attempting anything of this kind; and on these three grounds, each of which I think to be conclusive, it seems to us that whenever a question of the alteration of the Parliamentary Oaths Act is raised, it is desirable that it should be discussed in cold blood. Discussed in cold blood it cannot be, if it be known, if it be notorious, that the immediate purpose for which that legislation is proposed is the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh. In the second place, we must bear in mind the lessons that have been taught by recent facts. We must recollect that, while legal and quasi-legal arguments have been offered by some Gentlemen on that side of the House in support of the recent Resolution, there have been a far larger number of speeches which have had no reference to those arguments at all, but which have bluntly and plainly expressed the sentiments of the Petitions presented before I rose, that we should not allow an Atheist to sit in the House of Commons. We know perfectly well that the legislation proposed by us on such a subject must necessarily raise, I will not say intemperate, but I will say lengthened discussions; because a principle of that kind, taking root in the minds and hearts of men, appears to them both to justify and to require their compelling the Parliament, by what they think is a legitimate use of their privileges, to enter largely into matters of such depth and importance. We, therefore, feel that for us to make such a proposal with our eyes open would be to impede, in such a degree as to be equivalent to sacrificing, a great deal of the important Public Business we have brought under the consideration of the House. But, lastly, we should fail in that which is the main object in inducing us to move, because we have no reason to believe—and I do not believe—during those lengthened debates, with all the feeling they would excite, with all the uncertainty as to the ultimate fate of the measure, here or “elsewhere,” that the dignity of this House, and the decency of our proceedings would be maintained. We believe that we should forfeit, at all events, the primary object we have in view—namely, the avoiding a repetition of the painful scenes we have already witnessed. That being so, we have considered whether there was any other course which we might adopt. Now, there was a point in the speeches of hon. Gentlemen where it appeared we were, to some extent, in contact.

of the Opposition. From the moment that Mr. Bradlaugh was returned it was foreseen that the difficulty would arise, and it was a great pity that the Liberal Party gave the countenance they did to his candidature. He had received the open patronage of the Leaders of that Party, and a noted Nonconformist telegraphed to the electors of Northampton to elect him rather than allow a Tory to get in. When he presented himself and claimed to affirm, the Government knew perfectly well that he did not come within the category of persons entitled by law to make an Affirmation; and if it had not been for the Party bias which they and their supporters imported into the matter the House would never have been placed in its present difficulty. It had been said that Members on the Opposition side ought to produce some legislation for the purpose of enabling Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat. He submitted, however, that this was not the duty of the Opposition. He maintained that it was not possible for the House to do anything to enable Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat except by legislation. The relief which the law allowed, to make an Affirmation, was confined to persons who held some religious belief; and, although there were persons sitting in the House whose views involved the negation of religious belief, this was the first time that an avowed Atheist had ever come into the House himself, thrusting his objectionable opinions under the notice of the House. It was well known that Mr. Bradlaugh had declared in a Court of Law that an oath would not be binding on his conscience; but because a learned Judge allowed him to affirm in the interests of justice, that was no reason why Parliament should permit him to take the same course. If Mr. Bradlaugh had ground of complaint against anyone it was against Her Majesty's Government for not adopting the manly and straightforward way of meeting his claims by legislation, instead of trying to get him into the House by a back way. The Resolution of the Government not only rescinded that at which the House had already arrived, but it authorized an illegal act, or one of very doubtful legality, to be done by Mr. Bradlaugh, and repeated by anyone else holding his views in future. This was the only instance on record in which an attempt had been made to make a Standing Order which would allow an act of doubtful legality to be done. He had no sympathy with Mr. Bradlaugh; but he thought the Government had treated him with gross injustice from beginning to end of this matter. If the Resolution were passed he would still be liable to an action at law; and it was but the beginning of a long controversy, which he (Lord Henry Scott) would prefer to see dealt with in an honest and straightforward manner, and not by the course proposed by the Government.

MR. P. J. SMYTH: Sir, as I had not an opportunity of speaking on the former occasion, I hope the House will extend its indulgence to me a short time. Now, it seems to me that neither the Resolution nor the Amendment, nor both together, raise the true issue. It is impossible to dissociate the personality of Mr. Bradlaugh from the question before the House. The Motion has special reference to him and to others, if, unhappily, such there be, who share, or fancy they share, his views. If this were a question of civil and religious liberty, I would say—"Amend the Forms of Parliament for the accommodation of Mr. Bradlaugh, and throw wide your doors for the admission of him and others." Civil liberty I take to mean that all men in this country are equal in the eye of the law; and by religious liberty I understand the right of every man to worship God according to his conscience. No one proposes to deprive Mr. Bradlaugh of any civil or religious right; but Parliament, having been broadly challenged, is bound to defend against him and others the principle of its own existence. No new test is sought to be imposed. The test of Theism has existed always. It is implied in every act and in every form of Parliament. It pervades the whole body of the Constitution, of which, like the soul in man, it is the animating principle. Is the prayer with which Parliament opens each day its proceedings an empty formula; or is it not an humble action of acknowledgment of its absolute dependence on an All-wise Providence? Does the phrase quoted in the Preamble of every Act, "the Lords spiritual and temporal," signify only the union between Church and State, and not the higher and better union between religion

Lord Henry Scott

"It would not have been competent for any Member to go back upon Mr. Bradlaugh's election speeches; but the matter stands differently now that Mr. Bradlaugh has claimed to be exempt from the Oath, on the ground that he was a person on whom it was not binding."

That claim was not made spontaneously by Mr. Bradlaugh. Mr. Bradlaugh's words, as you will find on reference to the evidence of Sir Erskine May, were words which in no way indicated his Atheism, but which left the question perfectly unsolved whether he was claiming under the statutes relating to judicial Affirmation, or under the laws which relate to Affirmations taken at this Table. Another hon. and learned Gentleman, the Mover of the Amendment (Sir Hardinge Giffard), said—

"It was impossible not to see that Mr. Bradlaugh's views had been thrust upon the House, and that important distinction must be obvious to everyone."

I think I shall carry with me universal assent when I say that a man thrusts nothing upon the House but that which he himself spontaneously asserts at this Table, provided what he asserts is in the terms of the Act of Parliament, and neither falls short of it nor goes beyond it. That is an assertion I make on the credit of the very highest authority with reference to what was said by Mr. Bradlaugh—an assertion which cannot, I believe, be in the slightest degree impeached or impugned. If that be so, I ask is there any Gentleman in this House, on whatever side he may sit, or whatever opinions he may entertain, who will think that there ought to be visited upon Mr. Bradlaugh, as if it had been his own spontaneous act, inferences drawn from matter which he did not tender, which, so far as it depended upon him, he would have kept back, but which was drawn from him by questions put by the Officers at the Table? I believe, therefore, many Gentlemen have given their vote under a misapprehension as to the facts of the case, as to the obstruction by Mr. Bradlaugh of the opinions which have given so much offence, and as to the effect of those opinions on the duty and obligations of the House. Now, these are the grounds on which we think that a Motion of this kind should be made—a Motion which I trust will settle this painful controversy; but a Motion which I think has a yet greater merit—an effectual preventive force for the future. It was no mere technical distinction, Sir, which was observed by you in the Chair, that this Motion is made so as to save us from, I hope, a remote risk of the recurrence of scenes and circumstances so painful and difficult that even the Leaders who bring them about are unable to deal with them, but find themselves, in the fulfilment of their duties, obliged to throw the responsibility of finding a remedy upon those who offered resistance to them. The foundation on which this Resolution rests is this. It is not well that any person duly elected, and tendering himself in the terms of the Act of Parliament at this Table to swear or affirm, should be precluded from taking his place in this House—subject to the liabilities incumbent on him by statute—through any question put to him on behalf of the House. That, Sir, is the simple issue which I present to the mind of the House, and I detach it altogether from the specialities of Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions. There might have been other opinions which might have been elicited by questions from persons in other circumstances. I care not what the opinions were; we stand upon this point—that where the law has laid down a rule, where the constituency have exercised their privilege, where their proceedings are unimpeachable in form and substance, and where the man whom they have chosen neither says nor does anything in this House of his own accord, spontaneously, deviating either to the right or left from the line pointed out by the Act of Parliament—we say that it is not well for the general interests of the country, it is not well for the interests or character of this House, that such a person, whatever his opinions, on presenting himself should be stopped on his road to his seat by the act of any person proceeding to question him on the part of the House. It is well that he should be left to be tried by the tribunals of his country, which have full means for conducting his trial, and which will acquit or condemn him according to law.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That every person returned as a Member of this House, who may claim to be a person for the time being by Law permitted to make a solemn Affirmation or Declaration instead of taking an Oath, shall henceforth (notwithstanding so much of the Resolution adopted by this House on the 22nd of June last as relates to Affirmation) be permitted, without question, to make and subscribe a solemn Affirmation in the form prescribed by the 'Parliamentary Oaths Act, 1866,' as altered by 'The Promissory Oaths Act, 1868,' subject to any liability by statute."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in rising to move the following Amendment:—

said: Mr. Speaker, I most entirely concur with the Prime Minister in the observations with which he opened his speech; and I trust the great body of the House also concur with him in desiring that we should debate this question in a calm and uncontroversial spirit, as far as that is possible, and that we should abstain from re-opening many of the questions which we discussed on the previous occasion. It will be my endeavour, in the few remarks I shall offer to the House, to present them in that spirit, and to observe the cautions given us by the Prime Minister. But, at the same time, while I admit that my right hon. Friend's speech was characterized by a good deal of moderation in many respects, I could not but notice that throughout his remarks—and very pointedly in some parts of them—he did, in measured but, at the same time, very significant language, endeavour to cast on Members who sit on this side of the House—on those of us who have already taken part in these debates, and on those whom he was pleased to describe as "the majority"—a responsibility which, on their part and on my own, I beg respectfully to disclaim; and I shall find it necessary to dispute at least one of the propositions on which he rested his case. He made an observation, in which he said that those whom he described as "the majority" had thrown on the Government the responsibility of dealing with the situation they had created; and if you were to judge of what has taken place from the description which the Prime Minister gives of it, you would think that from the beginning the matter had been taken up and dealt with by those whom he describes by that convenient term "the majority," and that the Government had had nothing to do with the matter until after the majority had completed its work after its own clumsy fashion, and had found itself too weak and too incompetent to deal with the result—and that that majority had thrown over upon the Government the task and the duty of preserving the Order of the House; and, founded upon that representation of the facts—which I contend to be an entire misrepresentation—the Prime Minister has offered to the House an argument for taking a step which I shall endeavour presently to show is a very serious and a very questionable step, on the ground that it is the only one the Government can see adequate to preserve the peace, and maintain what he calls the police of the House. Now, I very seriously doubt the wisdom of relying on such an argument as that. I hope the House will take into consideration what is the effect and meaning of an argument addressed to us in such a form as we have already heard, warning us that unless a certain course is pursued by the House we must expect a renewal of scenes derogatory to the character and dignity of the House. The speech of my right hon. Friend rested far too much on that foundation; and I, for my part, though not indisposed to attach a certain amount of weight to a fair consideration of Order, entirely disclaim that as a ground for a step which would in itself be inconvenient and improper. Let me for one moment ask how far the statement is correct, that this is a matter in which the Government were not concerned until the time when what the right hon. Gentleman is pleased to call the majority threw it upon them? What is the history of the case? It is said that there was no obstruction by Mr. Bradlaugh of the circumstances under which he claimed to affirm before the House until he was questioned. I will not enter into that matter. I will remind hon. Gentlemen that Mr. Bradlaugh had given Notice even before he made his appearance at that Table—he had given Notice to you, Mr. Speaker, as the chief authority of the House—that he intended to take the step, and he came forward with the cognizance certainly of the Government that he intended to take the step. I presume it will not be denied by the Government that they were aware, before he presented himself, that it was his intention to claim the right to affirm; and they were also aware that you, Mr. Speaker, had great doubts whether he should be allowed to affirm.

formists in particular, in respect to complicity on their part with this most atrocious case. As an individual unit of that great Party, which represents—as I believe—the immemorial spirit of the English people, and as the Representative of a constituency (East Cornwall) largely Nonconformist in that part of this country which John Wesley specially made his own, I wish, standing here in my place, in such poor words as I am capable of, most indignantly to rebut and to repudiate that charge. It is framed in the same mould as one which we had to deal with during the recent Election, and which, appearing in a letter, which, from the prominence of its author and the prominence of its recipient, was dignified by the name of a Manifesto, imputed disloyalty by implication to the Liberal Party. Both alike were based on individual instances devoid of truth; the first recoiled on those who made it, and the second will do the same. But, since that insinuation has been made, it must be answered; and for this object I have in my mind the words of that chivalrous and far-seeing man, M. de Tocqueville—

Now, in the first place, whatever some philosophers may say, even if there were a dozen Mr. Bradlaughs in this House, the fact would remain that, in so far as the community is concerned, this nation is still not only a religious but a Christian nation. There is inherent within it a religious expression, which alternately guides and controls, and is guided and controlled by the civil power; and, in the second place, Liberalism, if I know anything of it, is the expression of the voice of the people's heart. In the practical politics of the Party, therefore, religion still lives, and moves, and has its being. It is unnecessary for me to make any defence for Nonconformists. The Wesleyans have sent, as a protest to this House, one of the most solemn documents ever laid before it,—on the matter of the Oath. The fact, then, really amounts to this—that all this while Liberals and Nonconformists have been seeing what, I am sorry to say, some hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House as well as on that have been blind to—namely, that the maintenance of a man's rights has nothing on earth to do with complicity with his views. In conclusion, I will say that fortunate, most fortunate, do I hold it to be that the Leader of this House in such a crisis as this is the right hon. Gentleman whom his Queen and country alike have called to occupy that exalted post. In him all alike can place reliance when the cause of religion is at stake. Not unwilling will he be that I should recall to this House, to his Party, but to the new Members most of all, words which, in 1872, he used in an address to students at Liverpool—

“In preparing yourselves for the combat of life I beg you to take this also into your account, that the spirit of denial is abroad, and that it has challenged all religion, but especially the religion we profess, to the combat of life and death.”

Having regard to those words, and to many others of like import which have fallen from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman, I am prepared faithfully and trustfully to follow him into the Lobby to which this Resolution will lead, believing that—where religion is in question—if I may use the old simile of the ship of the State, no counter seas will make his hand to waver on the wheel, no passing clouds divert his vision from the lode-star of our ancient faith.

MR. NORTHCOTE approached the question from a very young Member's point of view, and not from considerations ultra-legal or ultra-ecclesiastical. He was one of three Conservative Members who supported the original proposition of the Government that the case should be referred to a Select Committee. He wished to say a few words about the allegations that the Conservative Party nourished some personal animosity against Mr. Bradlaugh, and that they were actuated in their conduct by a desire to obtain an electioneering advantage. As for the charge of personal animosity, he could assure the House that he entertained no animosity towards Mr. Bradlaugh. With regard to the second allegation to which he had referred, he would remind the House that it was not the Conservative Party who initiated the proceedings against Mr. Bradlaugh. The person who originally expressed a doubt as to whether Mr. Bradlaugh could or could not affirm was the Speaker himself, and upon such doubt being expressed, Her Majesty's Govern-as to whether anything more was to be done, I am not surprised that the Prime Minister put it to those who voted in the majority the night before—"Is there anything you have to propose?" I took upon myself the office of spokesman, not as speaking for all the Gentlemen who had voted in the majority the night before, but feeling it my duty as one in a position of some responsibility in this House. I took it upon myself, first of all, to say that we thought the decision of the House was clear, and we did not wish to add to it. The consequence was that Mr. Bradlaugh, as was necessarily the case, was called upon to withdraw. He declined; he refused—I will not say disrespectfully, but in a firm manner—to obey the Orders of the House; and it did seem to me that at that point the duty of preserving the order and dignity of the House ought to have reverted to the Prime Minister. I did not take upon myself voluntarily the duty of making any proposal. I made the proposal I did because the Prime Minister abstained, and abstained most distinctly and markedly, from making it; and it was impossible that you, Sir, could be left unsupported. It was clearly the duty of someone to take that step; I took that step, feeling it to be my duty, as I still believe it was. I was obliged, in support of your authority, and of the authority and dignity of the House, to make that Motion, which I made with great pain and reluctance, that Mr. Bradlaugh should be committed to the custody of the Serjeant at Arms. I made it in order to show that the House was prepared to support to the extreme its own right and its own authority, and to vindicate its Orders. Mr. Bradlaugh claimed to have a legal right to do what he was prevented doing. He asserted that the House was taking a step beyond its legal powers; he resisted to the last. I do not blame him; I think he was quite right in bringing the matter to that issue. It was so brought; a distinct claim was put forward on the one hand, and there was a distinct assertion of authority on the other. At that point I considered my functions terminated; and I thought it right the following day to put a Question to the Prime Minister, and to ask whether the Government intended to do anything in the matter? Well, they said they did not. Or, rather, the right hon. Gentleman said he had not yet consulted his Colleagues, which struck me as a rather remarkable statement. Considering the very great importance of the crisis, I should have thought he would have taken, at all events, the trouble to consult his Colleagues as to what he ought to do. That being so, I considered my functions in the matter were now terminated, and I moved the discharge of Mr. Bradlaugh, as I should do again in the circumstances. What was the language of the Prime Minister on that occasion? The Prime Minister said he thought the matter had been fairly brought to an issue—that Mr. Bradlaugh had fairly raised his claim by refusing to withdraw, when he considered himself illegally ordered, until he was arrested; and the House had fairly asserted its claim by the step taken in committing him. Then, said the right hon. Gentleman, the question takes a new form—or a new issue is raised.

MR. GLADSTONE: The new issue raised was the question of declining to obey the Order of the Chair.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I have not the words before me. At any rate, at that point the question had entered upon a new phase; and it was now a question of what Mr. Bradlaugh would do, and how the House would deal with him. I did not mean to have gone into all this question of the police argument. I hoped it might be unnecessary; but it has been forced upon me by the course which has been taken by the right hon. Gentleman. Mr. Bradlaugh made a claim, believing he had a right; the House believed it had the right to prevent him doing what he claimed to do. The matter was brought to a final issue, and Mr. Bradlaugh put it to the House in such a way as to ascertain that the House was serious. There the incident closed. And now, what is his position? Does he still advance his claim? I suppose he does. How does he mean to enforce it? Are we to assume against any man until we have evidence which shows by his own acts that he intends to enforce a claim of law which has been fully raised and fully disputed, by anything in the nature of intimidation or violence? We should be doing injustice to Mr. Bradlaugh to suppose so. Yet this is the argument on which the right hon. Gentleman bases this Resolution. He says the great argument for dealing with this question is that it is necessary to preserve the order of the House, and we shall not preserve the order of the House if we have violence and unauthorized interruption. Mr. Bradlaugh had the right to be here up to and at the moment at which he was ordered to withdraw; the making him withdraw was the one step which had then to be taken, but if Mr. Bradlaugh enters the House again it will become a very different question. We were told that the scene of the other day would be repeated again and again. I do not know whether that is a correct statement. Is such a thing possible? The order that has been given is, I conceive, a binding order—a continuing order. I imagine, Sir, you do not require—would not require—a further order to be made to Mr. Bradlaugh to withdraw. I imagine you would consider yourself entitled to give such police instructions to the officers of the House as would prevent his interfering again. I must not anticipate these matters; I only wish to enter my protest against an argument which seems to me a most dangerous argument. Why, Sir, what did my right hon. Friend say as to the possibility of an amendment of the law? He said that an amendment of the Parliamentary Oaths Act ought to be undertaken coolly and deliberately, and that it cannot be so if upon the decision of that great question hangs the decision whether Mr. Bradlaugh is or is not to be admitted. Are we, then, to suppose that we can settle a question of this sort, which will have an important permanent effect upon the character and proceedings of this House, in a spirit of calmness and coolness, under the menace that if we do not deal with this question in a particular way, Mr. Bradlaugh will take steps which will put us in the position in which we shall have to maintain order by again committing him to custody, probably without the active assistance of the Government? Now, Sir, I have said as much as I think I need say, and, indeed, I apologise to the House for having said so much on that part of the question; but it seemed to me necessary. I wish now to address myself to the point raised in the Amendment of which I have given Notice, to the effect that the House cannot adopt a Resolution which virtually rescinds the Resolution passed by it on the 22nd of June last. I need not say that I entirely agree with you, Sir, in the judgment you have pronounced just now with regard to the technical question which was raised by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Gorst). But whatever may be the technical position, the argument of my hon. and learned Friend seemed to be conclusive as far as it referred to the virtual rescinding of a Resolution passed by the House. I ask, is this not a proposal to virtually rescind a Resolution duly passed? The Resolution was one in two parts, relating both to the Affirmation and the Oath. How came that Resolution to be passed? It was not an original Resolution; it was an Amendment upon another Resolution moved by the sitting Member for Northampton, to the effect that Mr. Bradlaugh be allowed to affirm. That was distinctly negatived; and the division that was taken was not on the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard), but on the original Resolution. But this Resolution, if passed, will exactly do the very thing which the hon. Member for Northampton asked us to do last week, and which the House refused to do. It is quite true that it is apparently covered by the general terms of the Resolution; but I think if the House will look at the matter for one moment, they will see that the terms of the Resolution are such that they confine its operation to Mr. Bradlaugh. It proposes that every person returned as a Member to this House who may claim to be a person for the time being entitled to affirm may affirm without question asked. What is meant by "every person?" I will take my own case. Suppose I came into the House and went up to the Table after this Resolution had passed, and claimed to be allowed by law to make a solemn Affirmation instead of an Oath. I am not to be asked any questions, as I understand; but am to be allowed to make an Affirmation, "subject to any liability by statute." Now, what is the meaning of that? That if, after making the Affirmation, anybody proceeds against me for penalties, I shall say—"I claimed that I had a right to do so." "How do you prove your claim?" I should be asked in a Court of Law. "Are you a Quaker or a Moravian?" "No." "Have you any doubt as to the validity of the Oath?" "No."

"On what do you rest your claim?"

"Well, I do not know. I have nothing to rest it on;" and thus I should subject myself to severe penalties. I want to know, am I correct? Will that be the operation of the Resolution? [Mr. GLADSTONE: Not at all.] Then, will the right hon. Gentleman tell me where I am in error? If I do claim, am I never to be challenged afterwards? It seems to me that there is no meaning in the Resolution, unless it be that the taking of an Oath is to be done away with for ever. I will assume that the person who affirms defends himself in an action for penalties and ventures his seat by his claim of right. Has Mr. Bradlaugh such a right? He says he has under the Statute which enables a person to give evidence in a Court of Justice, and which Statute gives the right,

"If the presiding Judge is satisfied that the taking of an oath shall have no binding effect upon his conscience."

But how can he do this if no question is to be put? Mr. Bradlaugh may possibly say that individually he is clear in the matter; because it has been admitted more than once in Courts of Justice that he was a person so entitled to affirm, and that, therefore, so far as he is concerned, it is his privilege to do so; and that would be an ingenious way out of the difficulty. But that would not be an answer in the case of one who, having just the same claim, had never been in the Courts of Justice. How is such a one to get the advantage of this claim? Clearly by having the question put to him by the Clerk at the Table. And I presume that when the question was put to Mr. Bradlaugh by the Clerk—"On what ground do you claim to affirm?" he was only doing that which was absolutely necessary in order to ascertain what was meant by the claim. I do not see how you are to get out of that, or how you are to show that the Resolution is not confined to Mr. Bradlaugh. I will go a step further, and say—Suppose you do pass this Resolution and get the matter established in the way you desire—that Mr. Bradlaugh claims to affirm and that the case is brought to trial. Are you out of your difficulty? Not at all. You make, or may make, your difficulty ten times worse. What if the Court should say with the majority of the Committee you appointed—Mr. Bradlaugh had no right to claim to affirm, and he is subject to penalties and his seat is vacated. What will you do then? Suppose his constituents return him and he comes here; what are you to do? Or suppose he does not seek re-election; will not the constituency say—"We find ourselves seriously aggrieved in this matter, for here is the Member we wish to return excluded, and excluded by the law as expounded by the Courts of Justice." What are you going to do? Are you going to amend or alter the law? You will have pressure put upon you to legislate; for, depend upon it, you will not get out of the difficulty by any of these ingenious Resolutions. A statement, I am reminded, appeared in one of the morning papers which was entirely unauthorized, and one which I do not accept, to the effect that the Conservative Party were about to make a proposal for legislation in this matter. What I am prepared to say is this—that if you deal with it at all you must deal with it by legislation. How was it that these matters were dealt with before? What was the course pursued when Baron Rothschild and Mr. Alderman Salomons came and proposed to take their seats in this House? Did the House proceed by Resolution? Nothing of the sort. The House refused, and for eight years refused, to admit them into the House, and those Gentlemen represented constituencies at least as important as Northampton, which remained without Members while the question was being discussed and legislation was being considered. Well, you are now proposing a wholly different course. You are proposing to deal with the matter by a Resolution which I venture to think, with all submission, is beyond the competency of the House of Commons. ["No!"] Well, that is, perhaps, a strong expression to use, as I do not know whether it is possible to limit the competency of the House of Commons. But let the House consider seriously what position they will be in if they set this precedent. When Mr. Alderman Salomons took his seat in the House against the orders and directions of the Speaker, and resisted for a time the attempts made to remove him from the House, he was proceeded against in a Court of Law, damages were recovered against him, and the matter occasioned no great inconvenience. But if you admit a Member to take his seat here with a warning that afterwards he will be subject to an action in a Court of Law, you cannot afford to sit by as you did in the case of the action against Mr. Alderman Salomons, because, in this case, the House would be a party to the matter; it would become a question of the Privilege of the House, and it may open an extremely inconvenient question between the Courts and the House of Commons. What the consequences of such a collision as that might be I do not venture to foretell; but this I am sure of—that if it is the wish of the House to maintain their Privileges, they should be very cautious how they exercise those Privileges. The step now asked to be taken is one which is somewhat humiliating to the House of Commons. It is that they should virtually rescind a Resolution debated, not hastily, not in a small House, but in a full House, and carried by a large majority—a majority consisting not of Gentlemen drawn exclusively from one side of it—and after two nights' discussion and after two Committees had sat upon the question—I say it would be humiliating to the House to rescind their Resolution upon the invitation of the Prime Minister, grounded upon something very like a threat, or the intimation of a threat, that possible consequences might ensue damaging to the order and peace of the House. I believe that if the House sets this precedent they will before long have occasion to repent it.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House cannot adopt a Resolution which virtually rescinds the Resolution passed by it on the 22nd day of June last,"—(Sir Stafford Northcote,)

—instead thereof.

MR. MARRIOTT said, that the question before the House was not confined simply to rules and regulations; but it affected materially the rights and privileges of those constituencies in which new Members had as great an interest as the oldest Member of that House. The gist of the matter, as laid down by the Prime Minister, was that the House, in adopting a Resolution passed on a previous occasion, had gone beyond its jurisdiction. It was, of course, perfectly clear that Parliament had a right to make laws; but it had not the power to explain them after they had been made, and certainly no one branch, either the Crown, or the Lords, or the Commons, had the power of explaining Acts passed by those Estates. That was alone the province of the Executive, as represented in this instance by Her Majesty's Judges. It seemed to him that if this Resolution were rejected, they not only denied the right of Members duly elected to sit in the House, but they proposed to impose a qualification beyond that imposed by Statute Law. The question of law was disputed by eminent lawyers; and it seemed to him to be the duty of the Judges and the Executive, rather than of the House, to interpret the law. By the Resolution of the House last week, Mr. Bradlaugh was in the position of a man denied a legal right, the opportunity of applying for a legal remedy, for he could not raise the question in the Courts in the form of an action against the Serjeant at Arms. Had he been a voter for Northampton, he should have voted against Mr. Bradlaugh; but were that Gentleman to be returned to the constituency, he would now, if he had a vote, give it to him, not in support of his opinions, but in vindication of the rights of the constituents, which rights the House would have tried to take away. What the Opposition wanted to say in the matter was that they would not have Mr. Bradlaugh in the House because he was an Atheist; but they were afraid to take the courageous and straightforward course of saying so by a Resolution. They tried to circumvent the question by assuming the function of interpreters of the law—a function belonging to the Judicature, and which Parliament had never before undertaken. It seemed to him that the proposition of the Government appeared the only reasonable way in which the point could be brought to a proper decision, and he, therefore, supported it.

LORD HENRY SCOTT, who had an Amendment on the Paper to the 2nd Resolution to the effect—

"That it is necessary that the said Acts be amended in order to entitle such person to make an Affirmation in lieu of taking an Oath," denied that the difficulty in which the House was placed was due to the action of the Opposition. From the moment that Mr. Bradlaugh was returned it was foreseen that the difficulty would arise, and it was a great pity that the Liberal Party gave the countenance they did to his candidature. He had received the open patronage of the Leaders of that Party, and a noted Nonconformist telegraphed to the electors of Northampton to elect him rather than allow a Tory to get in. When he presented himself and claimed to affirm, the Government knew perfectly well that he did not come within the category of persons entitled by law to make an Affirmation; and if it had not been for the Party bias which they and their supporters imported into the matter the House would never have been placed in its present difficulty. It had been said that Members on the Opposition side ought to produce some legislation for the purpose of enabling Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat. He submitted, however, that this was not the duty of the Opposition. He maintained that it was not possible for the House to do anything to enable Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat except by legislation. The relief which the law allowed, to make an Affirmation, was confined to persons who held some religious belief; and, although there were persons sitting in the House whose views involved the negation of religious belief, this was the first time that an avowed Atheist had ever come into the House himself, thrusting his objectionable opinions under the notice of the House. It was well known that Mr. Bradlaugh had declared in a Court of Law that an oath would not be binding on his conscience; but because a learned Judge allowed him to affirm in the interests of justice, that was no reason why Parliament should permit him to take the same course. If Mr. Bradlaugh had ground of complaint against anyone it was against Her Majesty's Government for not adopting the manly and straightforward way of meeting his claims by legislation, instead of trying to get him into the House by a back way. The Resolution of the Government not only rescinded that at which the House had already arrived, but it authorized an illegal act, or one of very doubtful legality, to be done by Mr. Bradlaugh, and repeated by anyone else holding his views in future. This was the only instance on record in which an attempt had been made to make a Standing Order which would allow an act of doubtful legality to be done. He had no sympathy with Mr. Bradlaugh; but he thought the Government had treated him with gross injustice from beginning to end of this matter. If the Resolution were passed he would still be liable to an action at law; and it was but the beginning of a long controversy, which he (Lord Henry Scott) would prefer to see dealt with in an honest and straightforward manner, and not by the course proposed by the Government.

MR. P. J. SMYTH: Sir, as I had not an opportunity of speaking on the former occasion, I hope the House will extend its indulgence to me a short time. Now, it seems to me that neither the Resolution nor the Amendment, nor both together, raise the true issue. It is impossible to dissociate the personality of Mr. Bradlaugh from the question before the House. The Motion has special reference to him and to others, if, unhappily, such there be, who share, or fancy they share, his views. If this were a question of civil and religious liberty, I would say—"Amend the Forms of Parliament for the accommodation of Mr. Bradlaugh, and throw wide your doors for the admission of him and others." Civil liberty I take to mean that all men in this country are equal in the eye of the law; and by religious liberty I understand the right of every man to worship God according to his conscience. No one proposes to deprive Mr. Bradlaugh of any civil or religious right; but Parliament, having been broadly challenged, is bound to defend against him and others the principle of its own existence. No new test is sought to be imposed. The test of Theism has existed always. It is implied in every act and in every form of Parliament. It pervades the whole body of the Constitution, of which, like the soul in man, it is the animating principle. Is the prayer with which Parliament opens each day its proceedings an empty formula; or is it not an humble action of acknowledgment of its absolute dependence on an All-wise Providence? Does the phrase quoted in the Preamble of every Act, "the Lords spiritual and temporal," signify only the union between Church and State, and not the higher and better union between religion and the law? The legislators among the most ancient peoples sought a religious sanction for their laws and placed them under the protection of their divinities. Thus it was among the Egyptians; thus it was with Lycurgus among the Lacedemonians; thus it was with Numa among the Romans. A belief in the Deity under the idea of Supreme Legislator has always existed. It is as natural to man as social life; and I hold that a man who repudiates that belief, and becomes the active propagandist of doctrines as subversive of social life as of the Constitution of the Realm, is disqualified to discharge the duties of a legislator. Parliament is not merely a political machine; Parliament is, in its highest aspect, a religious institution, whose every act must be a conformity with the moral law, the foundation and source of which is God. Admit the Atheist, and you will have, in course of time, Atheistical legislation. The legislators of one generation, perhaps the present, will sow the wind; and mankind, in the next, will reap the whirlwind. Thus came the excesses of the French Revolution, the seeds of which were sown, in the first instance, by the speculations of English philosophers. Eight years ago the right hon. Gentleman then, as now, Prime Minister, delivered a remarkable address before the University College of Liverpool, in which he uplifted the strong voice of a conscientious man in defence of Christianity assailed. His deep conviction of impending danger could alone have induced the right hon. Gentleman to use the language of solemn warning that characterized that memorable address. Within these eight years the danger has not diminished. The wolf is at the gate; and instead of uniting to drive him away, the British Legislature discuss the formalities with which he shall be received within the fold. A Member may be, or may have been, returned to this House who cannot find it in his conscience to tolerate the Almighty; and we are warned in the name of religious liberty that in order to satisfy his conscientious scruples we must efface the religious character of Parliament. A new Affirmation Book shall be prepared in lieu of the Bible, on which shall be emblazoned the legend—"God expunged by special desire;" Party nomenclature shall be enriched by the addition of the Swearers and the Affirmers. In Oath and Affirmation allegiance to the temporal Sovereignty is obligatory; but allegiance to the King of Kings is a matter of discretion; and this is religious toleration, religious liberty. Material progress and political improvement apart, the distinguishing characteristics of the age are a decline in high intellect and an increase in audacious impiety. I trust that the House of Commons will not be induced to alter its time-honoured rule for the purpose of admitting to a seat in this House anyone, no matter by which constituency returned, who shall openly dispute the Divine origin of the moral law, and the authoritative sanctions of its behests. Even that law requires for its sustainment the aids and defences which religion alone can supply. Without them it would fail, the idea of duty would disappear, and mankind would be left dependent for their moral government on a scientific morality sustained by a human religion. My hon. Friends and Colleagues from Ireland, whatever the course which they may take upon this question, will be mindful, I know, of the honour of their country. Whatever the faults of our countrymen—and they are many, and serious enough—they are redeemed by the fidelity with which, during sorrowful centuries, they have clung to their nationality and religion combined. They have justified the description of Burke—that a nation is a moral essence, not a geographical definition. So long as that essence remains uncontaminated and undefiled, the nation lives, though it may be in chains. But once contaminate it by foreign mixtures, by false theories, and by pernicious doctrines, the process of national decay is rapid, and most fatal, perhaps, in its operation amongst Catholic people long subject to misgovernment.

MR. BÖRLASE: The apology which it is fitting and customary that a new Member should offer who ventures for the first time to claim the attention of this honourable House is rendered more than usually necessary in the present instance by the almost unprecedented gravity of the subject in debate. Occasions there may have been—and doubtless there have been in plenty—when a new Member, on taking his seat, finds himself face to face at once with questions vital to what he feels and knows to be his country's good; but when I take into account the daily-increasing complexity of those social problems which are unceasingly stirring around us; when I bear in mind that it is scarcely too much to say, as has been said, that these are days when the Previous Question is being moved on every subject, human and divine; when I look to the momentous issues which may result from the bare consideration of a question such as this—I cannot fancy that—go back how far soever I may along the lines of English history—there ever can have been a time when, on a new Member's part, there was greater cause for firm resolution, the result of serious reflection and anxious care. I feel sure, so far as my short experience has enabled me to judge of the general tone and tenor of this House, that I shall not be expressing the sentiments of myself alone, but of many an hon. Member—new and old alike, on this side and on that—when I say that it was with a sense of profound responsibility that we have approached those questions to which the unparalleled conduct of the Member for Northampton gave rise in the earlier stages of this matter; but if it was with a sense of responsibility that we approached those questions which related to the mere appointment of Committees and their numerical strength, it is now with a sense of something much more akin to apprehension that we draw near to the subject in the phase which it has now assumed—of apprehension, not lest this honourable House should ultimately adopt a course of procedure which is other than in accordance with what is just and right, but lest the community itself should suffer irremediable harm from the protracted discussion in this place of a matter which, to say the very least of it, must be fruitless of good. Now, Sir, I have to claim the attention of the House while I lay before it a view of this question which, while it is a simple one, is largely entertained in the country generally, and has the advantage of being, strictly speaking, neither legal nor sentimental. It is widely held, then, that throughout the debates on this question there has been a want of clearness in distinguishing between complicity with a man's views and the maintenance of his rights; between active participation in—nay, mere recognition of—the cause of such and such a speculative agitator, and the duty of upholding the right of every English citizen to the benefit of election by his fellow-men. With the former, Parliament has nothing in the world to do; while, in giving effect to the latter, it is simply exercising its natural and necessary, its ordinary and proper function. It is true that there has been good cause for such a confusion of ideas. It is a great anomaly, indeed, when we find a man of no religion attempting, in the name of religious liberty, to treat any precedent of Parliament as a thing of no effect; but a far greater anomaly would it be for the Representatives of the English people, in the name of a precedent of Parliament, to deny to any English citizen a right which is his by birth. For this reason, I shall support the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman. Now, it would be unbecoming in me to particularize any of those hon. Gentlemen opposite who in previous debates, or in this one, have thought it a conscientious duty to act on considerations derived from an opposite point of view; but I would merely express the surprise I felt—I think it was almost on my first entrance into this House—to see an hon. Gentleman—it was the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff)—standing up in his place, as a duly elected Member of this House, and interposing between another equally duly elected Member and his seat. I cannot but think that that is a species of obstruction which neither this House nor this nation will endure. I am not speaking of obstruction to the Public Business of this House—though that is bad enough—but of obstruction to the will of the English people—obstruction of a nature such as the Constitutional historian of the future will have to deal with, and with which, if I mistake not, he will not deal too tenderly. If, Sir, hon. Members opposite choose to make use of such methods as these, most assuredly will they find, ere many years have passed away, that organized obstruction to the inevitable is the surest factor which can be found of sudden, and, it may be, of disastrous change. The mill stream never runs so swiftly as when sweeping the mill dam away. One other point to which I feel bound to allude is the ungenerous and unworthy, base, and untrue insinuations which have been levelled at the Liberal Party, and at the Nonconformists in particular, in respect to complicity on their part with this most atrocious case. As an individual unit of that great Party, which represents—as I believe—the immemorial spirit of the English people, and as the Representative of a constituency (East Cornwall) largely Nonconformist in that part of this country which John Wesley specially made his own, I wish, standing here in my place, in such poor words as I am capable of, most indignantly to rebut and to repudiate that charge. It is framed in the same mould as one which we had to deal with during the recent Election, and which, appearing in a letter, which, from the prominence of its author and the prominence of its recipient, was dignified by the name of a Manifesto, imputed disloyalty by implication to the Liberal Party. Both alike were based on individual instances devoid of truth; the first recoiled on those who made it, and the second will do the same. But, since that insinuation has been made, it must be answered; and for this object I have in my mind the words of that chivalrous and far-seeing man, M. de Tocqueville—

Now, in the first place, whatever some philosophers may say, even if there were a dozen Mr. Bradlaughs in this House, the fact would remain that, in so far as the community is concerned, this nation is still not only a religious but a Christian nation. There is inherent within it a religious expression, which alternately guides and controls, and is guided and controlled by the civil power; and, in the second place, Liberalism, if I know anything of it, is the expression of the voice of the people's heart. In the practical politics of the Party, therefore, religion still lives, and moves, and has its being. It is unnecessary for me to make any defence for Nonconformists. The Wesleyans have sent, as a protest to this House, one of the most solemn documents ever laid before it,—on the matter of the Oath. The fact, then, really amounts to this—that all this while Liberals and Nonconformists have been seeing what, I am sorry to say, some hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House as well as on that have been blind to—namely, that the maintenance of a man's rights has nothing on earth to do with complicity with his views. In conclusion, I will say that fortunate, most fortunate, do I hold it to be that the Leader of this House in such a crisis as this is the right hon. Gentleman whom his Queen and country alike have called to occupy that exalted post. In him all alike can place reliance when the cause of religion is at stake. Not unwilling will he be that I should recall to this House, to his Party, but to the new Members most of all, words which, in 1872, he used in an address to students at Liverpool—

“In preparing yourselves for the combat of life I beg you to take this also into your account, that the spirit of denial is abroad, and that it has challenged all religion, but especially the religion we profess, to the combat of life and death.”

Having regard to those words, and to many others of like import which have fallen from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman, I am prepared faithfully and trustfully to follow him into the Lobby to which this Resolution will lead, believing that—where religion is in question—if I may use the old simile of the ship of the State, no counter seas will make his hand to waver on the wheel, no passing clouds divert his vision from the lode-star of our ancient faith.

MR. NORTHCOTE approached the question from a very young Member's point of view, and not from considerations ultra-legal or ultra-ecclesiastical. He was one of three Conservative Members who supported the original proposition of the Government that the case should be referred to a Select Committee. He wished to say a few words about the allegations that the Conservative Party nourished some personal animosity against Mr. Bradlaugh, and that they were actuated in their conduct by a desire to obtain an electioneering advantage. As for the charge of personal animosity, he could assure the House that he entertained no animosity towards Mr. Bradlaugh. With regard to the second allegation to which he had referred, he would remind the House that it was not the Conservative Party who initiated the proceedings against Mr. Bradlaugh. The person who originally expressed a doubt as to whether Mr. Bradlaugh could or could not affirm was the Speaker himself, and upon such doubt being expressed, Her Majesty's Government chose a Select Committee to inquire into the matter, and ascertain whether, under the circumstances, Mr. Bradlaugh was in a position to make an Affirmation. It was perfectly open to the Government to have accepted that Report; and, therefore, the Conservatives could hardly be blamed for loyally taking up the Report of a Committee which the Government itself had proposed. Then, the Conservative Party were charged with endeavouring to keep Mr. Bradlaugh out of the House for political reasons; and he thought before imputing to the Conservative Party that they were actuated in their proceedings by merely an electioneering desire, it would be more regular to inquire what the real circumstances of the case were. What the Conservative Party were doing was to support the decision arrived at by the two Committees that were appointed to consider the question, and they were not opposing the Resolution for any electioneering purposes. It was hard that they should be accused of having waited till the eleventh hour before taking action. Had they not been told that they had no right to take Mr. Bradlaugh's previous conduct into account? How, then, could they do otherwise than assume, until Mr. Bradlaugh's conduct showed that the assumption was wrong, that the opinions of that gentleman had undergone sufficient change to allow him to go through the proper forms before taking his seat? So far as he understood the whole question, he could not see how the Committees could have come to any other decision than the one they did arrive at. In conclusion, he protested against the Conservative Party being accused of attempting to keep Mr. Bradlaugh out of the House to suit their own purposes, and stated that they were simply supporting the decisions of the two Committees, both of which were appointed by the Government. If the Resolution of the Prime Minister was not passed, and Mr. Bradlaugh was unable to take his seat in the House, a very simple course was open to the Government—a course that had been advocated by almost every newspaper, and many persons outside the walls of that House—namely, that the Government should introduce some measure the effect of which should be to permit Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat. If that course were adopted by the Government there would be no captious opposition from any Gentleman on that side of the House. He trusted that the House would support the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon.

MR. W. CORBET said, that as an Irish Catholic, representing a constituency the majority of whom were Catholics, he felt himself under a solemn obligation to enter his earnest and unqualified protest against any measure having for its aim or object the facilitating the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh into that House. In saying that he believed he was not only expressing his own sentiments, but those of men of every shade of opinion, religious or political, in the county he had the honour to represent (Wicklow). Concurring as he did to the fullest extent with those hon. Gentlemen who had from the first declared themselves against opening the door of the House to Mr. Bradlaugh, he was forced to the conclusion that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, whose character he (Mr. Corbet) held in the highest estimation, had on that occasion allowed his well-known constitutional liberality to lead him to overstep, or rather to wish altogether to obliterate, the broad and distinct line of demarcation which existed, and which it was to be hoped ever would exist, between hon. Members of that House and those classes of the community with whom Mr. Bradlaugh had striven so effectually and so successfully to identify himself. In his earnest desire and, as he (Mr. Corbet) believed, anxiety to be just to an individual, the Prime Minister was pursuing a course calculated to give mortal offence not merely to a small section of the community, but to the whole people of the United Kingdom, minus the demented electors of Northampton. The last thing which anyone would dream of alleging against the right hon. Gentleman was that he had any sympathy with Mr. Bradlaugh's Besantine doctrines of morality or avowed Atheism. They had been admonished by the Treasury Bench to avoid introducing any element of passion into the discussion of that most odious question; but it was impossible calmly to contemplate the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh into that Assembly. Outside that door clamouring to take his seat, not amid the political outcasts of fortune, but among the upright and virtuous followers of Her Majesty's Government, there was one who, judged by his own antecedents, out of his own lips, and by his widely disseminated and scandalous writings, was the human embodiment of the reverse of virtue. Catholics held that there was but one infallible authority on earth in the matter of faith and morals. Having had the advantage of reading a celebrated literary production and of observing the course taken during the progress of those debates, he thought he might hazard the conjecture that that authority was not the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government.

SIR HENRY JACKSON expressed regret that there should be imported into every discussion upon this question so much pietistic declamation, and so much abuse. He held that it would be altogether more consistent with the usages of the House, and also with the practice of gentlemen, if they were allowed to debate that matter as a question of principle, avoiding those too frequent personal allusions to the unfortunate individual who had given rise to that discussion. This had been an unfortunate affair from beginning to end. It was, no doubt, an extreme case. Hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House were battling, first of all, for what they considered to be the cause of civil and religious liberty, served up, he owned, with not very savoury sauce on that occasion. But the question would never have arisen, and they would never have been put on their mettle, if the person referred to were an ordinary person and one who would be welcome to the House. Personal objection was the cause of all the hot debate and strong sentiments they had heard. He protested, however, against personal dislike being substituted for the real question before the House, to the consideration of which he desired to recall the debate. The Motion before them was intended to extricate the House from the difficult position in which it had been placed by the adoption of the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) on the 22nd of June. That Resolution, which now stood recorded on the Journals of the House, declared in so many words that Mr. Bradlaugh should not be permitted either to take the Oath or to make the Affirmation mentioned in the Statute. That declaration was without any limit of time or any condition whatever. But the Statute Law of the country expressly directed that every Member of the House—a term which clearly included Mr. Bradlaugh—was to do one or other of the two things which the Resolution of the 22nd of June said Mr. Bradlaugh should not do. The Statute was perfectly plain. It in simple words enacted that the Oath should be taken by every Member at the Table in the middle of the House. That was a duty thrown upon every Member, and there was only one exception to its obligation. That exception was found in this—that the Statute contemplated the possibility of some Members objecting to take the Oath. It was passed to remove difficulties which had arisen in practice as to taking the Oath; and to meet and provided for this difficulty it provide that if a Member objected to take the Oath, there was an alternative course opened for him—that of making an Affirmation. But either Oath or Affirmation he must take. From one or other there was no escape. One of the most unfortunate features in the history of this controversy was that there had been separate References, each embracing only one-half of the question, to two distinct Committees. He could not doubt that if the whole question had been sent to one Committee, the Report of that Committee would have adopted the view the conclusion to which the House was invited to come by the Prime Minister—namely, that no Member was to be prevented from doing that which the law said he should do—was a proper conclusion. He could not but believe that if one Committee had considered both branches of this question together, and as a whole, they must have determined that Mr. Bradlaugh could and must either affirm or take the Oath. His own conviction was that he might affirm, and that having claimed to affirm he could not take the Oath. He had also a strong conviction that if the Report of either of these Committees had been contrary to what it was, hon. Gentlemen opposite would have asserted the right of the House to decide for itself on this matter. ["Hear, hear!"] Well, that was the very thing the House were now asked by the Government to do. Unless they modified the unfortunate Resolution which now stood on the Journals of the House, they would be preventing a Member from complying with the obligations of the Act of Parliament. He was bound to admit that the suggestion of the second Committee, that the matter should be left to be decided by a Court of Law, was not altogether satisfactory. It seemed to him to be rather a flabby conclusion. What he should have been glad to see the second Committee do was to have stated that, in their judgment, the first Committee had not considered the matter adequately as a whole, and were wrong in their view. Had they taken this course the present embarrassment would have been less; but even as it was, the House could do no harm by agreeing to the invitation of the Prime Minister. Taking the Oath, or making an Affirmation, was not intended as a religious test, but only as a declaration of loyalty. Mr. Bradlaugh was desirous of carrying out the mandate of his constituents, by complying with the obligation of the law and taking his seat, and in preventing him from doing it in the manner prescribed by Statute the House itself was, in his (Sir Henry Jackson's) opinion, violating the law. The law said he should not do it until he had signified his allegiance to his Sovereign, and that this could be done by an action purely secular. He failed to see what injury Parliament would sustain by dispensing with the Oath in this case, and allowing the hon. Member to substitute a Declaration of his allegiance.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, that the decision of the first Committee was said to have been appealed against, and was overruled by the decision of the second Committee. He could only say, as was said by his right hon. Friend the late Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir R. Aassheton Cross), that had he known that the second Committee was intended to be an appeal from the first Committee, he should not have felt it his duty to take a seat in that Committee. The only proper tribunal to which to appeal from a Committee of that House was the full House itself; and, in his opinion, that was the proper course for Her Majesty's Government to have taken. It was said that the recommendation of the second Committee reversing the decision of the first Committee and allowing Mr. Bradlaugh to affirm, had been carried by a majority of 12 to 9, while the Report of the first Committee had been carried by a majority of 1, but to this 9 should be added, the Chairman and the late Attorney General, who was then absent; and it would be seen the real majority in the second Committee was also 1; and the fact was that that majority was brought about solely by the change of side by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood). It appeared to him quite clear that Mr. Bradlaugh could not be permitted to take the Oath or make an Affirmation. If at the Table of the House he had not made the claim to affirm by virtue of the Evidence Amendment Act, 1869-70, he would have been able to take the Oath without a question being raised; but, seeing that Mr. Bradlaugh called the attention of the Speaker to his claim, the House had a right to interfere. His (Mr. Staveley Hill's) view with regard to the right to affirm was this. Originally both witnesses in Courts of Law and Members of that House were required absolutely to take the Oath; but the rigid rule had been gradually relaxed, both in Courts of Justice and in that House, in favour of those who entertained religious scruples against taking an oath. The legislation on this subject, however, had never gone so far with regard to that House as it had with regard to Courts of Justice, and the law allowing Affirmations to be taken in that House not only with reference to this promissory Oath, but even to the Oath of testimony also, as shown by the Act of 1871, only went as far as that which was conceded for Courts of Justice in 1854. He denied that it was possible to construe one set of Acts by the other set. He was of opinion, therefore, that Mr. Bradlaugh was not a person entitled under the Act of Parliament to make an Affirmation; and if, at the same time, it had been rightly held that he could not take the Oath, what course should be followed? The bringing forward of this subject was a great misfortune; but if Mr. Bradlaugh had not himself raised the question, he could have taken the Oath, and nothing more would have been heard of him; but he (Mr. Staveley Hill) submitted that it would have been impossible for hon. Members to have sat there and witnessed an act which in itself would have been utterly ludicrous. The Prime Minister was inaccurate in stating that the objection had originated with the Clerk at the Table, because all that the latter had done had been to ask Mr. Bradlaugh by what right he claimed to affirm, a question which it was right and necessary to put to those claiming to make an Affirmation. The Prime Minister, who had not completely stated what had taken place on previous occasions, now asked—"What else can we do than appeal to the House?" The Committee, he (Mr. Staveley Hill) submitted, that sat last to consider the question, had all the precedents before them relating to the Parliamentary Oath, and it was proved to be the clear practice of Parliament that where a Member declined to take the Oath when it was tendered to him, or was unwilling to take the Oath, or in the judgment of the House was not a proper person to whom the Oath should be administered, the course had always been to declare the seat vacant, and to issue a new Writ. In 1620 occurred the precedent of Sir John Lee, who had been in the House for some time and had not taken the Oath. In spite of his willingness to take the Oath a new Writ was issued. Another precedent was that of Sir H. Monson, in 1689, in whose case a new Writ was issued because he had not taken the Oath, and had not attended the service of the House. He might mention also the precedent of Lord Fanshawe; but the best case in point was furnished by John Archdale, the Quaker Member for Chipping Wycombe in 1698. In his case the Speaker acquainted the House that he had received from Archdale a sealed letter, to the effect that he had not opposed the wishes of the burgesses when he found them desirous of electing him, and that, if the House would permit him to do so without taking the Oath, he was ready to execute his trust. The House having heard the letter read and the Statutes, Mr. Archdale came in, and the Speaker, by direction of the House, asked him whether he would take the Oath. That he declined to do on account of the principles of his religion, and a new Writ was ordered to issue. Now, as far as Parliamentary requirements went, that was the closest parallel he could find to the case of the hon. Member for Northampton. Having regard to those precedents, the course that the Government ought to have taken was sufficiently obvious. All further trouble would have been avoided if the manly course had been adopted of issuing a new Writ. If Mr. Bradlaugh was still loved by the people of Northampton, in spite of his vagaries, and again returned, then he could have walked up to the Table and taken the Oath, and no more would have been heard of the matter; if not returned, the contention would equally have been at an end, and the House could have calmly proceeded to legislate for any future similar case. As it was, he hoped the House would not affirm the Resolution of the Prime Minister—one that would allow Mr. Bradlaugh, by a sort of side wind, to take his seat, and so frustrate the previous Resolution it had arrived at. One thing was clear, that it would not be right to invite Mr. Bradlaugh to affirm at his own peril. If, in consequence of the action of the House, he incurred a penalty, the House would be bound in common fairness to give him an indemnity.

MR. BUTT held that the action of the House had not been in accordance with the law, and hon. Members ought to be very glad at the eleventh hour to recede from the false position they had taken up. The Oath of Allegiance was never designed for the purposes to which it had been diverted by the recent Resolution; for the House, by excluding Mr. Bradlaugh, would practically convert it into a religious test. No one could help thinking it strange that the law itself should be invoked in order to prevent the hon. Member from complying with its requirements. Sir Erskine May had stated distinctly that there was no precedent for refusing to allow a man who presented himself at the Table to take the Oath from taking it. There were certain oaths at present which a man was entitled to take in the Courts of Law, even although he were an Atheist. Until a very recent period every answer in Chancery had to be sworn by the defendant. Was the suggestion ever made that a man upon whom the law imposed the duty of making his answer in Chancery upon oath was prevented from doing so because he was an Atheist? The principle which underlay the whole matter was that when the law enjoined that an oath should be taken it would not step in to prevent its being taken. Taylor on Evidence, the highest authority in England upon the subject, quoted without disapproval, or rather with approval, an American authority who laid down that whether a person about to be sworn was an Atheist or not, the question could never be raised by anyone but the adverse party. In another place, the same authority said that there was nothing to prevent an Atheist from taking an oath of office, or from swearing a complaint before a magistrate, or from making oath in his answer in Chancery. Was he (Mr. Butt) not right, therefore, in saying that when the law enjoined on a Member of Parliament to take the Oath, it could not in the same breath say—"You shall not be allowed to take it?" The authority which he had already quoted also said that the law never allowed an objection of infidelity to be raised against any man seeking his own right before a Court of Justice. On what did the House proceed? On its own notion that the Oath had no binding effect on a person entertaining the opinions of Mr. Bradlaugh. The House was in danger of doing great injustice, when it prevented Mr. Bradlaugh from doing that which he said he was prepared to do. It was said Mr. Bradlaugh had obtruded his opinions on the House. Holding the opinions he did, Mr. Bradlaugh did not, perhaps, think himself justified in coming to the Table and swallowing the Oath without raising any question, or he might have raised the question in order to make political capital out of it. But, if it were so, it was no reason why, if he was otherwise minded to take the Oath, the House should prevent him. If notoriety were his object, the whole action of the House was aiding and abetting him in his desire. Was it fair, legal, or right towards his constituency to prevent Mr. Bradlaugh taking the Oath? Could any hon. Member doubt that in a contest between the House and Mr. Bradlaugh's constituency the House would ultimately be beaten? If the views which hon. Members opposite entertained of Mr. Bradlaugh's aims were correct, they were, by the action they took, playing most completely into his hands, and the longer they kept him out of the House the greater would be his ultimate triumph when he took his seat, as he assuredly would. It was for the interest, dignity, and honour of the House that it should adopt some Resolution, putting an end to the present situation.

Mr. Butt

MR. PARNELL said, it was with the utmost reluctance that, as an Irish Protestant, a member of the Synod of the Protestant Church of Ireland, and the parochial nominator of his parish, chosen by the votes of his fellow-Protestants to that office, he wished to explain his reasons for the vote which he intended to give for the Resolution of the Prime Minister. He could not recollect any time when he had felt greater timidity, less confidence in the result of the action which he was about to take, or less confident in the belief that the mass of the Irish people were behind him than upon the present occasion. In his past political life he had always felt that his action would be understood and appreciated by his constituents; but, upon the present occasion, he was bound to believe there was, at all events, very great risk of its being misunderstood. His religion, however, taught him to be just and fear not; and although a man might be placed under a temporary cloud or a temporary disqualification, he thought and felt convinced that, in the long run, if he acted according to the just dictates of his own conscience, every right-thinking man at home in Ireland would ultimately come to his support. Now, why did he intend to vote for the Resolution of the Prime Minister? Because he believed that the law entitled Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat in that House, and he objected to that method of making law by Parliamentary Resolution. If those Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House desired to keep Mr. Bradlaugh out of the House—and who said they desired to do so, because the law was against his views—if they desired what they said, why did they not legally test the question? But what had they done? They had prevented any legal test from being taken; they had deliberately prevented the action of the ordinary law of the land; and they had deliberately prevented an important constituency like Northampton from having its right of representation in the House of Commons. Now, a cry had been raised against him (Mr. Parnell) in Ireland that he was an Atheist, because he voted for the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh. He wished to say that Mr. Bradlaugh's religious tenets and his doctrines with reference to over-population were abominable; but because he (Mr. Parnell) objected to that Gentleman's doctrines on those questions was not a sufficient reason why he should go contrary to the law. Catholic Members for Ireland had felt very strongly on the question—very strongly, indeed—and they had been told that they ought to recollect that it was once sought to keep them out, just as it was now sought to keep Mr. Bradlaugh out. But he would ask the Catholic Members what did they fear? Did they fear that their religion would be injured by Mr. Bradlaugh's introduction to the House? ["No, no!"] If they did not, then upon what principle did they proceed? He had listened carefully to many of the speeches of his Catholic Friends from Ireland, and it had appeared to him that they had argued that it was their duty as Catholics to keep Mr. Bradlaugh out of the House lest their religion should be injured by his introduction. ["No, no!"] Then, for what other reason did they object to his coming there? An appeal had been made to Catholic Ireland. They had been told that that little Island was the last country that had resisted the inroads of Continental infidelity, and that unless they desired that that odious thing should creep into Ireland, they must keep Mr. Bradlaugh out of the House. Well, that surely seemed to indicate a fear on the part of Irish Catholics that their religion might be injured by Mr. Bradlaugh's introduction into the House; but were they entitled really to look at it from that point of view? Were they, as Catholics, entitled to say—"Because we are Catholics, we object to Mr. Bradlaugh?" For they must recollect exactly the same argument was used against their own admission. Why were Catholics deprived of their civil rights for centuries? Why were they prevented from coming into that House? It was because Protestants feared that the admission of Catholics would injure the Protestant religion, and it was because the majority of Protestants began to see that even if they had that fear, it was an unworthy fear, and a fear that they ought not to allow to influence them in considering the civil rights of their fellow-men, that Catholics were at last admitted to the same civil and religious rights as Protestants. They must never forget that, in dealing with this subject, if they once admitted the principle that they were entitled to object to a man because his doctrines were likely to injure their religion, they struck at the very root of civil and religious liberty, and that was why he felt it his duty to do that which was personally odious to him. It was a personally odious task for him to undertake to vote for the admission of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) to that House; but if he had to walk through that Lobby by himself, he should feel himself a coward if he refused to do so.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he was very glad to be able to follow his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) who had spoken last, in order to assure him that he (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) should be sorry if any Catholic Member from Ireland rose to reply to him, and used a single word which would imply a failure to appreciate his honesty, his devotion, his sincerity, and his patriotism. The liberality of his (Mr. A. M. Sullivan's) co-religionists who elected a Protestant Gentleman like the hon. Member for Cork to represent them would be only hypocrisy and sham, if they expected their Member to speak on a question like this otherwise than as a conscientious Protestant; and no one would be more ready to defend the hon. Member against any such aspersions as he had anticipated than would his Catholic fellow-Members. His hon. Friend, however, had spoken in the same way that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House had spoken the other night for the abolition of tests, and not on the question before the House; and in the spirit of that speech he invited the hon. Member to vote for the Amendment he (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) had placed on the Paper. But the speech was beside the question now before the Chair. He (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) had listened to the speech of the Prime Minister that night, and it was a serious speech and a critical one for him, for the House, and for the country. The onus lay upon the right hon. Gentleman to justify to the House the proposition he had submitted for their consideration. The House had ere now rescinded Resolutions and abolished or modified its religious or political tests; but, he asked, had the right hon. Gentleman in his speech been able to quote one single precedent where a Resolution of the House had been rescinded by such a side wind as he now proposed? He had not even fortified the consciences of his devoted followers by citing one single precedent during 500 years of the House of Commons to show where a religious test had been abolished in a manner at all comparable to that now submitted to the House? There was great danger in dealing with a question introduced by the Prime Minister, because of his eloquence and skill and the admiration most of them had for him. But he would ask the House to consider whether this was a Motion to satisfy an individual, or to remove the grievance of a class? Was it a capitulation to Mr. Bradlaugh? If it was not a capitulation to threats of violence and disorder, then was it an amendment of the law, which amendment experience had shown to be necessary and right? The police motive avowedly animated the present proposition. But, consider the view of the case which was academically taken in the country—namely, that this was a removal of a grievance which oppressed a class—what class was oppressed? They were told in a novel that a Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was informed that the Cork Militia was in the Castle yard, and when he went out to inquire for it, a single voice responded—"Here I am, your Excellency." What class was aggrieved by their present rules? "Here I am," might respond the hon. Gentleman sitting under the Gallery. That was the class. What other class had petitioned declaring that they were without representation? He would never vote for excluding any appreciable section of the nation from fair representation. The oppression of minorities had been the corner stone of tyranny in the history of Europe. Where was the class that was oppressed now? It was nothing but an individual. If there had been a class, it would have imitated other classes in petitioning for representation for ten, or five, or two years. They would have imitated other classes for whom the House had waived tests. Whenever before in the history of their proceedings had the House responded to the first knock of a class or of an individual? Did the first Catholic find a Prime Minister to admit him in the first instance? Or did the first Jew who was so conscientious that he was excluded for years? For 30 years his co-religionists had trod the thorny path leading to Catholic Emancipation, during which period successive Ministries were made and unmade upon the question; and yet when a Catholic came to the Table and could not take the Oath he represented a nation of 8,000,000. But he had a conscience, and once he said he would not swear he did not swear. Even after Emancipation was passed, O'Connell had to go back to Clare and be re-elected, because the Act was not retrospective. But was Mr. Bradlaugh, who represented himself, to be dealt with in a more liberal, tolerant, and generous way? Then there were the Jews. He supposed he should be classed with the Ultramontane bigots—"Hear, hear!"—he understood that cheer; but he spoke of the emancipation of the Jews, because he had read with sympathy and with respect of the struggles of that cruelly-oppressed race, and he was proud to think that the Irish Members of that day supported their emancipation. But when Alderman Salomons came into the House no Prime Minister rose to propose not merely an amendment of the law, but a retrospective Resolution. That great honour was reserved for Mr. Bradlaugh. The Prime Minister rested his case very little on there being a class grievance; but he based it mainly on police considerations. An avowal had been made that night by the Premier of England which, two years ago, he (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) would have thought to be impossible—namely, that the proper way whereby the House should prevent a Gentleman forcing his way to the mace and remaining there as long as he pleased was to let him have what he demanded. If that were not done, and if the House did not pass under the Caudine forks, they were told that Mr. Bradlaugh, evening after evening, might come there and bully them—the Commons of the Empire. Why, since the bauble was removed from the Table, and armed men scattered the Members of the House, no such outrage as that had been committed on it. Was the reign of rowdiness again to be introduced, so that, on the threat of disorder and physical violence, they were to go on their knees and say—"Dear Mr. Bradlaugh, spare us from such scenes, and for police considerations you shall have all that you require?" His Friend, Mr. Plimsoll, gained something by standing in the midst of the floor and shaking his fist at the then Premier; but if Mr. Plimsoll were then a Member of the House, he (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) could tell him that if he only threatened to come down, grasp the mace, and say—"Let me see who is able to put me out," the Prime Minister would counsel the House, with a view to escape from scenes of disorder and violence, they should pass the Merchant Shipping Bill. That was the only reason for the Motion before the House. ["No, no!"] If that was not the animating motive of the Resolution, why should the Government hesitate to accept his (Mr. A. M. Sullivan's) Amendment, which adopted their own view, but applied it prospectively, not retrospectively. For himself, he was opposed to tests where they were designed to disfranchise any section of the nation; therefore it was that he placed his Amendment on the Paper. He would appeal to that section of the Liberal Party which sat opposite, who were really at one with him on the question, to support him. They, too, as he did, desired to abolish religious tests; and if Party compulsion were removed from them, they would make the proposed emancipation consonant with all precedent; for never before had it been retrospective. He thought that it was more manly to honestly avow that he was conscious that he was moved in this matter by what some might call religious prejudices, than to pretend that he was not moved by some such feeling; but they were not prejudices of that narrow kind which would make a bigot seek to oppress all those who were not of his own religious belief. His was, he hoped, a broader and a wider view. He looked abroad, and he confessed his mind was overshadowed by a gloomy fear that there were days in store for Europe darker than any which had gone by for probably some hundreds of years. The very basis of the social edifice in every land was being ruthlessly assailed—and assailed by the stealthy step of men like him on whose behalf they were now asked to change the British Constitution. It was not because of Mr. Bradlaugh's religious opinions alone—though these were to him abhorrent—that he would refuse to violate all rule and precedent in extending to him the privileges of a Member of the House; it was because of other of his principles, which, taken in conjunction with his Atheistic opinions, struck fatally at the foundation of civil society, as they knew it; and, therefore, he said that the Resolution would mark a turning point in the Parliamentary history of England. What the House was about to do was, not to accomplish a triumph for the principles of religious liberty, but to register high on the door-post of the House of Commons the flood-mark of unbelief and infidelity. Yet, would it not be well when Nihilism in Russia, Communism in France, Socialism in Germany, and Atheism in many lands, were threatening Thrones and Constitutions, if they in England—Jews, Protestants, and Catholics—were to join hands in holy reverence round the shrine of religious belief, and act upon the grand old Constitutional principle—Honour the King and worship God?

MR. RICHARD: Sir, I should like to be allowed to make a few observations on the subject before the House, because, with the exception of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), I think no Nonconformist has yet taken part in these discussions. I have listened to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) with great admiration for its eloquence, but with unspeakable astonishment at the principles it enunciated. Indeed, the hon. and learned Gentleman seems to base his objection to Mr. Bradlaugh's claims on no principle whatever. It is with him a mere question of number and time. He appears to think that the admission of men to the enjoyment of their civil and political rights depends upon how many they are. Mr. Bradlaugh is only one man; therefore, he must be rejected. But surely one man is as much entitled to justice as 100,000 men. Then, says my hon. and learned Friend, you ought not to admit him at once. If he perseveres long enough, and knocks at the door of the House year after year, then my hon. and learned Friend will go himself and open the door to him. Indeed, he carried this curious theory of keeping men waiting for their rights, so far that he seemed actually to justify the course taken by the Protestants of this country in shutting out so long his own fellow-religionists from this House. But how can that which is wrong now become right six or seven years hence? There have been, throughout this debate, two questions constantly cropping up of very unequal significance are advertising Mr. Bradlaugh and his doctrines over the country and over the world. They have raised him to a pinnacle if not of popularity, at least of notoriety, which makes him the observed of all observers. They are enabling him to pose, if such be his ambition, as a hero and a martyr before his own followers. Nay, they have done more. I do not know how other Members have fared. But within the last two or three weeks I have been deluged with pamphlets and papers containing extracts from the writings of Mr. Bradlaugh and his associates—the most offensive the compilers could find—and very offensive some of them are. And these are, I suppose, scattered broadcast through the country; and thus hon. Gentlemen opposite, most unwittingly and unintentionally, I am sure, but practically and in effect, are becoming the agents and missionaries of Mr. Bradlaugh. I am told there is a great rush of demand for his publications, and I am quite certain of this, that there is no town or city in this country in which, if Mr. Bradlaugh were announced to speak, a room would be found large enough to hold the people who would flock to see and hear him. I formerly voted for the Motion of the sitting Member for Northampton, and I shall now vote for the Motion of the Prime Minister without the slightest hesitation, and, in doing so, I am not voting for Mr. Bradlaugh. I am voting for a great principle, for which the Nonconformists have been contending for 200 years; and if that be not the principle for which they have been contending, I do not know what it is—namely, this—that we have no right, as a condition of admitting a man to the enjoyment of his civil and political rights, to take into account his opinions on religion at all. For my part, I should be glad if the whole system of swearing in admitting Members to this House could be dispensed with. To many of us it seems little better than a solemn farce, or rather a farce not at all solemn, but with a painful touch of profanity in it. No man who watched what was going on on the first day of the present Parliament, when hon. Members were crowding and squeezing around the Table laid out in the centre of the House, and scrambling for the New Testaments that were scattered upon it, amid jokes and good-humoured merriment—no man, I say, could have watched that scene and believed that what we were doing had anything about it of the solemnity of a religious act. I disclaim utterly the idea of serving the cause of Christianity by any amount of swearing. I think I have more faith in the vitality of the Christian religion than some hon. Gentlemen opposite. I believe its existence and prevalence in the world do not depend much upon anything that Courts or Parliaments or Governments might do or abstain from doing. If we look back to its past history we shall find that its earliest and noblest triumphs were achieved when it had all the Courts and Governments and Parliaments of the world against it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), in the very able and effective speech he delivered early in these discussions, said, referring to the Book which is the instrument of the Oath, that he hoped it is a Book we all revere. Well, I hope so too. But I venture to suggest to him and other hon. Gentlemen that there is a better way of showing our reverence to that Book than by kissing its binding, and that is by giving heed in our national life to its principles and precepts. We are told that we ought to maintain our character as a Christian nation. But how can we become, or how can we remain, a Christian nation? Not by putting Christianity into an Act of Parliament. Not by formal acts of homage as a part of a public pageant. No! but by imbuing the national sentiment with a Christian spirit, by fashioning our public policy in accordance with Christian principles. What is the value of a formal acknowledgment made by the lip, or by certain acts of pompous ceremony, when all that may co-exist with a policy which is in utter contempt of the essential principles of that very religion to which this elaborate outward reverence is rendered, with unequal and oppressive laws, with unjust wars, with restless and reckless aggression on the rights and territories of other nations, with a policy of ambition, selfishness and greed? If we would be a Christian Legislature, let us guide our deliberations by a Christian spirit, and fashion our policy according to a Christian standard, and by such means we shall do more to deserve and secure for ourselves that character than by all the oaths ever invented and imposed upon the unwilling consciences of mankind.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF (who spoke amid much and continued interruption) said, that he had never lavished anathemas upon the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), and that he had confined himself exclusively to the legal question as to whether the hon. Member was or was not entitled to take the Oath. His own opinion was that the difficulties in which the House was involved were entirely owing to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who had been endeavouring from the first to evade the responsibility of his position and to throw it upon others. At the outset of the proceedings the right hon. Gentleman was not in the House; but his Delegate moved that a Committee should be appointed to consider the question of Mr. Bradlaugh's right to affirm. That Committee decided against him, and when the hon. Member presented himself at the Table for the purpose of taking the Oath, he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had deemed it his duty to object to his doing so. The right hon. Gentleman then again shifted the responsibility to the shoulders of another Committee, and when the Report of that Committee was presented, the right hon. Gentleman allowed the sitting Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) to take the matter into his own hands. Later on the right hon. Gentleman again abdicated his functions as Leader of the House. In the Resolution he now brought forward the right hon. Gentleman did not even venture to affirm any doctrine, but attempted to shift the responsibility of his position upon some one on this side of the House—to some common informer—who was to be left to assert the privileges of Parliament, because the right hon. Gentleman evaded the responsibility of his position. [Uproar.] He should insist on his right to be heard. ["Oh!"] He should not be put down by clamour. The Prime Minister would allow the Member for Northampton to affirm with the collusion of the House; but if he were to be allowed to do so, he could not speak or vote in the House without having a millstone round his neck; for his every act would be illegal, and he might be subjected to great and grievous penalties. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) was perfectly ready to submit to the verdict of the country on the subject, because he was satisfied that the views which he held on this question were the views of the mass of the people of this country. He was convinced the Prime Minister was running with the hare and hunting with the hounds. In the past when any question of the admission of a Member arose, the case was decided either by a Committee or by legislation; but the Prime Minister would not follow either of these precedents. He would allow Mr. Bradlaugh to affirm, though two Committees had decided against him. ["No, no!"] He ought either to have accepted the decisions of the Committees, or have brought in a Bill to allow Atheists to sit in Parliament.

MR. M'COAN said, at the commencement of the debate, he had no intention of taking any part in it, and, as a new Member, he should not long detain the House. He respected and admired the courage and honesty of the Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell), whose speech he had listened to with pleasure; but he did not think his views would be popular in Ireland. ["Oh, oh!"] In saying that, he spoke as being himself a Protestant Member, representing a county of considerable size. He was intimately acquainted with the feelings of the North and the East of Ireland, and the opinion of Ireland, he believed, would be against the Resolution. ["No!"] He regretted that the subject had been turned into a question of mere Nisi Prius. They had had too much of legal argument, and he, therefore, eliminated that element altogether, and came to what seemed to him the real question. The issue before the House was clear—whether the doors of that Christian Legislature should be thrown open and Atheism invited to come in. The particular issue, indeed, was even more than that. It was not simply Atheism, but Atheism in its most revolting form, in the person, teaching, and character of the Member for Northampton. He had no wish to indulge in rhetorical abuse; but nowhere could there be found a more offensive representative of Atheism than Mr. Bradlaugh. ["Oh, oh!"]

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that he should be guarded in his language. The person to whom he was alluding was a Member of that House, and should not be referred to in such a manner.

MR. M'COAN said, he bowed to the ruling of the Chair, and would withdraw the expression complained of. The question was not whether the Legislature should be un-Christianized, but whether the highest element of authority should be eliminated from it, and it should cease to be a Legislature fitting to rule a Christian country. In connection with the question, he could not help complaining that many false analogies had been raised on the opposite side of the House. The position of Mr. Bradlaugh had been likened to the former position of Roman Catholics, Jews, and Quakers; but he saw no analogy whatever between the cases, because the present was not properly a religious question at all. Having listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard), who spoke as a Nonconformist, he (Mr. M'Coan) must say that he failed to recognize in it the Nonconformity of which he had any knowledge; and it was inconceivable to him how a Gentleman of the hon. Member's antecedents could express the opinions he had done, for they seemed to him nothing more nor less than an attempted palliation of Atheism. He concluded by asking whether any constituency, be it that of Northampton or any other, had the right to foist upon the House of Commons a person against whom their highest instincts revolted?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he believed the course suggested by the Resolution of the right. hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) was the course best adapted for relieving the House from the position of serious embarrassment in which they found themselves. He did not think there could be any doubt that, as a result of the vote given a week ago, the House was placed in a position of great embarrassment. ["No, no!"] Some hon. Members opposite seemed to dissent from that view. All he could say was, that they did not seem to have any Representatives in the Press of this country, or anywhere outside the House. Article upon article had been published by journalists of every shade of politics, commenting upon the difficulty of the position in which the House was placed. He was astonished that any persons who remembered the scene that took place last Wednesday week should represent that the House was not embarrassed in consequence of the vote to which he had referred. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) had moved that Mr. Bradlaugh be committed to custody, and next evening had moved for his release; but what suggestion had he given for relieving the House from the danger of a repetition of such scenes as had been witnessed? He wanted to know what remedy the right hon. Gentleman would suggest? Supposing Mr. Bradlaugh had presented himself at the Table on the night after his release, what course would the right hon. Member opposite have advocated? Would Mr. Bradlaugh have been committed to the custody of the Serjeant at Arms for the remainder of the Session? ["Hear, hear!"] Some hon. Members said "Hear, hear!" but he doubted very much whether that course would have been really expedient and calculated to further the interests of the House. What was the situation? The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) having been elected by the constituency, and being willing to adopt either of the courses which the statute prescribed, the House refused him permission to do so, and thus refused to let him take his seat. Did hon. Members, then, suppose that it was probable that Mr. Bradlaugh would remain tranquilly content with that state of things? Did they think it probable that the constituency of Northampton would be content with that state of things? The constituency had elected Mr. Bradlaugh to represent, not their religious views, but their politics; and they had not elected him in consequence of his own religious views. According to the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan), it was in the highest degree to be deprecated that they should allow a class of any appreciable extent to be unrepresented. But it seemed to be of no importance whatever to him if they prevented a constituency from being represented by the Member of its choice. The constituency of Northampton had chosen their Member, and if the law did not deny him the right of representing them, it was an injustice both to the constituency and to the man whom they had elected to keep him out of the House. It had been said that the question had been settled by the decision of a Committee. It, however, was never sent to a Committee for decision. When the Committee was moved for, the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) insisted that the decision of the Committee could not bind the House, and appealed to him (the Solicitor General)

to say whether it was intended that it should bind the House, and obtained from him an acknowledgment on behalf of the Government that it would not do so. All that the question was sent to the Committee for was in order that they might assist the House with their opinion. The Committee were almost equally divided. All that they did was to express their opinion, and that opinion was one of a most doubtful and doubting character; and he asked the House to bear this in mind, that if the minority of the Committee were right—and hon. Gentlemen opposite would allow that that was at least possible—then Mr. Bradlaugh was now, by the law, as it at present stood, legally entitled to sit in that House, and was kept out and prevented from taking his seat in violation of his legal right given to him by the statute law. If that were so, ought he to be deprived of that right because of the view which some of them took of his religious opinions? However much they might dislike Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions, it would be a violation of their duty to prevent him from having his legal rights. Some hon. Gentlemen had urged them to admit no Atheist, but to bar the door against him, unless he knocked very loudly, and then, perhaps, they would open it to him. ["No, no!"] But whether Mr. Bradlaugh was an Atheist or not was entirely beside the question if he had a legal right to sit in that House. He trusted that no hon. Members opposite would again contend that because they hated Mr. Bradlaugh's Atheism, he was to be deprived of any legal right he had. Well, the law, at any rate, was very doubtful. Some thought it was one way, others that it was another. What, then, was to be done? Did hon. Gentlemen really think that in a doubtful question of the construction of a statute, on which a man's legal rights depended, that House, after a heated religious discussion, was the best tribunal to decide the matter by a vote? It was profoundly important that they should do that which was just, but it was almost equally important that they should seem to do it. If they led men to think that they had not done that which was just, but had been actuated to do injustice by passion and prejudice, they would excite in the minds of public, who did not love more than they did the opinions of Mr. Bradlaugh, a feeling that he had suffered wrong; they would arouse a sentiment of sympathy for him, and induce people to feel a certain leaning towards him, and to desire his success. They would, in fact, be playing his game and extending his power and influence, because, if there was one thing more deeply rooted than another in the breasts of the people, it was a love of justice, a love of fair play, and a desire that every man, however obnoxious his opinions might be to others, might have no less than justice done to him. Did hon. Members think that the mass of the people would imagine that justice had been done when there was a doubt as to the legal right of a man to sit in that House, and the House by its own vote irrevocably and without appeal determined against that right, after hearing arguments addressed to its passions and its prejudices in a heated debate? The Resolution of the Prime Minister pointed out how complete justice might be done, and people be at the same time convinced that justice had been done. It proposed to give to Mr. Bradlaugh no more than his strict legal rights. But, on the other hand, if they refused to pass this Resolution, they might be depriving Mr. Bradlaugh of his legal and statutory rights. If he were allowed to affirm, and the law turned out to be what hon. Members opposite said it was, he would subject himself to a penalty, and his seat would be vacated. Legislation by Resolution had been spoken of; but that House could not legislate by Resolution, and, therefore, if they passed this Resolution, it would not give to Mr. Bradlaugh, in the eye of the law, one single right which he had not before, but it would enable him, if he had a right, to keep his seat, and if he had not a right to lose it, in due course of law. It had been said that to pass this Resolution would be contrary, in some way or other, to the dignity of the House. He was wholly unable to follow that reasoning. He believed there could be no false dignity than for the House to assume that they were the best tribunal to decide a question of law—the best body to perform functions eminently unfit for a Legislature. He denied that it was any breach of the dignity of the House to suggest that the construction of a very difficult and doubtful point of law, which the House had warmly discussed, should be referred to a legal tribunal. A doubt had been suggested whether a Court of Law could decide this question. He was unable to understand how such a doubt existed. He asserted with the utmost confidence that if Mr. Bradlaugh were sued for penalties, no Resolution of that House could for a moment stand in the way of those proceedings. It was said—"Once get Mr. Bradlaugh into the House, and no one will sue him for penalties." Those who said so must have very little confidence in their view of the law. Did they really believe that no one would speculate upon their law, with £500 as a prize? It was said that it was an indignity to ask Mr. Bradlaugh to come and make an Affirmation, and leave him afterwards to be sued for it. This Resolution did not invite Mr. Bradlaugh; he wished to come and make an Affirmation. All that the Resolution said was—"If Mr. Bradlaugh comes here to affirm, this House will no longer stand in his way." Hon. Gentlemen opposite suggested that there should be legislation on this subject. Was that suggestion seriously made? If a Bill were introduced would they support it? If they would not, then the suggestion was made not for the purpose of getting the House out of a difficulty, but with the benevolent intention of getting the Government into one. With one breath hon. Members opposite implored them to shut the door against Mr. Bradlaugh; with the next they said—"You ought to legislate." He might be forgiven, then, if he doubted the sincerity of some of the observations which had come from the Opposition. They were marked by want of sincerity and of straightforwardness, and were made rather with the view of embarrassing the Government than of relieving the House from the difficult position in which it was placed. Did hon. Gentlemen mean that if a Bill was introduced to admit Mr. Bradlaugh, they would support it? ["No, no!"] It had been said that if the Government would bring in a Bill on the subject, it would meet no factious opposition; but that meant that it would be opposed, possibly at every stage. He was convinced that such a measure would be opposed to an extent that would prevent the Government from carrying any other of their measures. [Laughter.] He understood the meaning of that laugh, and he now understood better than ever why hon.

The Solicitor General

Members opposite desired that the Government should introduce such a Bill. What was to be gained by a prolongation of this controversy? The course proposed by the Prime Minister would relieve the House from a great difficulty, and would relegate the question to the calm atmosphere of the Courts of Law. The Government were actuated by a desire to do what was right, wise, and prudent in this matter. He therefore trusted that the House would yet exhibit not only dignity in its proceedings, but practical wisdom and good sense, by adopting the proposal of the Government.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that several hours ago the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had recommended that this debate should be conducted in a calm and judicial spirit; and, for his part, he hoped that the speech to which they had just listened would not lead them to forget that recommendation. He hoped, also, that the House would come to the conclusion that nothing would be gained by the prolongation of this discussion. Whichever side of the House was right or wrong, they clearly understood the question at issue. He should not have felt it necessary to make the observations that he now felt it his duty to make, had it not been for one or two sentences which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister at the opening of the discussion. In his opinion, the question whether the House had anything to do with the case of a Member who came up to the Table in the ordinary way and asked to be sworn, did not enter at all into the subject before them. They were not discussing the question of the inquisitorial power of the House, though the second Committee had distinctly stated that the House had no power to interfere in such cases. They had declared that the House had no power to put any question to a Member coming up to be sworn, if he did not make any statement of his own. He did not wish to use the word in an offensive sense; but he could not help saying that Mr. Bradlaugh had flaunted or paraded his opinions upon the House, and he was sure that that was a statement which nobody could deny. He was sorry to say, however, that no less an authority than the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had denied the accuracy of that statement. It was, at all events, beyond doubt that Mr. Bradlaugh came to the Table with the avowed purpose of stating there that he was an Atheist. Mr. Bradlaugh, wishing to test the question, acted in such a way as to practically place before the House the fact that he was an avowed Atheist. He desired to state the matter as clearly as possible. Mr. Bradlaugh said—"I am an avowed Atheist, and, as such, I believe it is my right to affirm, and I claim my right." That was what Mr. Bradlaugh stated when he first came to the Table. But for the observation of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) should not have troubled the House with any remarks upon this part of the case. It was suggested by him that Mr. Bradlaugh had not assumed that attitude. Why? Because the right hon. Gentleman said that Mr. Bradlaugh did not state this until he was asked a question by the Clerk at the Table. That, however, was what he should call special pleading. The right hon. Gentleman apparently forgot that, after the letter which was written by Mr. Bradlaugh to the Speaker, the Clerk at the Table was bound to ask him under what statute he claimed to affirm. This was not done in an inquisitorial manner. It was the consequence of Mr. Bradlaugh's own act. It was only just to Mr. Bradlaugh to say that he came up as of right, and for the purpose of trying the question; and he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) found no fault with him in consequence of his claiming to affirm under that particular statute. It must not be supposed, therefore, that they were even suggesting that the House had any right to make an inquiry of its own if a Member presented himself to take the Oath without bringing to the Notice of the House such matters as Mr. Bradlaugh had referred to. This matter had been carefully inquired into by Select Committees, and the universal opinion of those Committees, in which the Law Officers of the Government joined, was that Mr. Bradlaugh claimed to affirm in consequence of having been allowed to make affirmation in a Court of Justice, and that he thereby stated that he had proved, to the satisfaction of the presiding Judge, that he was an Atheist. The next point upon which he wished the House to be clear was this—that this was no interference with the choice of any constituency. He thought he could prove, to the satisfaction of the House, that there was no such interference. No one wanted to interfere with the rights of any constituency; but a constituency was bound to elect only such persons as they were, by law, entitled to elect. For instance, a constituency could not persevere in returning a convict, a clergyman, or a public officer who was debarred from sitting in Parliament, because the statute limited the choice of the constituency, and excluded those persons. It was likewise provided by statute that no person could take his seat in the House of Commons, although he might have been elected, unless he took the Oath of Allegiance, except in those particular cases in which for conscience sake the Legislature had allowed him to affirm. Therefore, they must dismiss altogether from their minds the idea that the House was by any Resolution of its own attempting to interfere with the choice of a constituency. A constituency might elect whom it would, provided that the person was one of those not debarred by statute from sitting in Parliament, and provided that he made the Oath or Affirmation according to law. The only question, therefore, was whether the person who had been elected for Northampton could take the Oath or make the Affirmation which the statute required. There was another question upon which there should be no doubt in their minds. They were not then discussing, unfortunately, perhaps, the Bill which he held in his hand brought in by the sitting Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). A great deal had been said on both sides which would be apposite if they were discussing that Bill. The arguments of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard) would, no doubt, apply to that Bill; but they had nothing whatever to do with the question now before the House. The grievances which the hon. Member had mentioned were not relevant to the case, and his whole speech would have been more forcible from his point of view if the House had been discussing the Bill. As things were, however, he did not think that the hon. Member's speech had the least bearing upon the question. The law had made a broad distinction between the Oath and the Affirmation. By the Act 29th Elizabeth, the Oath of Allegiance was, as it were, the formal part of the Oath; the essential part of it being the appeal to the Supreme Being to witness the keeping of the promise. What was an affirmation? It was a personal promise on the faith and honour of a human being—at all events, he did not employ the appeal to the Supreme Being, unless, indeed, that appeal was included in the adverb “solemnly.” The Legislature having made that distinction, it seemed to him (Sir R. Assheton Cross) to strike some hon. Gentlemen in a peculiar way. He would take the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham’s (Mr. John Bright’s) arguments, both in the Committee and in that House. The right hon. Gentleman asked what difference there could be between the Oath and the Affirmation, if both were equally binding on the conscience, and had urged, if that was the case, the hon. Member in question should be allowed either to take the Oath, or, if he preferred it, to make the Affirmation. All he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) could say was, that that course was not in accordance with the law. If it were desired to alter the law, it would be necessary to discuss the Bill of the sitting Member for Northampton; but, if not, the law must be taken as they found it. The right hon. Member for Birmingham was not entitled to take the law as he would wish it to be. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had gone even further during this series of debates. In his first speech the right hon. Gentleman argued very strongly that Mr. Bradlaugh ought to be allowed to take the Oath, and, in doing so, he had completely thrown overboard the opinions of his own Secretary of State, and had placed himself under the banner of the hon. and learned Member for Preston (Sir John Holker). The Committee had, however, settled that question as far as a Committee could settle it, and had decided against allowing Mr. Bradlaugh to take the Oath by a great majority. The evidence of Mr. Bradlaugh showed that there was no appeal to the Supreme Being in his mind. Then the right hon. Gentleman said he would take the other side of the question, and see if the House would allow Mr. Bradlaugh to make the Affirmation. It would have, perhaps, been wiser for the right hon. Gentleman to have made up his mind, in the first instance, as to which side he would take. It was clear that, as the law stood, a man could not, according to his own preference, take the Oath, or make the Affirmation, because of the distinct line drawn between the two. If the right. hon. Gentleman would carry his memory back, he would find that he was perfectly willing, in the first instance, to allow the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) to take the Oath without question, and then, when the question was raised by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolf), had said that it was a very serious matter and one that required a judicial tribunal to settle, and that it must be referred to a Select Committee; and now the right hon. Gentleman said that it was, after all, a question of the jurisdiction of the House. That, undoubtedly, had been referred to a Select Committee; and on that particular point the right hon. Gentleman had not only the opinion of his own Law Officers, but the opinion of the Committee, that the Oath taken by Mr. Bradlaugh would be no Oath, and further, that the House had jurisdiction to inquire into the matter. He did not wish to treat this question purely as a legal question; but there was one point which the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to have forgotten in the course of this discussion—while the Evidence Acts had been under discussion—and that was, that while the Promissory Oaths Act related to the whole of the United Kingdom, the Evidence Acts had reference only to England and Ireland. It was clear, therefore, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge had pointed out, that these Acts were intended simply and solely for the benefit of persons who could not otherwise bring evidence into Courts of Law, and that they had nothing to do with the preliminaries of taking a seat in that House. Let them see the natural consequences of this. The right hon. Gentleman said that they ought to pass this Resolution. Why? It appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman was bound to adduce the very strongest reasons for passing it, because, a very few days ago, they passed precisely an opposite Resolution. Although he differed from the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) on the point of Order raised by him, still he must say that the precedents showed that it was on the rarest possible occasions, and only under a pressing necessity, that the House would rescind a Resolution it had passed a few days before. What were the grounds upon which the right hon. Gentleman asked the House to rescind the Resolution? He thought they were as peculiar grounds as had ever been presented to the House. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the only object he had in view was to protect the dignity of the House, and to insure decency and order in its proceedings. But were they to turn away from the course they thought right and proper simply because they were threatened that a person would come forward and disturb the proceedings of the House? What would the right hon. Gentleman have done had he led the House in the celebrated Gordon matter? Were they to be frightened by the action of one man, or by the action of mobs? Was the House to change its course, deliberately taken, because it was frightened by some action which one man might take, or because it was frightened by the action of a mob in the streets? That would not be maintaining the order and decency of the House. It would be a question of what was to become of all government. The right hon. Gentleman had talked of precedents; but if they were asked to change their course because they could not maintain decency and order, owing to the improper conduct of one single man, that was a precedent he would never have expected to be recommended by any Minister of the Crown. Talk of dignity and order! He could conceive no greater indignity imposed upon that House, upon the Government—or upon any Government—than to say that because they were frightened they were to change their course. He would have thought the only course to be followed would have been to bring in a Bill to solve the difficulty. The hon. and learned Gentlemen who had just sat down had said that this matter might have been left to be decided by Courts of Law; but he had not shown how the Courts of Law could deal with the question. The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated very properly that no Resolution of the House could affect a decision of the Courts of Law; but if Mr. Bradlaugh were to come in by a Resolution of the House, make an Affirmation, and sign the Roll, would the Court of Law go behind that Roll to ascertain whether or not he ought to have been sworn? That was a very difficult point. But there was another difficulty which it would be equally difficult for the House to get out of. If the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) took his seat, any single Member might get up to move for the issue of a new Writ on the ground that the seat was vacant, as if the hon. Member were dead, because he had taken the Affirmation improperly. That question might be properly raised not only on one day, but on any day of the Session. The right hon. Gentlemen had said that there were three objections to legislation. He supposed that if there were more the right hon. Gentleman would have mentioned them. The first objection was that they could not discuss the matter in cold blood; but that objection applied precisely with the same force to the Resolution as to any Bill that might be brought forward. Another objection was that legislation on this subject would involve a great sacrifice of other measures. He must say he deeply sympathized with the right hon. Gentleman on the sacrifice of time; but they might depend upon it that, whatever the fate of this Resolution was, it would not settle the question. Legislation must be brought forward, whatever the sacrifice of time. Then came the third reason—namely, the dignity and decency of the House. “Was there the smallest security,” said the right hon. Gentleman, “that the hon. Member for Northampton would not, day by day during the passing of the Bill, come forward and occasion such scenes as occurred on Wednesday week?” Timidity again! Twice over in the same speech the same point was pressed. He hoped they would hear no more of such arguments. If this Resolution were passed, the real effect of it would be as suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, to say to Mr. Bradlaugh, “You may come and take the Affirmation at your own peril, and we will shut our eyes.” He said that was cowardly and unfair towards Mr. Bradlaugh, and it was a solution of the question which would inevitably bring the House of Commons into conflict with the Courts of Law. If, on the other hand, the effect of the Resolution was to protect Mr. Bradlaugh from an action for penalties, or from a Motion of any Member of the House that his seat was vacant, for that was the statutory right of the House, then he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) said that, by a Resolution of the House, they were endeavouring to do away with the Statute Law of the country. He hoped that the House would be cautious not to follow the right hon. Gentleman in that matter. He had led the House in the same way on former occasions. It was by the same kind of action that he had passed the Army Warrant, and it was by a similar course of proceeding that he had filled up the Ewelme Rectory. These were arbitrary acts, done by the Prerogative of the Crown, on the advice of the Prime Minister, and not by the action of the House of Commons. If this Resolution was to have any practical effect, it would be placing the act of the House of Commons above that of the other branches of the Legislature. Was the Prime Minister quite sure that he was gaining his object? Was he in the confidence of Mr. Bradlaugh or not? What did he offer to Mr. Bradlaugh?—"If you choose to come to the Table, and say, 'I want to make an Affirmation,' we will shut our eyes, and let you affirm." But the last action of Mr. Bradlaugh was to inform Mr. Speaker that he no longer wished to affirm. What he now said was that he wanted to take the Oath, and he insisted on that as his right, and he asked the Prime Minister what he should do? What would then become of the dignity of the House? What would become of the decency and the order of their proceedings, if, tomorrow, Mr. Bradlaugh came down and said he desired to take the Oath? Were they going to shut their eyes while they had a repetition of former scenes. So far as this Resolution went it would not get them out of the difficulty. This question would require legislation. At the present moment he admitted that legislation would be almost impossible. He agreed that it would take a long time; but it was not necessary to legislate this Session, or in a hurry. Legislation might be very good in itself, but it might be inopportune. They could have no stronger instance of inopportune legislation than that of the salutary law for preventing conspiracies to murder. It was, in the first instance, brought forward by one of the strongest and most popular Prime Ministers, and it had, when passed some years afterwards, worked great good; but it cost the Prime Minister loss of Office, because the country thought it was brought forward at the dictation of a foreign Power. If the right hon. Gentleman brought forward a Bill now, it would be felt in the House of Commons, and in the country, that he was doing it to let in an Atheist, and it was, therefore, not an opportune time to legislate. If in the course of time there were a class of persons who objected to take the Oath, and it were proposed to legislate alio intuitu, it might be fairly discussed; but let them take care, whether they proceeded by Resolution or by legislation, that they were not supposed by the country to be doing it for the purpose of letting in an Atheist, or because they were not strong enough to lay aside their timidity, or doubted their ability for preserving the dignity of the House and the order and decency of its proceedings.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the observations he was about to make were in no way calculated unnecessarily to prolong the discussion. He ventured to think, however, that from the action which he had taken on former stages of the question then before the House, and from the remarks which had in many quarters been passed upon that action, he had some claim briefly to explain himself. He did not propose to go into any lengthy argumentative statement. In his opinion, the speech to which they had just listened had completely disposed of the legal position on which the Government, to his regret, had rested their case. At the same time, he was bound to say that he opposed the Resolution of the Government because it was an open attempt to substitute legislation by convention for legislation by Parliament. It was as distinctly a revolutionary procedure as could be carried through in any simple House, without any division into estates of the Realm, upon which the institutions of this country were founded. He would not stop to consider whether that revolutionary procedure deserved the applause of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The proceeding dictated by the Government deprived hon. Members of all their right of examining this question at due length, and of properly consulting the opinion of the country on that most grave and fundamental alteration. The humblest and most insignificant Bill upon the most trivial subject would necessarily have more opportunity for the full discussion of the petty details which it involved, than had been afforded to the House, and, above all, to the country at large, by the manner in which the Government had chosen to deal with this Resolution. It was objected against the opponents of the Resolution that they had endeavoured to punish a man for his speculative opinions, that they had endeavoured to turn cheap speculative Atheism out of the House. The manner in which the House had been forced to consider the sort of side issue presented to them prevented them from examining whether or not it was true that they were trying to keep out speculative Atheism, or whether speculative Atheism ought to be kept out or not. He ventured to say that it was at least open to question whether such Atheism as this was speculative — "Christianity is an eating cancer." He was not going even to answer the question which he had raised; but he thought it right to put it before hon. Members opposite who had accused the opponents of the Government proposal of intolerance of opinion. He altogether declined to approach the consideration of the subject from any Party stand-point; but ventured to appeal alike to Dissenters, who held in reverence, as all did, the pure zeal of Wesley and Whitfield, and to members of the Church of England, the history of whose Church contained so many names of men whom the members of his (Mr. O'Donnell's) own Church honoured as defenders of Christianity. Was it speculative Atheism to teach that Christianity was an eating cancer, poisoning the whole life-blood of the world; that it was blasphemy against humanity? Was it speculative Atheism to teach that Christianity was a natural production like typhus fever? Was it speculative Atheism to teach that Christ's mission was a sham, and that Christ himself was a coward and a craven, and that the atonement stamped God as an inhuman monster, and a foul and bloody-minded being? [Murmurs.] He took those sounds from the opposite Benches to be expressive of horror at the sentiments expressed by Mr. Bradlaugh. If, then, such grave matters were involved as were included in the question which he had asked, he held it to be the duty of the Government to a Christian people to offer them every opportunity for examining whether or not it was mild speculative Atheism which was being attempted to be brought into the House, or whether it was an active and corrupting Atheism disseminating the seeds of the worst principles amongst the people. It might be that both speculative Atheism and practical Atheism were entitled to entrance into the Legislature; but he held that Her Majesty's Government—whether the Cabinet were Liberal or Conservative—were bound to give full opportunity for considering the question whether or not men who claimed to be merely animals—he could use a grosser word, and one that would be much more applicable—had a right to sit in legislation over a Christian community recognizing moral responsibilities. He complained that it was not the Bradlaugh question or the Northampton question which was before the House. He complained that it was a question relating to the justly-honoured Head of Her Majesty's Government. It was the impulsive and generous action of that man, himself religious, most widely revered and honoured—by no one more than himself (Mr. O'Donnell)—that distinguished statesman, which had made the question what it was. The whole action of the right hon. Gentleman, doubtless proceeding from conscientious motives, had been calculated to stir up every possible opposition throughout the country to the solemn decision of the House of Commons; and it must be remembered that the solemn decision referred to had not been arrived at under any pressure of Party terrors. No threat had been held out to Members on that occasion to vote under pain of Dissolution. It had been the distinguishing feature of the former debate that there was perfect freedom in the formation of the opinion at which the House arrived. He was afraid they could not conceal from themselves that since the House had expressed itself deliberately and freely, an element of dictatorship, so far as dictatorship could exist there, had been introduced into the House. Whether that dictatorship was founded on the esteem and reverence for the eminent man who exercised it was quite beside the question. The vast influence of that statesman, and all the forces of his Government, had been thrown into the scale, in order to obtain the virtual rescinding of a Resolution passed by the free and unconstrained judgment of that House. If they looked to the public outside, was there a man, through the length and breadth of the country, who would for a moment weigh in the balance, and judge to be of equal weight, the unconstrained votes of the other day, and the constrained vote which the Government sought to wring by their Party majority that evening? He claimed to know something of the workings of public opinion among various classes in the country. He had had to deal with Englishmen in many towns, and of many classes of society, in the course of several years; and on many occasions, he believed, he had gone as near to a just estimate of public opinion in this country as some of his Colleagues. He paused, for a moment, to suggest to hon. Members that if they wished to add weight to the decision they were about to come to, they would do well not to suppress the opinions of a Colleague who never flinched from openly expressing his views. He strongly protested against the idea and assertion that there was any agitation in the country in favour of the course which the Government had adopted worthy to be taken into the consideration of that House. The people of England had not spoken. It was only the wire-pullers who had done so. The word had gone out from the central officers, and all the local officers had taken up the cry. The more respected leaders of the working classes entertained no manner of doubt as to the real character of the issue which the elect of Northampton had sought to force upon the House, but which could never have been put forward without the assistance of hon. Gentlemen. There was no leader of the working classes in England more widely respected than George J. Holyoake. In mentioning his name, he mentioned one who had worked in the cause of the working man's emancipation, and was the sympathetic historian of the co-operative movement—a man for whose declining years his fellows, the working classes, had raised a sum sufficient to provide him with a pension. Mr. Holyoake had, then, expressed his opinions, which, as a representative of the working classes, had the greatest weight—

"The reason why the elect of Northampton did not seek to affirm, and did not seek to swear, right away, without forcing his peculiar opinions on the House, and endeavouring to make us accomplices in these opinions, was that there would have been no scene, and no Bradlaugh Committee, and no discussion in which the constituency of Northampton would have been engaged with regard to the personal opinions which the Members might hold. If any Members of the House had raised an objection to Mr. Bradlaugh making an Affirmation, the country would have been with him, as a person who was being persecuted for his opinions. But when he challenged the opinion of the House to his views, he provoked discussion upon them."

Again, Mr. Holyoake said—

"I agree that when Mr. Bradlaugh proposed taking the Oath he was justified in giving the House the information. He was, so far, acting honourably; but he must have known that it was impossible for the House to allow him to take the Oath; that would be to make the whole thing into a farce, and convert the House into a company of spectators to witness it. How could he stand up, and utter the closing words and kiss the Bible in the presence of hundreds of English gentlemen who have a regard for self-respect? The House would never forget a scene like this, and there were many gentlemen in the House, although their actions might not always be of the most creditable character."

Such was the speech of a man whose name would be honoured by the working classes of the country long after the names of the wire-pullers who had climbed up on their shoulders had been forgotten. Mr. Holyoake went on to say—

"Mr. Bradlaugh lost prestige in the House as soon as he proposed to take the Oath. An oath, and the formal 'So help me, God,' means nothing to him. He has always protested against it; and yet, now finding that it stands in his way, he offers to swallow it."

The opinion thus expressed was certainly not that of a Conservative working man, or of a warm defender of the Church of England; but of a man who deserved to be called the representative leader of the working classes. The Prime Minister had declared the other day that nothing could be interposed between Mr. Bradlaugh and the Oath; but he was not quite sure that Affirmation was the correct way to approach the question. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman had been marked with vacillation and indecision; and the distinguishing mark of his policy had been an attempt which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General (Sir Farrer Herschell) described as actuated by prudence, and which had been characterized on that side of the House as actuated by cowardice. But, whether or not that was so, his policy had been to keep the main and particular issues from the consideration of the Chamber. Leaving aside altogether the argumentative questions, which had been sufficiently discussed and made quite clear to the mind of the House, he (Mr. O'Donnell) ventured to add a few words of what might be called a personal explanation. He had been in a special manner singled out as a bigot by the supporters of the Government proposals. The leading organs of the Government had gone so far as to describe him as a bigot of the Spanish type. But he desired to state that he was not actuated by any sectarian considerations as a Catholic in the action which he had taken. Had he acted as a sectarian Catholic, he would have been carrying out the policy of the Church of Rome, and as it were the narrow policy which some hon. Members inaugurated, by supporting the proposal to destroy the Christian character of the Parliament of Protestant England. But, believing as he, and as multitudes outside the House did, that they were on the very verge of the blackest act of public apostasy, had he been a mere narrow Catholic he might well have contented himself with taunting the supporters of such a proposal by telling them to go to their meetings for the propagation of the Gospel, to assemble in their May Meetings and denounce the corruptions of Rome. He might have said that, as a Catholic, he could not regret the course adopted by the Government of that great Protestant England, whose Missions trod so closely upon the Missions of the Catholic Church throughout the world; and he could have warned them that no long time would be allowed to elapse before the most distant tribes and people learned that a deliberate vote of the House of Commons had erased England from the list of Christian Kingdoms. But he had been actuated by no Catholic sectarianism, if such a word were applicable. He had preferred to act legally with his Colleagues of every faith, and had chosen, and still chose, to raise and reap whatever odium might be thrown upon him for his action in this matter. He believed no one could more bitterly regret than the Prime Minister the conclusion to which he was forcing the House. As for the particular individual sought to be introduced, he sank into insignificance compared with the vastness of the principle involved. But if the Resolution of the Government were passed, England would be stripped of every right to be considered a Christian country, and the little seed that was sown to-day would be found to attain to vast proportions before many years had passed away.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that he had no intention of trespassing long upon the time of the House at that hour. But he had risen on four or five occasions in the course of the debate, and had not been fortunate enough to catch the eye of Mr. Speaker. His reason for rising was that many hon. Members, who thought as he did, had requested him to state their views upon this matter. The question upon which they were going to vote was widely different from that upon which they had voted before. This Resolution affirmed a broad and sound principle—it affirmed that the House had no right to put any question to any Member desirous of taking the Oath or Affirmation, in regard to his religious opinions, and upon that broad principle he should record his vote in favour of the Resolution. That was a broad principle widely differing from anything which was included in the narrow and miserable Resolution upon which they were called on to vote the other night. If that Resolution had been passed, they would have resolved that Mr. Bradlaugh had a right to affirm. He should be very sorry indeed to have voted for a Resolution which was personal to Mr. Bradlaugh and sanctioned his right to affirm. Of course, he admitted that this Resolution included Mr. Bradlaugh; but it was a broad and general Resolution, and laid down the principle that the House had no right to question any hon. Member upon his religious belief. In the House there was no presiding Judge as in the Courts of Law. Mr. Speaker was not in the position of presiding Judge, and the Clerk at the Table was the servant of the House. The presiding Judge in the case of the House was the conscience of every hon. Member who came to the Table to take the Oath. If any man came to that Table to take the Oath improperly, he rightly subjected himself to the pains and penalties which followed if he were prosecuted and proved guilty. While approving of the Resolution, he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister that there was no danger of the Order of the House being disturbed. His impression was that the House was quite strong enough to preserve its own Order. With reference to the remarks of the hon. Member who had last spoken (Mr. O'Donnell), he (Mr. Hussey Vivian) could state that no pressure direct or indirect had been brought to bear upon him. Did hon. Members opposite doubt what he said? He most distinctly stated that no pressure had been brought to bear upon him. He entirely agreed with what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary of State for the Home Department, that legislation must follow upon this subject. The other day he gave Notice of a Motion that the Oath should be repealed, and that hon. Members should make one common Affirmation. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had stated that legislation of this kind at the present moment was impossible. They must, therefore, deal with the question as it now stood, and upon the broad principle that the House had no right to ask any man questions as to his religious belief.

GENERAL BURNABY: It has been asked what the State has to do with religion, and why should it interfere with the direction of men's consciences? The State has no concern with religion where religion has no concern with the State. But are we, in the laws and customs of this religious country, to exclude all consideration of religion; are we, the trustees for the time being of this august Assembly, to suffer God to be blasphemed by a blasphemer, and to call in the assistance of an avowed Atheist to maintain and frame laws for believers in a Supreme Being? The voice of this Assembly has already decided this important issue, and I have heard no fresh arguments adduced within the House to alter that decision; whilst, outside it, I read and hear of numbers without end who support that decision and regard with horror the idea of proposing to rescind it. It so happens that, under the Administration of Lord Palmerston, I was employed on special service in Syria for the purpose of bringing justice to Christian, Druse, Jew, and Greek; and, in the fulfilment of those duties, I was naturally brought amongst religious communities, and have since mixed freely among those of my own country, a circumstance which led me to obtain opinions from various religious authorities upon the matter at issue. An eminent Moravian has written to me, to say that—

“The action being taken to introduce an avowed Atheist into the House of Commons has not his sanction or approval.”

The Bishop of London writes to say, that—

“He could not give any sanction to the attempt to force an avowed Atheist upon Parliament.”

I was also desirous to obtain the opinion of Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, and therefore appealed to several. The Bishop of Ossory says that—“The people of Ireland are quite indignant at the attempt to instal Atheism in Parliament;” adding, that it was an old saying that “the man that is not true to God will not be true to his country.” Next, what did the Bishop of Raphoe say? He stated that—“He had no sympathy with hon. Members who supported Mr. Bradlaugh.”

MR. SPEAKER said, that he desired to point out to hon. and gallant Member that he was not entitled to read his speech.

MR. A. MOORE said, he rose to Order. He wished to ask whether it was not competent for the hon. and gallant Member (General Burnaby) to read extracts from telegrams or letters addressed to him by other persons? The hon. and gallant Member was not reading his speech.

GENERAL BURNABY said, that he had not a single word written down except quotations. He was reading from replies which he had received to letters and telegrams. Therefore, with the permission of Mr. Speaker, he would continue to read some of the replies which he had received. The Bishop of Raphoe went on to say that—

“Mr. Bradlaugh was endeavouring to make his entry into Parliament a protest against God, and that supporting him in that course was to abandon every Catholic principle.”

The Archbishop of Dublin said that the hon. Gentlemen who voted for Mr. Bradlaugh could not be Catholics. The Bishop of Galway was also opposed to the admission of Atheists into Parliament, and said that—

"He utterly reprobated the conduct of hon. Members who attempted to force an avowed Atheist upon Parliament. Such conduct," he added, "was very reprehensible."

The Bishop of Downe and Connor says, that his opinion is—"That some security should be had to preserve the Christian Parliament." The Bishop of Ardagh's opinion is—

"That an Assembly of Christian gentlemen ought to be able to exclude from their body a person objectionable to their sense of religion and decency."

His Holiness the Pope "gives no sanction to such a proceeding." He had also endeavoured to obtain the opinion of an eminent Baptist—Mr. Spurgeon—who, unfortunately, was not at home; but the person fulfilling his duties had written to state he should certainly think that Mr. Spurgeon would be opposed to any attempt to introduce an Atheist into Parliament. The Chief Rabbi said that—"He did not deem it advisable to interfere in political questions however strongly he felt on the subject."

The Superior of the Greek Orthodox Church said that, as a minister of a Christian Church, "he could not but deeply regret every Atheistical proselytism." Amongst others, a letter which I have received, is one from a Presbyterian, who said—

"I deplore the election of one holding avowed Atheistical opinions, and sympathize so far in that he should not be a Member of the Legislature. But men do not sit there on the ground of their religious or irreligious views; and having already adopted, as I think this country has done, the position that religious belief should not be a condition of Membership, it seems to me the elect of Northampton has a clear constitutional right to his seat."

And he adds his further opinion that—

"The present conflict is not only most unseemly, but is actually such an advertisement of Mr. Bradlaugh in the guise of a martyr, as is really scandalous."

While I agree with the first and the latter portions of this Presbyterian's views, I do not with the other portion, and will contrast it with the words that fell from the lips of the Bishop of Peterborough in his Cathedral on the occasion of the Queen's Accession, his text being, "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." His Lordship said—

"The one sentence was the strength of authority, the other was the defence of liberty; and on these words of Christ the claims of peace and order, and, on the other hand, of liberty of religion and worship, had always rested, and must rest, to the very end. They saw of what preciousness religion was to a nation's life, to a life that was peaceful and settled, to a life of righteous and well regulated liberty. They could see and understand, then, what an immense meaning the Oath of Allegiance so frequently administered to Her Majesty's subjects in various capacities possessed, not merely as regarded the authority of the Sovereign, but involving also the liberty and rights of the subject. When a man who was to make the laws of his country took the Book in his hand and promised allegiance to England's Cæsar, he did it in the name of God; and when he said 'So help me God,' he invoked as the witness of the compact between him and his Sovereign the common Judge of both. Alas for our liberty and order, if from the public acts and deeds of the nation we thereby blotted out the recognition of the name of God!"

Sir, I have completed my purpose, and would remind hon. Members of the Prime Minister's words after the House had patiently, in the exercise of its generous indulgence, heard Mr. Bradlaugh, when the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) moved that the Resolution of the previous day, not to permit Mr. Bradlaugh to make an Affirmation or Declaration instead of the Oath required by law, be rescinded. The right hon. Gentleman then said—"There cannot be the smallest possible hope that the House will rescind the Resolution. If it did, it would be a loss of dignity which he did not desire under the circumstances." I also am of the latter opinion. I believe that by rescinding that Resolution the House would not do the smallest good, but would entail upon itself a loss of dignity and consistency which would be greatly to be deplored in this moral and religious country.

Main Question proposed,

"That every person returned as a Member of this House, who may claim to be a person for the time being by Law permitted to make a solemn Affirmation or Declaration instead of taking an Oath, shall henceforth (notwithstanding so much of the Resolution adopted by this House on the 22nd day of June last as relates to Affirmation) be permitted, without question, to make and subscribe a solemn Affirmation in the form prescribed by 'The Parliamentary Oaths Act, 1866,' as altered by 'The Promissory Oaths Act, 1868,' subject to any liability by statute."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

societies which had hitherto distributed relief in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman must be convinced that every effort made by the Government to relieve distress, by means of the Poor Law organization alone, would fail. In the first place, it would fail because many of the small farmers would rather starve than apply to the Poor Law Boards at all. They would have to make up their minds to permitting relief to be distributed by private Committees, and there was no good in discussing the question in a political or an economical point of view, so long as it was clear that the small farmers would rather suffer the greatest extremities than receive relief at the hands of the Government officials. Moreover, there was a difficulty on account of the disinclination of the Poor Law Boards to avail themselves of the powers given to them. There was a very violent prejudice on the part of many of the Poor Law Guardians in any shape. That did not apply so much in cases where the poor rate was very high; but instances were within his knowledge where the poor rate was as low as 10*d.* in the pound, and yet where the Guardians entirely refused to grant out-door relief. If that state of things were allowed to continue, all the mischief would be done before it was possible to remedy it. The Mansion House Fund had gone down to about £8,000, and in another fortnight it would be exhausted. Then what could the Poor Law system do? He was convinced the Government were not making sufficient provision. They had already been obliged to supersede two or three Poor Law Boards by paid Commissioners; but where were the men to be got to administer the others? He thought the proposal was the most immediate that could be adopted, and certainly speed was of the essence of this question. It was certain that unless the Government adopted some speedy method outside the Poor Law system there would be starvation within a week or two. They knew that if the Chief Secretary for Ireland could, by a stroke of the pen, relieve the distress in Ireland, he would do so; but he could not attend to all the details throughout the country in which he (Mr. Gray) believed the whole of the machinery existing at present was inadequate. He deeply regretted that the proposal had been thrown aside.

Mr. Gray

He did not say that it might not be capable of improvement; but, unless immediate grants were given through some other organization which could act without too much red tape, they would not be able effectually to cope with the distress. He asked attention to the suggestion which had been made, which was, that in view of the distress, and in view of the large burdens which must of necessity be cast upon the ratepayers, that the Government would consider the propriety of postponing for the next 12 months the payment under the Seeds Act. This would do more to relieve the distress than any other proposal except the free grant of public money, because it would relieve the Boards of Guardians of burdens which had been intolerable. This money was not repayable to the Board of Public Works before August, 1881; but the tenant to whom the money was advanced must pay it back immediately after the harvest. It had been said that if there was a good harvest there was no debt which could be more legitimately demanded than that for the seed which had produced that harvest. That was perfectly true; and although he had put a Notice on the Paper for the remission of the debt, finding that public opinion in Ireland would not support him in that proposal, he intended to remove it from the Paper. There was among the small farmers in Ireland a strong conviction that it would be impossible to pay this debt, together with the enormous liabilities which had accumulated upon them, during the year. It had been said that the sum advanced was so small it could easily be paid if the harvest were good. But if it were good, there would be some serious debts of other kinds for the farmers to meet. They were already overwhelmed with debts. The first condition of receiving this seed must have been that they were in such a distressed state that they could not, either by credit or by means of other resources, obtain money to stock their land. They were, therefore, in a bankrupt condition when the seed was received; since which they had been living on charity, or upon such credit as they could obtain. They not only owed their rent, in most cases, but were steeped in debt to the local shopkeepers, and there were three or four creditors watching every small farmer to pounce upon him, if the harvest was a successful one. Therefore, it would be impossible to meet the demands that would be made upon them after the harvest; and no greater relief could be given than if they failed, for fail they must, to meet their obligations, than by postponing the seed debt for 12 months. If it was thought fit, let interest be exacted, even at 3½ per cent. But he was convinced, further, that if the debt were postponed it would be a great benefit to the Treasury in a financial sense, because the debt would be able to be gathered with much greater facility. He trusted the Government would not discard his proposal without taking it into full consideration. He spoke with some authority upon this subject, because he had acted as Chairman of a large Company which had to consider the best mode of relieving the distressed small farmers. In his opinion, nothing better could be done, with the exception of a free grant of public money, to relieve the distress. He was also convinced that some such suggestion as that of the hon. Member for Cork City should be considered—that was to say, an immediate grant to be administered by some other method than by the Poor Law system, in order to prevent the distress which must come within the next four or five weeks, unless something were done.

MR. P. MARTIN said, though objections might be made to the manner in which it was proposed to distribute the grant to be made under the provisions of the Bill, it occurred to him the Government ought to concede the main principle of the measure. It was admitted that severe distress existed, and was likely to increase, in Ireland, and that the charitable associations which had heretofore relieved destitution and warded off the approaches of famine were now without funds. Under those circumstances, he thought it was not unreasonable that they should obtain a grant in aid of that distress from funds belonging of right to the Irish people. It had rightly been pointed out by the hon. Member for Carlow that the example of the Canadian Parliament was one which it was fitting that this country should follow. It did not redound to the credit of England that alleviation for the distress in Ireland should have been obtained from the charity of America and funds granted by a Colonial Parliament, and that now the Government should refuse not merely to give any aid as proposed, but that the Chief Secretary for Ireland should listen in silence to the suggestions which had been made by his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow County (Mr. Gray). He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would not force the Irish Members to divide upon the Bill. He thought it would be viewed as a most unfortunate thing in Ireland if they were driven to take a division upon a Bill of that character. Let him (Mr. Martin) remind the Government that in introducing a Bill of the exceptional character of that which gave the distressed tenant compensation in case he was evicted for non-payment of rent out of the pocket of the Irish landlord, they admitted the prevailing distress was of a character not to be encountered or overcome by ordinary rules. If it was right to transfer thus the burdens from one class to another class, under the state of circumstances which existed in Ireland, it was surely reasonable that the State should contribute towards this exceptional distress occasioned by the visitation of Providence. The postponement of the payment of the instalments, under the Seeds Supply Act, would not be a very serious tax on Imperial resources, and would be of very great assistance in many localities. Even in many of those Unions not scheduled under the Act for the Relief of Distress, the poor rates had been not less than 4s. in the pound during the past year. The distress throughout Ireland was, unfortunately, not confined to Galway, Mayo, or Donegal.

MR. CALLAN said, he believed it would be a substantial benefit to the tenants and small farmers in Ireland if the payment for the seeds were deferred for 12 months, and was glad that the discussion which had taken place upon the Bill had afforded the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) the opportunity of making such a good suggestion. There had been four relief funds in Dublin; but his own county, where there had been a great amount of distress, had not received a penny from any one of those funds. It would be setting an evil precedent to hand over the sum of £200,000 to such bodies, notwithstanding they had every confidence in the administration of the charitable funds by the Mansion House Committee. They societies which had hitherto distributed relief in Ireland. The right hon. They were already overwhelmed with debts. The first condition of receiving this seed must have been that they were in such a distressed state that they could not, either by credit or by means of other resources, obtain money to stock their land. They were, therefore, in a bankrupt condition when the seed was received; since which they had been living on charity, or upon such credit as they could obtain. They not only owed their rent, in most cases, but were steeped in debt to the local shopkeepers, and there were three or four creditors watching every small farmer to pounce tions for relief in Ireland, and had pointed out that the reports of individuals had covered that country with a network of relief Committees, and that it was not wise of the Government to shut their eyes to that organization. All that he had heard since upon the matter had only confirmed him in his opinion that what might be called the official machinery for the relief of distress in Ireland was inadequate for the purpose. He could not see any moral or absolute reason why the grants of public money should not be distributed by an organization individually initiated and spontaneously offered. He did not believe that the millions of money raised for the relief of distress in India could have reached their destination so well, but for the manner in which the officials of the Government cordially co-operated with individual effort. He had had representations made to him on the subject of the difficulty of getting Boards of Guardians to grant relief; and he trusted the Government would not allow it to be thought that they had made up their minds upon the subject. In a few weeks it would be too late to supplement the official machinery and establish a supplementary system of relief out of loans and out of the rates and taxes. There must be a free grant, and there ought to be use made of the organization of individual effort which had already worked so well, and which, under Government supervision, would, no doubt, work better.

MAJOR NOLAN said, under the circumstances, he thought it better to be weary than that the people of Ireland should starve. The people in his part of the country had complained that the time of the House had been wasted in debates upon the Bradlaugh question, while there had been little or no attention paid to the question of distress in Ireland. There was no necessity to quarrel about the machinery for the administration of the fund, for the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) had said he was quite willing the Government should choose its own machinery. He had a letter from a magistrate and grand juror in the county of Galway, who said there was great distress in his neighbourhood, and there were also 10 families affected by fever. That magistrate, who would have to pay a good deal to the rates, pointed out that the Poor Law Guardians had not done their duty. Some machinery ought, therefore, to be adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland of another kind. He thought it would be well to take a division, if there were no reasonable probability of bringing the Bill forward on Saturday. He hoped, however, that the Prime Minister would agree to that.

MR. DALY said, that he did not wish to detain the House at that hour of the morning; but he thought it necessary to call attention to two or three facts in connection with the manner in which out-door relief was distributed by private Committees. He doubted very much whether any machinery could be found which would effect the purpose in view better than the charitable organizations now existing in the distressed districts of Ireland. In the first place, they had had such experience with regard to the distressed districts that they could not be imposed upon. Persons concerned in the administration of the charitable funds were usually clergymen, resident doctors in the district, and other persons intimately acquainted with the wants of the locality; and the information they possessed as to those actually needing relief was much greater than could be acquired by other persons. These gentlemen, moreover, had been engaged in the work of distribution for a long period. Under these circumstances, he could not but consider that in the distribution of any relief they could not do better than intrust it to the hands of the same persons who had hitherto administered the charitable funds in Ireland.

MR. COURTNEY said, he understood the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) to state that if this debate were adjourned it could not be taken at any hour on another evening now that the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) had moved to reject the Bill. At the same time, it seemed to him that the inconvenience of having a discussion then was so very great, that he would suggest that the hon. Member for Stockton should withdraw his Amendment that the Bill should be read a second time that day three months, in order that the Bill might be brought on at any period of the evening on another occasion. He would, therefore, ask the hon. Member for Stockton to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was very sorry not to be able to meet the wishes of hon. Members from Ireland; but he was quite sure it was perfectly possible for the Government to meet distress through the Poor Law machinery without the grant. At the present time, the Poor Law Guardians were giving out-door relief in some cases, and where they did not respond to the appeal to give relief loans were offered to them. He did not see what difference it would make, whether they were giving a grant, or whether they offered loans for two years. He could not advise to assent to the plan proposed, for it would be an acknowledgment of the utter failure of the Poor Law to meet an emergency. If this course which had been suggested were adopted it would complete the abolition of the Poor Law. If the hon. Member desired to take the sense of the House upon his proposal he had better take it that evening, and the Motion for adjournment had better be withdrawn.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that he should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether or not it was proved that the Poor Law in Ireland had broken down. It was within his knowledge that many families who were in the most distressed condition had the greatest possible repugnance to make known their distress to the Government officials. But for the action of the relief Committees, numberless families throughout Ireland would have been dead by the present time. Again, in the county which he had the honour to represent, which was a scheduled county, there were cases of persons suffering the extremity of famine and not applying for relief. Some unfortunate persons who had received potatoes under the Relief Act had been compelled to dig up again the seed which had been planted, for the purpose of sustaining life. No doubt, it was against the law; but Guardians could not find it in their hearts to prosecute those unfortunate persons. He could understand the objection of the Government to the distribution of public funds through private Committees, and he would suggest that some kind of compromise on the subject be adopted. Why should the Government not allow half the money to be distributed by the Poor Law Guardians and half the money through the relief Committees? In that way they would insure the £200,000 which the hon. Member for the City of Cork desired should be granted being properly expended.

MR. METGE said, that if they could obtain a pledge from the Government to adopt the moderate proposal of the hon. Member for the City of Cork they would be happy to take the course suggested by the Government. He believed that the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland told them he was going to bring forward was simply one for the relief of the landlords of Ireland. He did not believe that it would meet the distress amongst the poor. When the Government came forward with a Relief Bill for Ireland of the nature of that introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, in his (Mr. Metge's) opinion, it was the duty of Irishmen to sit there till that time to-morrow, if necessary, in order to obtain a proper measure. Were they to consent to the proposal of the Government they would be altogether renouncing their proper responsibility. It was the clear duty of hon. Gentlemen from Ireland to insure proper legislation for her interests, no matter what inconvenience to themselves.

MR. LITTON said, he denied that it was the right of any hon. Member on the opposite Benches to sit there from that time until the same hour the next day for the purpose of repeating the same arguments over and over again. The proposition of the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) had been met by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) that the Bill be read a third time that day three months. It was only by that means that this discussion could be brought to an end. Hon. Member after hon. Member had risen in his place on the opposite side and had repeated the same arguments. He denied that it was the right of any hon. Member to treat the House in that way. The Bill of the hon. Member for Cork City asked that £200,000 might be handed over to private societies to distribute to the poor of Ireland; and if that principle were adopted, the Government might as well hand over to those societies the government of Ireland altogether. It would be impossible for any Government to carry on the Public Business of Ireland, if they were so to abdicate their functions, and to hand them over to any private individual or private society. It would be a direct abdication of their functions to hand over a large sum of money like this to private distribution. He had personally every confidence in some of the societies which had been concerned in the relief of the distressed. He had no doubt that the Committee presided over by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) had done a deal of good; but there were other Committees in which he had not a like confidence. He believed there was in the minds of a great many hon. Members of that House a considerable want of confidence in some of those Committees; but it was not a question whether they were or were not worthy of confidence. A question of principle was involved, and the only way to bring the matter to a conclusion was to persevere in the Amendment that the Bill be read a third time that day three months.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, it was hardly fair to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) to argue that he had asked for this money to be handed over to voluntary societies. He had expressed his perfect willingness to permit this money to be distributed by means of the Poor Law machinery. After that concession, it became illogical to represent as his argument that this money should be handed over to voluntary societies. What they asked was that public money should be given to the Local Government Board for distribution in such Unions as required a grant instead of a loan. With respect to that proposition, there was good reason for considering it was absolutely necessary. On all sides they had an expression of opinion from Irish Members, including that of the Conservative Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney), that something of the nature of a grant was necessary. The only hon. Members who had not concurred in that opinion were the Liberal Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton), and the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan). [Mr. CALLAN said, that he made no objection to the grant.] He (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) was glad to hear that there was an absolute consensus of opinion amongst the Irish Members on this point, with the exception of the Liberal Member for Tyrone. Great objections were made to public money being handed to voluntary societies; but the hon. Member for Cork City was willing to withdraw that part of his proposal, and to consent to its being handed over to the Local Government Board. The Local Government Board required something more than they had hitherto had. It was necessary to put in their hands a certain sum of money, in order that they might encourage Poor Law Guardians to give out-door relief. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) should take power for the Local Government Board to have a certain sum of money for distribution among such Unions as might be selected. Let the principle of the grant be grafted on the Relief Bill of the Government, and a great deal would then have been done to meet the objections of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. They did not want to disturb the ordinary Poor Law machinery of the country, and were quite willing to allow the grant to be distributed by the Local Government Board. They knew the way in which Boards of Guardians in Ireland acted. It was well known in Ireland that the prospect of having to repay the principal of the large sums of money that might be lent to them to distribute out-of-doors had hitherto prevented the Boards of Guardians from giving out-door relief to any extent. To obviate that objection on the part of the Guardians the present Bill had been introduced. The great principle for which they contended was that a grant should be made to the Guardians, and they would be quite satisfied if that were engrafted upon the Government measure.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that perhaps the House would allow him to state that no limit would be imposed upon the expenditure of the Local Government Board in the event of any emergency short of £1,500,000. The suggestion that the money should be given to the relief Committees now seemed to have been dropped; and the sole question, therefore, was between the loan and the grant. Surely, that might be perfectly well discussed upon the Government Bill on Saturday, and it was unnecessary to occupy the House longer on the present occasion. He must not, however, be understood as in any way assenting to the proposal made, for he would rather stop there till any time than have a compromise of that kind extorted from him.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that he fully agreed with the observations that had been made, that they ought to sit there till that time to-morrow, if by doing so they should contribute to the relief of their distressed countrymen in Ireland. It did not seem to him, however, that there was anything in the proposals of the Government hostile to the principle for which they were contending. Therefore, he should ask his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork to allow the matter to come to a harmonious conclusion. Neither his great respect for the present Government, nor their great majority, nor the distinguished character of the Minister who led it, would induce him to deviate one inch from what he considered to be the proper course to be taken. But he could not regard the Government as hostile to their views. It seemed to him that they were pursuing the same object as themselves, and that it was only a question of machinery. He thought the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that the question should be discussed on Saturday, was a reasonable one.

MR. PARNELL said, he agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) that the debate might be now adjourned. But it should be remembered that he had proposed that plan at the beginning, although he feared he had been misunderstood by the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He had proposed that the right hon. Gentleman should adopt the principle of a grant reserving to himself the right of administration by the Poor Law Board, and it was only at that moment that the Chief Secretary for Ireland had pointed out how it could be done.

MR. BIGGAR said, without any wish to take up the time of the House, or put any obstacle in the way of the Government, he desired to state that he understood the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) not to object to the adjournment of the debate until Saturday.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had stated that the questions raised that evening could be raised upon the Bill on Saturday next. He was surprised that the hon. Member (Mr. Biggar) had not understood that.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. BIGGAR said, he must have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, who, he confessed, was not very lucid in his statement. He did not see why, although the Government had arranged not to put down any other Business on the Paper for Saturday, they should be precluded from putting down this Bill for the same day. Of course, if the whole Sitting were occupied with the Government Bill, there would be no opportunity of discussing the Irish Bill. It was simply a matter of convenience for all parties, and he raised the question as indicating a way out of the difficulty. He desired to make reference to the statement of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) with regard to the Irish Land League. The hon. Gentleman had brought some very dark charges against that body, and had gone into detail, alleging, at the same time, that in one of the national Committees some irresponsible parties had led persons to believe that they would get grants of potatoes if they voted in a particular way.

MR. SPEAKER: The observations of the hon. Member have clearly nothing to do with the subject before the House.

MR. BIGGAR said, there was not the slightest foundation for the statement of the hon. Member for Louth. The hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton) had said that the same arguments had, over and over again, been advanced with regard to this Bill, and upon that point he would remark that the hon. Member had succeeded in repeating himself several times in the course of the debate.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to see the block Motion taken off the Paper for Saturday, and would move that the Bill be read a second time on that day.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be adjourned till Saturday."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would put it to the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) that there had not been a question raised that night that could not be raised upon the debate on the Bill next Saturday. The hon. Member seemed to admit that himself, and he (Mr. Forster) wondered that he had not seen it from the beginning. The Government were under an engagement not to take any Business on Saturday, except the Government Bill; therefore, he could not understand why there should be an attempt made to bring on the present Bill on that day. He repeated there was no question which had been raised that evening which could not be brought up next Saturday on the Government Bill.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he would appeal to his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) to take into consideration the point raised. He was afraid there was no chance of the Government Bill getting through on Saturday. They were, therefore, merely wasting time on a matter of form, because the Bill could not be reached on Saturday. If he thought otherwise, he should support his hon. Friend; but his advice was to concentrate their minds upon the Government measure, and endeavour to convert the proposed loan into a grant.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not wish, in the smallest degree, to criticize, at that moment, the merits of the Government Bill; but merely wanted to point out that the portion of the Government Bill in competition, so to speak, with that of the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell), was at a stage of the Bill which was not likely to be reached on Saturday. He suggested, as a way out of the difficulty, that the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) should withdraw his Amendment against the second reading of the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER: The observations of the hon. Member (Mr. Biggar) are quite beside the Question before the House, which is simply as to the day when the second reading of this Bill can be taken.

MR. BIGGAR said it was so difficult to get on with the Bill of a private Member, when it was stopped by a Government Motion, that it would be well if they had an opportunity of discussing the measure on Friday night.

Question put.

INTEMPERANCE—REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW, in rising to call attention to the Report of the Select Committee of the House on Intemperance, and to inquire, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to introduce any further measure to carry into effect the recommendations of that Committee? said, he had to regret that some more important Member of their Lordships' House had not called attention to the matter. The Committee in question was appointed in 1876, on the Motion of the most rev. Primate (the Archbishop of Canterbury). Since the Committee reported, three of its most important Members, including the noble Duke who was its Chairman, had become Members of Her Majesty's Government. This fact was a further inducement to him to ask what were the intentions of the Government with reference to the recommendations of the Committee. The Archbishop of Canterbury had moved in the matter in consequence of a Memorial to the Bishops from a very large body, both of the clergy and laity, of the Established Church. There was no question that, at that time, the consumption of intoxicating liquors had increased in the country; and during the year 1877 there were no less than 200,000 persons charged with being drunk and disorderly; but these did not include those who were too drunk to be disorderly or not drunk enough to be incapable. It was fair to say that the consumption of tea and sugar had increased to a still larger extent in proportion to the population; but there could be no doubt of the fact that intemperance increased with the advance of wages, and that the crimes of violence increased in proportion to the apprehensions for drunkenness, though they were not actually coincident with the increase of drunkenness, but subsequently to it, as if it required some years of hard drinking to bring the working classes to their greatest depravity. It was one of the results of habitual intoxication. The Acts of 1869 and 1872, supplemented by the Act of 1874, had materially improved the condition of things; order in the public streets had increased, as had the vigilance of the police; and the severer penalties imposed made the publicans more careful in the conduct of their houses. But much remained to be done, and the Select Committee, which had collected a great deal of information and statistics, made numerous recommendations. One was that some legislative facilities should be given to those Local Bodies who were desirous of making an experiment in the direction of repressing drunkenness in the localities for which they acted. It was a mistake to suppose that this had any reference to the Permissive Bill. The whole spirit of the Report was antagonistic to the Permissive Bill; the recommendation of the Committee aimed rather at the possibility of giving a trial to some such scheme as the Gothenburg or Mr. Chamberlain's. The former consisted of giving the municipality power to sell the whole of the licences in the town, which, in the case of Gothenburg, they did to certain philanthropic persons, who conducted the business solely on the principle that no individual should derive any profit whatever from the sale of intoxicating drinks; the only advantage they were allowed to derive being from the sale of food and non-intoxicants. Mr. Chamberlain's scheme differed slightly from that, as he proposed that instead of the Corporation selling the licences to a company they should become the purchasers and managers of the houses. The Committee were not convinced that either of these schemes would be an infallible remedy; but they thought powers ought not to be refused to those Local Bodies who were prepared to try them, so that, if they were found to be successful in a limited area, they might be extended to the whole country. As he had said, the Committee declined, in any way, to recommend the permissive system, and he (the Earl of Onslow) concurred in that view, because he thought that such a system was opposed to the whole spirit of our legislation; but there was much to be said in favour of some such plan as the Gothenburg system, or a modification of it. The principle of giving power over the licences was not a new one. In 1835, Lord John Russell introduced in the Municipal Corporations Reform Bill a clause to enable municipalities to obtain the control of licences. That clause was rejected; but, now that municipalities were allowed to purchase gasworks and waterworks, and were intrusted with great powers under the Artizans' Dwellings Act, there seemed to be no good reason why they should not be allowed to conduct a traffic which was productive of great increase to the rates, and which might be most injurious to the inhabitants of the locality. Why should they not be enabled to purchase public-houses, to insure good management, and that nobody should be tempted to drink to excess? The merits of this plan were that it would provide due compensation for existing interests, and would enable the public to supply their wants at houses conducted in the most respectable manner. He did not mean to assert that any one of the different schemes for municipal action in the matter would be effectual; but he maintained that power should be given to the municipalities to make the experiment, while the Legislature should stand by, watch, and gain experience from their experiments. Another branch of the subject which had engaged considerable attention on the part of the Select Committee was that of grocers' spirit licences, which, though they had been a convenience in some respects, had, it was feared, promoted in other respects drinking habits. The number of grocers' licences had increased from 3,546, in 1871, to 5,821 at the present time. Those licences could be refused only on four statutable grounds — either that the person or the house was not qualified for such a licence. Hitherto they had trusted to the high price of the grocers' licences to restrict their abuse, the grocer having to pay £28 14s. on a

£100 house, as against £15 10s. 8d. paid by the licensed victualler on a house of the same value; but under the new system of licensing duties now proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer this would be materially modified, and the two classes of licence placed on an equal footing, as the publicans' licence would be increased to £30, whilst the grocers' would remain at £28 14s. It appeared to him that, under these circumstances, there was a danger of a very large increase in the number of grocers' licences. There was an objection to those licences being granted by magistrates, because of the invidious position in which these functionaries must be placed if they had two applicants of equal respectability from the immediate neighbourhood; but he should be willing to see a power given to magistrates to fix the maximum number of grocers' licences which they would permit within a district, and to put all those licences up to public tender, so that the fullest value would be paid by the grocer for his privilege. In that way the number of grocers selling spirits would be kept down. It was a convenience to many persons to be able to buy spirits in the shops of their grocers; but it had been stated, in evidence to the Select Committee, that much mischief was caused by the facility for the purchase of spirits which the shops afforded to women, and that some of the grocers consented to enter as "goods" the spirits had by women. Indeed, one gentleman told the Committee that this was so common in Scotland that whenever he found the entry "goods" in a grocer's account he at once understood it to mean "bads"—that was to say "drink." Referring to another point, he believed that public opinion was at this moment ripe for some slight increase in the restrictions on the trade, especially as regarded Saturdays. He thought it would not be too much to oblige publicans to close their houses at an earlier hour on Saturday evenings, when the working people left off work earlier, and had more cash to spend. It was stated that women in Glasgow said they never got their eyes blackened on Saturday nights till after 10 o'clock. He did not think this country was prepared for Sunday closing. In Ireland there was a strong feeling expressed by the publicans in favour of it; but there had been no such manifestation of public feeling in this country. One important question was as to giving greater power to magistrates to refuse the renewal of licences where the character of the premises had been altered; such, for instance, as in the cases where proprietors of old inns had taken the adjoining premises, and converted them into gin palaces, which proceeding had been ruled not to be an infringement of the licence. He thought that they should have greater power; above all, he looked to the results of the establishment of counter attractions to public-houses. The opening of coffee public-houses, working men's clubs, and even temperance music rooms was to be regarded with pleasure; but he sincerely hoped that, whatever legislation might be undertaken in this matter, none of those who had so earnestly and successfully laboured for this object would relax their efforts. Legislation, on its present lines, had been carried almost to the limit, and he did not believe it would be possible to carry restrictions very much further. If they were to have legislation on this subject, it must be an entirely new departure. The subject was one which was attracting considerable attention throughout the country; and after the utterances of the Premier in Mid Lothian on this subject, which he trusted he had no idea of retracting, he hoped for a favourable reply from the Government. He begged, in conclusion, to ask the Question of which he had given Notice.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE said, the Committee was appointed on a Motion of the most rev. Primate the (Archbishop of Canterbury) as the result of a very extensively signed Petition by the clergy. That Petition, in effect, asked the Bishops, as such, to introduce further legislation upon the subject. It was universally felt by the Episcopate that it was not for them to introduce a Bill dealing with the question. It did not seem to them that the Episcopal Bench was the most hopeful quarter from which such a Bill should proceed; but they also felt that it was impossible to turn a deaf ear to a Petition made so heartily and disinterestedly in relation to a subject upon which, if any portion of the community was well informed, it would certainly be the clergy, seeing that they had very ample opportunities of knowing the mischief caused by intemperance. The noble Earl (the Earl of Onslow) had referred to the fact that there had been a change in the condition of Parties since then, and that several of the most distinguished Members of the Committee now occupied the other side of the House. That was a very important point to refer to, because it was not right to consider that the question of temperance or intemperance belonged to one side more than the other. It was a monstrous supposition that a Party of one colour was more interested in temperance than a Party of a different colour, and he did not believe there was in that House any such division of the two sides with regard to this question. But it so happened that a number of distinguished statesmen who were now on the Government side of the House were at that time—if he might use the expression—out of work, and were available to serve on the Committee, and he could bear testimony to the admirable, laborious, and conscientious manner in which they went into the subject. He trusted that noble Lords on that side of the House would now, in their prosperity, not despise the child of their adversity. A great many of the recommendations of the Select Committee were so simple and obvious that he did not see any difficulty in the way of their adoption. Why should not the entering of spirits as “goods” be treated as a fraud, punishable by loss of licence, as it now was in Scotland? and why should not the selling of spirits to boys or girls under the age of 16 be made penal in Ireland and Scotland as it was in England? Then there was a recommendation concerning the bond fide traveller. It was frequently assumed that the definition of such traveller was a man who, on the preceding night, had slept at a distance of not less than three miles than the place at which he was served; this was not really so; it was still left to the judgment of the magistrates to determine whether a man was a bond fide traveller or not; and the Lords’ Committee recommended that this point should be made clear. There could be no doubt that “Local Option” created great interest throughout the country, and in the other House of Parliament a Resolution in its favour had recently been carried; but the question now to be decided was what local option meant. There was a wide distinction between law and Lawson, and when Local Option came to be converted into a hard law then would come the difficulty. Sir Wilfrid Lawson would like to translate his Resolution at once into the Permissive Bill; but they must all agree that that translation was neither a possible nor a desirable thing. There was a form of Local Option which the Committee in their Report called “local adoption,” which was, perhaps, a more suitable term; but he (the Bishop of Carlisle) confessed he was not very hopeful as to that recommendation, although the experience of the Gothenburg system in Sweden, where it had been adopted in town after town, was a very strong practical argument in its favour. The proposal made before the Committee was not so much the Gothenburg system as that modification of it which was devised by Mr. Chamberlain, which was that the towns should have the power, if they pleased, to buy up the interests of the Licensed Victuallers, and should take the whole business into their own hands, as was now the case in many towns with respect to gasworks and waterworks. Having heard the evidence given on that plan, he did not go the length of asserting that it was possible; but he did say that it was very well worth the consideration of Her Majesty’s Government, and that he did not see any better method of dealing with the liquor traffic in large towns. The evil of the existence of a very unnecessary number of public-houses in some of those towns was great. A case was brought before the Committee in which a sailors’ home had been established, and in which every avenue leading to that institution was lined with public-houses. As to Sunday closing, after the decision in the other House regarding Wales, the Legislature seemed distinctly to be committed to a consideration of the question, although he did not think it was simply one of the suppressions of intemperance, Sunday being by no means the most drunken day of the week. It should be borne in mind that this was not a question of the rich man against the poor man, but was the question of the poor man defending himself against an evil, the pressure of which he knew from experience. There could be no doubt that there was a growing opinion that it would be an advantage to have the public-houses closed on that day. It had been shown that of the whole number of householders canvassed on that point, amounting to nearly 800,000, 640,000 were in favour of Sunday closing, 80,000 against it, and 50,000 neutral. That result showed a very large majority for the measure, while, no doubt, a very large minority would have to be considered as not being of that way of thinking. It was a remarkable fact, however, that the majority for the greater part was composed of working people, and not of persons who had their wine cellars and clubs. He did not think public opinion was far enough advanced in that direction to warrant the belief that a measure for the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday would be generally acceptable; but he believed that the moderate recommendation of the Select Committee might be adopted—that the hours should be shortened—and in some parts of the country there might be entire closing. Those recommendations were so simple and so full of common sense that he could not conceive there could be any difficulty in introducing them into any Bill which might hereafter be brought forward on the subject. He sincerely trusted that the Report of the Committee would have due consideration from the Government whenever they had the opportunity of going into the question; and that early next Session they would have some proposal to legislate upon it.

LORD COTTESLOE, as a Member of the Committee which had sat upon the question, hoped the Government would be able to state to the House whether they intended to take up that question. It was highly desirable that they should speak out upon the point, for it was a matter of too much importance for anybody else to take up. So long as it was doubtful whether they were going to deal with it, therefore, the reticence of the Government prevented any progress. He believed that there was no question of greater importance affecting the well-being of such a large body of the people. The interest in the question was shown by the large number of temperance societies which had been established, the meetings which had been held, and the money which had been subscribed for, among other things, the establishment of coffee-houses and labourers' clubs throughout the country; therefore, he trusted that the matter might be taken fairly in hand by the Government; but he must confess that he had his misgivings on that point, in consequence of the inaction on the part of the Executive which had followed the labours of other Select Committees and of Royal Commissions. His experience was that Committees and Commissions were appointed readily enough, but that, unfortunately, no legislation resulted from their labours. There had been a Committee on Railway Accidents and one on Noxious Vapours; but, beyond the collection of evidence, where was the legislation on either subject? There were many among the 20 recommendations made by the Select Committee on Intemperance, the adoption of which might be effected with great public advantage and without delay or difficulty. Such were the recommendation that beer licences should be put on the same footing as spirit licences; that transfers of licences should be refused on the same grounds as renewals were now; that no transfer of a licence should be granted without an opportunity of objection having been afforded to the inhabitants of the locality; that there should be a further restriction as to the hours at which public-houses were open in the early morning, when they afforded a temptation to men going to work; and the question of Sunday closing should be dealt with. He thought that the practice of taking out six-day licences could only be carried out by a general law, for it was hardly to be expected that a landlord would take out a six-day licence when all his rivals took out one that would enable them to supply his customers on Sunday. Such a system should be made general; and he was also of opinion that all convictions, as a matter of record, ought to be endorsed on the licences. The recommendations of their Lordships' Committee were plain and simple, and could be easily included in a short Bill which would receive the support of the country.

THE EARL OF FIFE said, that the question before the House was one of those the importance of which the Government felt as strongly as the noble Earl who had opened the discussion (the Earl of Onslow). The Report to which the noble Earl had alluded emanated from a Committee of their Lordships' House, composed of men who had sat for three Sessions, and given great attention to the difficult and delicate social questions involved in this matter, and whose opinion could but carry great weight in their Lordships' House. He must, however, confess that, on rising from the perusal of that Report, one's feelings were of a somewhat mixed nature, and he might even add of some confusion. There were in this voluminous Report no less than 20 recommendations; but the one which seemed to him both the shortest and the clearest was undoubtedly number 7, which said in rather less than a line that a considerable increase should be made in the licence duty. Those of their Lordships who had followed the Financial Statement lately made by Mr. Gladstone in the other House of Parliament would be aware that that recommendation had been acted upon at the very earliest opportunity, and that it was now proposed to make a very considerable increase in the licence duties. On one point they must all be of one mind, and that was that it was their duty to do everything in their power to mitigate the evils of drunkenness that were only too prevalent in this country. Upon that point everyone agreed; but when they arrived at that point of agreement, temperance reformers joined issue on almost every detail. Some were in favour of total suppression of the liquor traffic, and others were in favour of what was called free trade in liquor; while others again put forward schemes of varying complexity, such as the Gothenburg system, and the more practicable proposals connected with licensing boards. However interesting and admirable the Report was, unfortunately it was hardly possible to find in it any one complete scheme which the Legislature were invited to adopt. The entire suppression of the liquor traffic was hardly possible or practicable in the present state of the public mind, nor would the policy of perfect freedom be likely to recommend itself to any large section of the community. The question of the hours of closing was one which had been under the consideration of successive Governments, and was one in which they had introduced many alterations of various sorts. For his own part, he very much doubted whether these changes really very much affected the general questions of the temperance or intemperance of the people. With regard to the Gothenburg system, of which we had heard so much lately, that seemed to him one more interesting to study than easy to adopt. He begged their Lordships to consider for one moment the enormous difficulties surrounding such a scheme. They were all aware of the complicated questions which arose on the comparatively simple proposal to buy up the eight Water Companies of the Metropolis. Could anyone imagine calmly the gigantic dimensions of a proposal to buy up and manage the thousands of public-houses in the same area? Perhaps the most promising part of the subject was that which was connected with the whole question of licensing, and how far the power of granting licences should be vested in the ratepayers, or in Boards directly elected by them. The last General Election had shown that the temperance forces in the country had considerably increased, and that there was a growing feeling in favour of some sort of Local Option, and possibly in favour of some restrictions in the Sunday liquor traffic. But he would venture to say that it was hardly fair or reasonable to expect that a Government which had been so short a time in Office, and had had, in the ordinary course of affairs, so many and such great questions pressing simultaneously for immediate solution, could have already elaborated a legislative proposal on a subject which had pre-eminently baffled the ingenuity of successive Administrations. Those who were most earnest in the cause of temperance reform would admit that it was hardly one of those questions in which it would be wise to go far ahead of public opinion, as any excess in the direction of restraint might have the opposite effect to that which they all wished, by causing a reaction to set in. For, after all, they must not lose sight of the redeeming features of this distressing subject. Recent legislation, upon the whole, had had a beneficial effect throughout the country by producing good order in the streets, and, probably, it was possible to do still more in that direction. Drunkenness had not increased in the rural districts of England and Scotland, nor in Ireland. As a rule, the higher classes of artisans were becoming more sober, drunkenness being more confined to the lowest grades of the community, where education had not yet kept pace with the growth of wages. It must also be recollected that the police arrangements were far better than in former years, and that, consequently, they heard of more apprehensions for drunkenness. While, on the one hand, with increasing prosperity, the expenditure in alcoholic liquors per head of the population had undoubtedly increased, yet, on the other, the consumption of tea, sugar, meat, and tobacco had increased in a far more notable ratio. The Select Committee itself, indeed, pointed out that a large proportion of the increase was owing to commercial prosperity, and to the increased consumption of alcoholic drinks by those who might be described as temperate drinkers. In conclusion, he wished to say that the Government were both earnest and anxious in this question, in the direction of its advancement. The whole matter was under their consideration. They were noting the various changes which had taken place, and were now taking place in public opinion, and they hoped at no distant date to introduce a measure which might mitigate some of the worst features of this lamentable evil.

LORD ABERDARE said, he had for a long time taken a deep interest in this subject, and would be rejoiced to see it dealt with in a large and comprehensive measure. They must all feel the necessity of watching carefully all those changes in legislation which were being made with regard to the opportunity of making local experiments respecting the time of opening and closing public-houses, and it was essentially desirable that public opinion should be consulted in this matter as much as possible. The early closing movement in Liverpool had been attended with great success. He did not ask the Government for any declaration of their intentions with respect to any future legislation they might have in view upon the subject, for he thought it was far better at present that they should not be called upon to express any opinion whatever, seeing that they had not yet had sufficient time to come to a conclusion on the subject before their Lordships. He (Lord Aberdare) quite shared in the difficulty with which the question was surrounded. In his opinion, there were insuperable obstacles to the adoption of the Gothenburg system in this country. All he wished at present was that localities where a desire existed for the trial of experiments, such as those which had been carried out in Birmingham and Liverpool, should be empowered to gratify their wishes, for it was only by means of experiments that they could hope to arrive at a practical solution of the existing difficulties.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was very grateful to his noble Friend (Lord Aberdare) for saying that he did not wish the Government to pledge themselves to any particular course of action in connection with the Licensing Laws. The subject was one of considerable complexity, and though the Committee appointed to inquire into it had been able to make a number of small, but not uncalled for, recommendations of a not unimportant character, there still remained several points upon which it was very much more difficult to form a conclusive opinion. Allusion had been made to the question of Local Option, and the position which that question had assumed had been pointed out to their Lordships. One thing only was certain with regard to it—namely, that there was a very great and increasing desire throughout the country that, in some shape or other, power should be given to the inhabitants of a town to determine how many licences ought to be granted in the locality. Beyond this point the question as yet had not passed. Everyone who had examined the question thought that the wishes and opinions of the inhabitants of a locality, and especially of the working classes, ought to be very fully considered; but, on the other hand, no one had yet suggested a practical scheme for satisfactorily carrying this principle into effect. The Committee were unable to make such a suggestion; and, therefore, they declined to publish any positive recommendation on the subject. One suggestion made to the Committee was that power similar to that exercised in the Gothenburg scheme should be given to a municipality to deal with local licences by purchase. He had voted against that recommendation, because, though some such scheme might work in large towns, in small ones its successful application would be very doubtful. One thing would be apparent to anyone who read through the evidence that came before the Committee—namely, that it was almost impossible to establish a conclusive theory as to the causes of the prevalence of drunkenness. It was important that this point should not be great attention to the difficult and delicate social questions involved in this matter, and whose opinion could but carry great weight in their Lordships' House. He must, however, confess that, on rising from the perusal of that Report, one's feelings were of a somewhat mixed nature, and he might even add of some confusion. One thing would be apparent to anyone who read through the evidence that came before the Committee—namely, that it was almost impossible to establish a conclusive theory as to the causes of the prevalence of drunkenness. It was important that this point should not be lost sight of, because people were very apt to adopt, in accordance with their predilections, cut and dried theories as to the causes of drunkenness, and forthwith to imagine that it was in their power to furnish a remedy. In the evidence given before the Committee would be found a strong corrective to such views. The Committee, in the first place, found that drunkenness was to a great extent geographical, and that a curious line might be drawn from East to West, to the North of which drunkenness was very prevalent in large towns, and to the South of which it was much less prevalent. Another point worth attention was, that while it was generally assumed that drunkenness must vary in proportion to the number of public-houses in any particular place, the evidence before the Committee by no means verified the notion. Judging from the statistics relating to apprehensions for drunkenness, the Committee found that there were striking instances in which a very large proportion of public-houses in a town was not accompanied by a relative proportion of drunkenness. That showed that a mere diminution of the number of public-houses was not so certain a cure for drunken habits as some supposed. One of the most valuable results of the deliberations of the Committee was, that they had shown that the measure introduced by his noble Friend behind him (Lord Aberdare) was, on the whole, a most successful police measure. The next point to which he would refer was one in which the noble and learned Lord who sat on the Woolsack took great interest. His noble Friend (the Earl of Onslow) had said that there was a great deal of evidence from constables, clergymen, and others as to the great mischief done by shopkeepers' licences. Well, he was bound to say that, in his opinion, and in that of the majority of the Committee, the evidence given before them completely failed to prove that any appreciable increase of drunkenness could be ascribed to those particular licences. They were licences which were possibly liable to attack on various grounds; but no direct evidence had yet been produced of an immediate connection between them and the prevalence of drunkenness. He had not found the assertions with regard to alleged increase of drunkenness among women supported by the evidence, and as to grocers' licences, they were only some 5,000 out of a total of nearly 100,000 licences for the sale of intoxicating drinks. He merely made these remarks to show the noble Lord that he had not lost his interest in the subject. He did not now think it desirable to express any decided opinions on the subject, as he wished to, come unfettered to the consideration of the matter, if the Government should think it proper to bring in a Bill.

CYPRUS — THE HARBOUR OF FAMAGOUSTA.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in rising to call attention to the Report of Mr. Ormiston on the Harbour of Famagousta, which had been laid on the Table of the House; and to ask, Whether Her Majesty's Government have decided upon the execution of the works proposed? said, that if it was intended to convert the harbour into a military harbour, then there must necessarily be the further expense required for fortifying it. He was not at all satisfied with the tenure upon which we held Cyprus, for it was repugnant to one's ideas of propriety that the Queen of England should hold the Island as a tributary of the Sultan of Turkey. Further, it was not only a serious derogation to our position, but also a serious injury to the people of Cyprus, for we had to contribute to the Sultan £100,000 a-year in respect of Cyprus—that was, that we had, for him, to act as tax-gatherer over the people. We had, it was said, taken the Island as a model to show how well we could govern the country; but the facts were that we were obliged, in order to pay this tribute, to tax every fruit, every crop, every sheep, every goat, and we prevented the gathering of the crops until the taxes had been paid; so that we interfered with the whole industry of the people. We had to do this in order to carry out the mischievous financial policy of Turkey. It would be well that we should consider our position, especially in reference to the expenditure upon the Island. There would be a much larger commerce carried on by the Greeks, Turks, and Armenians if they knew that we were going to remain in possession of the territory; but in the present uncertain condition of things these people were prevented from making any outlay. They knew that we had handed over the Ionian Islands to Greece; and it was not known that we might not hand over Cyprus to Turkey or to some other country. He thought that, as they had had possession of the Island for two years, the Government ought to be able to state something as to their policy with regard to it. He regretted that the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville) was not in the House. He understood there was a plan to hand over the Island to the Secretary of State for the Colonies; but that plan had not yet been fully carried out. The laying of the Report upon the Table would be a good opportunity for such a statement being made. He should be glad to know what the policy of the Government was, or, in other words, what was the intention of the Government with regard to the Report which had been laid on the Table. Perhaps the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies would give them some information on the subject. The estimated cost of the improvement of the harbour in question was from £270,000 to £350,000, and that would not be sufficient to make it an effective military harbour.

LORD LILFORD said, that he took great interest in the Island of Cyprus, and had done since the commencement of their occupation of it. He had made some remarks some time ago upon the question, and he still maintained that their occupation was one of the wisest acts ever done by a British Government; but he agreed with the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) that the manner in which they now held the Island was most unsatisfactory. Some people said it was a bad bargain; but he (Lord Lilford) did not think so. He should be glad to know from the Government whether they had made any arrangement for discharging the annual payment now made to the Sultan by paying down a lump sum? His own acquaintance with the Island was not that it was exactly a Garden of Eden; but it might be made very productive. What was wanted was irrigation, drainage, and so on; and he had no doubt, with British enterprize, under an intelligent Government, and with money spent upon it, the Island might be made very productive, and in a few years it would be made a rich and flourishing Colony of England. He was glad to hear that the management of the Island was to be handed over to the Colonial Office.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, in the absence of his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville), it fell to him, as presumptive heir to the Island, as he might be called, to reply. He had never had any hesitation in saying that the mode in which Cyprus was acquired was most unfortunate, and that the tenure by which the Island was held most embarrassing and disagreeable. But if the Island was handed over to the Colonial Office, no opinion that he held on these points would prevent him doing the best he could to render the Island prosperous and a valuable possession—if he might say so, seeing the conditions under which it was held—to this country. Although one might be anxious to make the best of a bad bargain, as he (the Earl of Kimberley) was in this case, yet it was impossible to convert a bad bargain into a good one at will. If this was an ordinary Colony, there might be many modes by which money could be raised for improvements in the Colony, and for the creation of a military harbour; but to embark upon a large expenditure on an uncertain tenure would be a difficult operation, and would require much consideration. The estimate of £350,000 for the works which had been referred to would represent but a small proportion of the sum which it would be necessary to expend in order to construct a great military harbour, because, if they created a harbour in which ships of war were to lie, it would be to the last degree imprudent not to defend it against an enemy, otherwise they might have the place seized and turned against themselves. Therefore, the Report, which had been made by, he believed, a very competent engineer, only touched one portion of the subject. Then, besides the fortifications, there was the healthiness of the position to be considered. If the spot was really an unhealthy one, it would hardly be a desirable place in which to post a garrison; and, on the other hand, without a garrison the harbour would not be safe. It was a question whether Famagousta could be converted into a healthy position; and, if so, at what cost. He was bound to say that the whole subject of Cyprus, whether as regarded their tenure of the Island, or as regarded the possibility of rendering it useful as a great military or naval station, or for any other purpose whatever, seemed to him to be so difficult, and to involve considerations of so various a character, that he hoped their Lordships would excuse him if he did not now pledge himself to the course which should be taken. All he could say was, that his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had fully before his eyes the difficulties they were placed in with respect to their relations with the Porte, and that, for his own part, if he had to undertake the Administration of the Island, he would give the whole subject his best consideration with a due sense of its importance.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, it was clear, from the observations of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies (the Earl of Kimberley), that that was a very inconvenient occasion on which to enter into a full discussion of the question relating to Cyprus. But when the time came that the noble Earl opposite should have the subject fully under his consideration, if the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) should then bring it forward, it would probably be desirable for the Members of the late Government to take part in the discussion. At present, he (Viscount Cranbrook) contented himself with simply reserving their right to take part in such a discussion hereafter.

NAVY—THE TYPE OF TRAINING SHIPS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF RAVENSWORTH rose to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, after the bitter experience of the loss within two years of the training ships "Eurydice" and "Atalanta," the Board of Admiralty contemplate building one or more sailing ships expressly for "training" purposes; and, if so, what is the type of ship they propose to build? He observed that the loss of those two ships, with 600 gallant young lives, was a calamity which had sunk very deep into the heart of the nation. But there was mingled with the sense of national sorrow at that sad event something akin to the feeling of doubt and apprehension in many quarters whether we had at our disposal the best possible ship for training purposes. It was, therefore, with a view to allay such doubts and apprehensions that he had put his Question on the Paper; and he hoped that satisfactory information on the point might be supplied from the highest official source. It was well known that seamen to be properly trained must be on board sailing ships; and if there were any attempt to combine steam and sail they must sacrifice some advantage or other. He assumed, therefore, that they must continue to employ sailing ships for the purpose of training their young seamen, if they intended to keep up the reputation of this country for seamanship. His own opinion was that they must employ smaller sailing ships. The very size of the vast structures in our Navy rendered them unsuitable for this purpose. Perfection had by no means been yet attained in shipbuilding; but probably the introduction of steel as a material for ships would very materially tend to solve the problem in reference to acquiring lightness and speed. It would, however, be a calumny to say that we had not in the Navy the most magnificent type of sailing ships that the world had ever seen; but if, however, there were not now to be found either in commission or in reserve vessels in every respect adapted for training ships, he thought that no time ought to be lost in constructing one or more. He meant by perfect in every respect that they should be perfect in seaworthiness, perfect as to accommodation, and perfect in the possession of every appliance which art and science could suggest for obviating the dangers of the sea. Of this he felt certain, that whatever the highest ingenuity might contrive in regard to the construction of the ships of the Royal Navy, we should have, whenever the hour of trial came, to depend, as we had depended hitherto, on the skill, the smartness, and the pluck of the British sailor; and his contention was that if the interests of the Navy were to be maintained, they would never be able to dispense with that part of the sailors' education which was conducted on board of a sailing vessel. The noble Earl concluded by asking the Question of which he had given Notice.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK said, he fully appreciated the motives of his noble Friend (the Earl of Ravensworth) in bringing the subject forward. In answer to the Question which he had been asked, he had to say that the Admiralty were not about to build a sailing ship for training purposes. The programme of shipbuilding for the present year had for some time been settled, and it was impossible to make any considerable alteration in that programme. The matter, however, did not press. The Board of Admiralty thought that the decision of the question, whether any change should be made in the manner of training seamen for the Fleet, should be deferred until the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the loss of the Atalanta had been presented. The inquiry of that Committee would not be made specifically into what was the best kind of ship to be used for the training of seamen, because that was a subject which he thought would be best determined upon the responsibility of the Board of Admiralty. At the same time, it was possible that the question might be affected to some extent by the Report of the Committee. In the meantime, he was not able to give any further answer to his noble Friend, except to assure him that that subject was one which the Board of Admiralty deemed to be of very great importance, and one to which they would direct their most serious attention.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

We, the Honble. George Denman, and Sir Henry Lopes, kt., Judges for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby certify that upon the 30th day of June 1880, and the following day, We held a Court at York for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the Borough of Thirsk, between Samuel Bradley Willcock, Robert Skilbeck, Thomas Humphrey, and David Meek, Petitioners; and the Honble. Lewis Payn Dawnay, Respondent.

And we certify that the said Respondent was duly elected and returned.

And whereas charges were made at the said Election of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Act, report in writing to you as follows:—

1. That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any Candidate at the said Election.

2. That we have reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the said Election.

GEORGE DENMAN.
HENRY C. LOPES.

York,

July 1st 1880.

And the said Certificate and Report were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

MOTIONS.

PARLIAMENT—TEWKESBURY WRIT.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR moved—

“That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a New Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Tewkesbury, in the room of William Edwin Price, esquire, whose Election has been determined to be void.”

MR. J. R. YORKE reminded the House that in the case of the Evesham Election Petition the learned Judges appointed to try it had reported that they had no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the late Election, and that they confined themselves strictly to the evidence before them. The Attorney General in that case submitted a Motion for the production of the shorthand writer's notes of the evidence, in order that the House might have an opportunity of considering it. Now the case for Tewkesbury was the same as that for Evesham, with this exception, that the Judges did not state that they had confined themselves to the evidence before them. The two cases were evidently to be governed by the same principle, and should stand or fall together. He should propose, therefore, that the Writ be suspended until the shorthand writer's notes of the evidence were in the hands of Members, and that, should it then appear to the House to be necessary, a Select Committee should be appointed to consider the evidence.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL agreed with the hon. Member that the House ought to be in possession of the facts of the case. He should, therefore, move as an Amendment—

“That the Writ be postponed till the Shorthand Writers' Notes of the proceedings on the Election Petition are printed.”

The law, notwithstanding the powers of the Judges, was not effectual for the discovery and punishment of corrupt practices. He begged to call attention to the fact that the Report of the Election Judges in this case, as in the case of the Evesham Petition, did not report that no corrupt practices prevailed, but that from the evidence before them there was no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed. It was quite clear this peculiar form of words was used as warning that there was a great deal of suspicion connected with the case. Tewkesbury and Evesham were two of the smallest boroughs in England, and it was most desirable to show that such constituencies were not corrupt. Of late years the expenses of contested elections had been enormously increased, and the last Election was the most expensive that ever occurred. Very soon the House would be driven to consider the matter, because if the expenses of elections were to increase at their present rate none but a rich man could possibly obtain a seat in Parliament. The evil effect of this was seen in the fact that landed squires, manufacturers, and the rich men were those who resisted the various measures of the Government though professing to be Liberals. The mode of conducting Election Petitions now-a-days was to establish one or two cases, prove the agency, then shake hands all round, and withdraw from the case. His Motion might be objected to on the score of expense, and he might be referred to the manuscript evidence. He had seen the manuscript evidence about an hour before; but he submitted that in view of the facts he had stated the House should have an opportunity of carefully considering the evidence, and to that end he begged to submit the Motion in his name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “the Writ be postponed till the Shorthand Writers' Notes of the Proceedings on the Election Petition are printed,”—(Sir George Campbell,)

—instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he should not attempt to deal with the minor questions often mixed up with the one under consideration—such as the disfranchisement of small boroughs, or the growth of election expenses; but he was going to ask the House to lay down, by its vote on the Motion before it, some general principle on which it should proceed in all such cases; for if they were to act on vague words contained in an Election Petition Report, it was obvious they must involve themselves sooner or later in some very unsatisfactory conclusions. When a Report by the examining Judges contained the statement that there was reason to believe that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed a Commission was issued, and until the Report of the Commissioners was received the Writ was not issued. But if the Judges were silent on the subject, or reported that there was no reason to believe that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, the House had proceeded, after two day's Notice, almost without exception, to order that the new Writ be issued. The reason for that course was—first, that the constituency should not be deprived of its right of election, and also that there should not be interposed any long period of excitement in the constituency. When the Motion for the issue of the Evesham Writ was made, the hon. Member (Mr. J. R. Yorke) called attention to the words of the Judges, that—

These words were somewhat peculiar; and, therefore, the Government, when their attention was called to them, yielded to the suggestion that there should be a delay in the issue of the Writ. Well, that delay had occurred, the evidence in relation to the Evesham Election Petition had been printed, and now, when the present Motion was decided, a Motion was about to be made to issue a new Writ for Evesham. He hoped hon. Members had read the evidence in the Evesham case. He had himself read it, and he confessed he had never read a weaker case for the supposition that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed at the late Election. The Evesham Writ had been withheld for 14 days in order to enable them to know what was the meaning of the words used by the learned Judges. In the case of Tewkesbury, the Report contained words not usually found in these Reports, and he must say he did not know what the learned Judges meant. They could not act upon suspicion like his hon. Friend. The Judges were bound to confine their attention to the evidence; if they did not, they were wandering away from the duty cast upon them. If this Motion was not conceded the House should understand its position. If it determined to proceed, not on evidence, but on newspaper reports, and said there was something in those reports that should induce them to withhold the Writ for an indefinite time, that would be treacherous ground to take action on. If the Judges failed to report that corrupt practices extensively prevailed, the House ought not to listen to newspaper reports or gossip in the Lobby. In justice to the constituency, he thought the House should agree to the Motion of the noble Lord.

Mr. J. R. YORKE thought the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech illustrated the extremely unsatisfactory state of the law. If he understood the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman it came to this—that unless the Judges had legal evidence that corrupt practices extensively prevailed they were to be silent. But it was well known that parties to Election Petitions tried to minimize such matters, and counsel on each side ended by complimenting each other. It was actually made a subject of compliment the other day that a gentleman did not enter the witness-box to deny certain acts of bribery attributed to him. In the case of Tewkesbury the Judges were even more emphatic than in the case of Evesham, for they said, having regard to the evidence to which “We have strictly confined ourselves, there is no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed.”

The Judges, in fact, had endeavoured to invent a formula which would give the House to understand the impression left upon their minds. He thought, therefore, that a Special Committee ought to be appointed to inquire into the whole circumstances before a new Writ was ordered to be issued. What he contended was that, if the House had reason to believe that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, then it should act upon that belief. The Attorney General's argument was that, though the Judges had reported in somewhat significant terms, since they had not distinctly stated that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, the House could not take action upon it. He ventured to submit, however, that the House had not parted with its final jurisdiction in the matter. If the House wished to put down corrupt practices, it must alter the grossly unsatisfactory

PARLIAMENT—TEWKESBURY WRIT.

“That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a New Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Tewkesbury, in the room of William Edwin Price, esquire, whose Election has been determined to be void.”

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “the Writ be postponed till the Shorthand Writers' Notes of the Proceedings on the Election Petition are printed,”—(Sir George Campbell,)

—instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) said, he should not attempt to deal with the minor questions often mixed up with the one under consideration—such as the disfranchisement of small boroughs, or the growth of election expenses; but he was going to ask the House to lay down, by its vote on the Motion before it, some general principle on which it should proceed in all such cases; for if they were to act on vague words contained in an Election Petition Report, it was obvious they must involve themselves sooner or later

MR. J. R. YORKE said, that the Prime Minister had misrepresented his argument. What he had urged was that the House ought to reserve to itself the power of considering the evidence in each case, and that, if necessary, a Committee should be appointed to consider the matter; not, as the right hon. Gentleman put it, that in every case a Committee should be appointed—that would be absurd.

MR. GORST observed, that the Attorney General had specially invited the House on the present occasion to lay down a general rule, and the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke) was only following the lead of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He was surprised to hear the Prime Minister refer to the mischievous Act of last Session; but the Act received the support of the present Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. [Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: No, no!] The hon. Gentleman said that the payment of cabs ought either to be made a corrupt practice or it must be legalized, and he did not care which. The late Government, following the hon. Baronet's advice, had resolved to legalize the payment.

MR. SPEAKER pointed out to the hon. and learned Member that the Question before the Chair was the issue of a new Writ for Tewkesbury.

MR. GORST said, that he would, of course, obey the ruling of the Chair; but he had been led into the digression by the example of the Prime Minister. Another reason why they should institute an inquiry into these matters was to see how far these corrupt practices were influenced by the Circular issued by the Liberal Party, and for which hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench were responsible. In the case of Tewkesbury the Judges had made an extraordinary Report. It was neither affirmative nor negative. It stated that, so far as the evidence was placed before them—and they had strictly confined their attention to it—no corrupt practices had prevailed. There was great danger that only a small fraction of the case had been brought before the Judges. It would, therefore, be wise, he thought, that a Committee should in such cases be appointed.

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had misrepresented the Attorney General, who did not ask the House to lay down a general rule on the present occasion, but only to follow the rule hitherto observed. It was not the duty of Election Judges to make fishing inquiries, but to take the evidence that came before them, and upon that to make their Report to the House. It would be an endless proceeding if they were to begin to go behind the judgments of Election Judges. If the proceedings in their Courts were unsatisfactory, the only thing to do was to revise the law under which the trial of Petitions was conducted, and on that view there was nothing exceptional in this case. A judgment had been given at Plymouth, which struck many people as extraordinary; but they did not find hon. Members opposite rising to oppose the issue of a Writ for that place. Hon. Members opposite were, however, always eager to oppose the issuing of Writs for Liberal boroughs, and the effect of their doing so was to obstruct the progress of Public Business; but the country would understand, as the House did, why such a course was resorted to, especially when it observed who some of the Members were who took a leading part in such discussions. He hoped the House would not consent to the temporary disfranchisement of the borough of Tewkesbury by refusing to issue the Writ.

MR. WARTON protested against the insinuations made by the hon. Member who had just sat down. He did not approve of the action of his hon. Friend the Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke); but he was convinced that his motives were perfectly pure. The only reason why Liberal Writs came before the House so frequently was that twice as many Liberal Members were unseated for bribery as Conservatives.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 238; Noes 53: Majority 185.—(Div. List, No. 37.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a New Writ for the electing of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Tewkesbury, in the room of William Edwin Price, esquire, whose Election has been determined to be void.

state of the law as regarded the constituencies, which in nine cases out of ten were in fault rather than the candidates. Election after election was conducted by persons who rejoiced in their iniquity, and the impunity with which their practices were attended, and the tradition was handed down to their descendants.

MR. RODWELL was of opinion that the House would run very great danger if it adopted the course recommended by his hon. Friend, because then they would take it upon them to review the decision of the Judges. It would be very unfortunate for that House to constitute itself a sort of Court of Appeal from the decision of the Judges, because they could only deal with the same evidence which the Judges had before them. In former times, whenever they had reason to suspect that evidence was withheld, the law gave them power to issue a Commission, and the Speaker had authority for appointing counsel to inquire into the whole circumstances of the case. A corresponding power was now placed in the hands of the House when the Judges reported that there was reason to believe that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed. The proposition laid down by the Attorney General was the only sound and proper one.

MR. GLADSTONE thought the hon. Member for East Gloucester (Mr. J. R. Yorke) deserved all possible praise for his zeal as to the repression of corrupt practices. During the lifetime of the present Parliament there would, no doubt, be ample opportunity for the development of that zeal; but it was to be regretted that the hon. Gentleman did not show the same zeal in preventing, at the close of the last Parliament, the hurried passing of a most mischievous measure bearing on corrupt practices. The question now before the House was whether it was convenient that every Motion for the issue of new Writs should be made the occasion of a discussion as to the general principle on which they ought to proceed with regard to corrupt practices. At the present moment it was inconvenient, and greatly interrupted the progress of Public Business, that they should have rambling discussions of this nature, which appeared to aim, not at the establishment of general rules, but at exceptional proceedings, bringing into question, if not the integrity, certainly the judgment, of the Judges to whom they had intrusted this very important matter, and really constituting an obstacle to the House arriving at any right decision. The proposal of the Attorney General was that they should proceed by general rules; but the suggestion of the hon. Member was that when Reports of this kind were presented to the House a Select Committee should be appointed to make an inquiry, the Writ being meanwhile suspended.

MR. J. R. YORKE: I rise to explain. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is in possession of the House.

MR. J. R. YORKE: I merely wish to make an explanation. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member desires to make an explanation he can do so, with the indulgence of the House, at the close of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks.

MR. GLADSTONE: It was necessary that they should have some definite method of procedure with regard to individual cases, and that definite method of procedure they were not establishing now for the first time. The trial of Election Petitions by Judges had been in force during the existence of two Parliaments; and he believed it had been a uniform rule to institute a Commission when the Judges reported that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed. When, however, the Judges reported that there was no evidence of corrupt practices having extensively prevailed, the House, bearing in mind that the proceedings were penal as well as remedial, had felt bound not to offer obstacles to the issue of a Writ. That was the rule under which numbers of Writs had been issued with the general assent and concurrence of the House. Whether that rule should be altered or not was a grave question; but it was a question which should be raised in an independent way, and at a time when it could be sufficiently considered, and no good object could be gained by raising it on a Motion with reference to a particular borough which presented no exceptional circumstances. He hoped, therefore, the opinion of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would be followed, only observing that the Government asked nothing but that the general Rules of the House should be maintained and adhered to.

Mr. J. R. Yorke

MR. J. R. YORKE said, that the Prime Minister had misrepresented his argument. What he had urged was that the House ought to reserve to itself the power of considering the evidence in each case, and that, if necessary, a Committee should be appointed to consider the matter; not, as the right hon. PARLIAMENT—EVESHAM WRIT.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR moved that a new Writ be issued for the election of a Member for the borough of Evesham, in the room of Mr. Daniel Rowlinson Ratcliffe, whose election has been determined to be void.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that after the last division it would be useless to oppose this Motion. The matter, however, was one in which he took great interest. The Attorney General must be a sanguine man if he thought that many Members had read the evidence which was adduced at the trial of the Election Petition recently. It had only been in the hands of hon. Members two days, and as the evidence was voluminous, probably not one Member in a hundred had mastered it. He differed entirely from the Attorney General, who seemed to suggest that there was not the slightest suspicion of extensive corrupt practices attaching to the borough of Evesham. Whether corrupt practices had extensively prevailed or not, he had no doubt that the election was won by money. He did not know whether the money was given in charity or from corrupt motives; but his surprise as to a gentleman who dropped his sovereigns about so indiscriminately was that one-half the borough constituencies in England did not invite him to stand. He could not say whether it was the candidate or the constituency that had been corrupt. It was possible that the candidate gave his money without any corrupt motive; but the voters of Evesham appeared to be like the innocent little birds they had seen who opened their mouths whenever they thought anything was likely to fall into them. Either the House had a discretion in the matter or it had not. If the House had no discretion, then legislation was urgently required, because there was no public tribunal by which these corrupt practices were sifted. If the House had a discretion it ought to exercise it and appoint a Committee to make further inquiries. His individual opinion was against the Motion; but he would not divide the House on the subject. He hoped, however, that, in order to afford the necessary time for careful perusal of the evidence, the Motion for issuing the Writ would be postponed until next Monday.

MR. ONSLOW supported the appeal for delay. This case was very different from that of Tewkesbury, as to which he voted with the Government. He appealed to the Government to give the House further time for reading the evidence taken at the time of the trial of the Evesham Election Petition. At the present time he would venture to say not a single Member had read the Paper now laid before the House, but which had not as yet been circulated to Members. He knew Evesham, and he ventured to say that no more corrupt constituency existed in the whole of England. A gentleman whom everybody would like to see in the House, not long ago visited the place, as he had been asked to contest the seat; but he was so horrified at what was expected of him, that he shook the dust from his feet, and would have nothing whatever to do with the place. It was a scandal that a borough of this kind should continue to be enfranchised, and he thought this was a case which the House ought to take up.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could not understand what practical course was intended in asking for delay. Some Members had already read the evidence—among them the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, who made no Motion. Were they to appoint a Committee to review the decision of the Judges, who had reported that corrupt practices had not extensively prevailed? Having looked at the evidence, he believed there was no ground for delaying the issue of the Writ.

MR. J. R. YORKE also thought it not unreasonable that the issuing of the Writ should be delayed until Monday, in order that hon. Members might have a further time to read the evidence taken. He had personally only had time to skim the evidence and the Report; but he could not help thinking, as the result of such perusal, that the facts disclosed showed a necessity for further inquiry. He was not going to move that the Writ should be suspended, because it was not improbable that before the Election Petitions were altogether disposed of some startling disclosures would be made, and he might then find it necessary to bring the whole matter before the House. He now submitted that sufficient time had not been allowed for the House to consider this subject.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

INTERNATIONAL DISARMAMENT.

MR. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to the statement made by the First Lord of the Treasury to the effect that an endeavour was made in 1869 by Lord Clarendon, in conjunction with the Government of which the right honourable Gentleman was the head, to set in motion some measure to be at least a beginning of disarmament, Whether there are in the Foreign Office any records of the negotiations that then took place; and, if so, whether there will be any objection to lay them upon the Table of the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I made the reference mentioned by my hon. Friend, as he will perfectly well understand, not in the nature of any contentious or polemical argument in defence of the Government; but, as I may with truth say, historically and for the purpose of paying what I thought was a very just tribute of honour to the memory of a very distinguished statesman and a most valued Colleague. Therefore it was that I felt myself justified in making that reference to his memory. The exact state of the case is this. The records show that I was mistaken in giving the date as 1869; it should have been 1870. In the Foreign Office are to be found records of the proceedings which concern the communication between Lord Clarendon and the Government of the Emperor of the French. The ulterior portion of the proceedings—the communications between Lord Clarendon and the German Government—are not to be found in the Foreign Office. I have no doubt whatever of what the meaning of that is—namely, that Lord Clarendon, with very good judgment and discretion, having to make a proposal to the German Government, determined to feel his way in the first instance unofficially, and, as I intimated in the debate, he then discovered that no practical progress could be made. In these circumstances, and, indeed, on general grounds, I hope my hon. Friend will not press for the production of these Papers, which are in the Foreign Office, and which are essentially one-sided. Moreover, the production of them might possibly seem like raising some controversy, or casting some imputations on the one Government or the other. That was as far as possible from my intention, for I do not think that any fair ground for imputation rests on one side or the other.

FRANCE—EXPULSION OF THE JESUITS.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Her Majesty's Government have remonstrated, or intend to remonstrate, with the French Government against their removing from their homes and banishing the Jesuits and members of other religious orders; and, if the Government intend taking any steps for the protection of those subjects of the Queen who are members of the Jesuit order, or of other religious communities in France?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, this Question having been placed on the Paper only last night, and appearing only this morning, we have had very little time to search for precedents; but, as far as the examination has yet gone, it has been found that on the numerous occasions when the Jesuits have been expelled from various European States, no remonstrance had ever been made by the British Government at any time. Owing to the short Notice which the hon. Member gave of his Question the examination is not yet complete; but there is reason to suppose that no remonstrance has in any case whatever been made on the subject. With regard to the second part of the Question, relating to British subjects, there has been no remonstrance made or address forwarded to the Foreign Office by any British subject affected by these decrees.

THE BRITISH BURMAH COMMISSION.

MR. WARTON asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is a fact that several young civilians from India have been placed in the British Burmah Commission over the heads of Military Officers who have served in that Commission for many years, and who had relinquished their position in the Army on the faith of promises of assured promotion in the said Commission?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir; I have no knowledge of the circumstance referred to by the hon. Member, and I do not find that any representation has been made on the subject to the India Office.

WAYS AND MEANS — INLAND REVENUE—THE INCOME TAX.

MR. NORTHCOTE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is the case that Income Tax at the rate of 6*d.* in the £1 has been deducted from the salaries of permanent Civil Servants of the Crown for the quarter ending June 30th, notwithstanding the fact that the Supplementary Budget has not yet received the sanction of this House; and, if so, on what grounds this deduction has been made in the case of Civil Servants, whilst the Bank July Dividends bear a charge of only 5*d.* in the £1?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the deduction of Income Tax from the Salaries of Civil Servants for the quarter ending June 30 has been made, in accordance with the provisions of Section 17 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1879, at the rate sanctioned by the Resolution of this House which was passed on the 11th of June last. The reason why the Bank July Dividends bear a charge of only 5*d.* in the pound is that the books of the Bank having been already made up, it would be extremely inconvenient, with so large a number of payments concerned, to require them to be re-adjusted to the new rate at so short a notice. The deduction in the next payment will be made at the rate of 7*d.*

ORDER OF THE DAY.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY (re-committed)
BILL.—[BILL 209.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Brassey.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Dodson.)

MR. MACDONALD, in rising to move—

"That no measure dealing with the Employers' Liability for Injuries sustained by their Servants can be accepted as a satisfactory solution of the question which admits, as a ground of defence in any action or proceeding brought for the recovery of damages or for compensation in respect to bodily injury or loss of life, that the person by whose negligence the injury or

said, he had no intention to impede the progress of the Bill; but it was desirable that he should point out to the House certain things in connection with the subject of employers' liability that perhaps the House was not aware of or did not understand. The present law inflicted an injustice upon the workmen, and it was very desirable that some effective measure of redress should be considered and passed. In this country, and in every other country, the most dangerous form of law was Judge-made law, and for the reason that it was continually altering and changing, and in that state which Lord Cairns described as maturing. He feared, however, that it was maturing in the wrong direction, affecting as it did the liberties and rights of the people. He admitted that the case of Priestly v. Fowler, which was decided by a single Judge, not on appeal by the House of Lords, ruled the cases in England; but it had no power over the Scotch Courts. In Scotland the law was even broader than the Bill brought in by the Government, and that was seen from a case that occurred in Scotland many years ago. In that case two men were killed in consequence of the engineer who wound them up from the pit falling asleep in the middle of the operation. That case came before the Scotch Court, and was decided in favour of the wives and children of the two men. It was then removed to the House of Lords, where the decision was reversed on the law as interpreted in the case of Priestly v. Fowler, and the Judge whom the case originally came before said that might be the law of England, but he hoped and trusted he might never live to see it the law of Scotland. In another case, the colliery manager, who acted in every respect as the employer, was held to be the fellow-workman of the man who had been killed; and, therefore, the employer was not responsible. The argument had been used that if the doctrine of common employment were removed it would be oppressing the employer, and that capitalists would take their money elsewhere, and thus damage the interests of the country. He did not believe that such would be the case, because the capitalists were wise enough not to take their capital away from the country where they could find the best use for it. Then it had been said that if the law were altered in the direction he had indicated, and the doctrine of common employment were taken away, that there would be an increase of litigation without number. But they were not without experience upon that matter, and a high authority had said that experience was their best teacher. It was recorded as the law of France a considerable time ago that employers could plead the doctrine of common liability for accidents to the workmen. A case happened in the year 1842 in France, where, in the highest Court, it was decided to the effect that it ought to be no bar to a workman to make a claim for compensation that the injury was done by a fellow-workman. What was the case? Litigation was scarcely known of since. In France, Italy, and Belgium no litigation took place, and in the case of Germany the laws had been modified from time to time, and the principle of the Bill introduced by him into the House of Commons this Session was being considered by the German Parliament, and the object of that Bill was to destroy the possibility of litigation, and to declare that it was no bar to the claim of a man that he was a common workman. He moved his Amendment in no spirit of hostility to the principle of the Bill introduced by the Government. That Bill went a considerable distance; but he wished that it could have gone further. In matters of that kind, he believed that a compromise was the best way out of the difficulty; therefore he accepted the principle of the Bill, in the hope that the Government would, from the expressions they had heard that day, take courage and go forward until the doctrine of common employment was erased from the Statute Book and the decisions of the Courts.

MR. INDERWICK said, that, in seconding the Amendment, he had no desire to impede the progress of the Government measure. His object was rather to strengthen the hands of the Government, and, if possible, to enable them to give to the measure before the House substance and vitality, and an element of finality which, at present, it did not appear to him to possess. Its object was to settle a difficulty of a somewhat serious character between employers and employed, in which it was believed that capital had an advantage over labour. The workmen said that they were in an exceptional position, because, while strangers were entitled to demand compensation for injury, workmen could not do so unless they charged masters with personal negligence; and this was a grievance from which they desired to be relieved. He found it suggested, in documents that had been circulated, that this was a sentimental, and not a substantial grievance; but he believed that it was a substantial one. He did not believe that workmen were treated with a want of kindness or liberality. That charge was not made against employers as a class. The other day, at a railway station, he saw an appeal to the public, on behalf of the widow and family of a guard who had lost his life in a laudable endeavour to save that of a passenger, and the Railway Company headed the appeal with a very handsome subscription. What the men said was that they did not allege any inhumanity or unkindness; but they desired that their position should be strictly defined, and that they should have, by law and right, that for which they were obliged to appeal to private benevolence and public sympathy. He had taken an impartial view of that subject, being neither associated with the capitalist, nor representing what might be called a working men's constituency. The origin of the dispute appeared to be extremely doubtful. The matter was first brought to a head about 1837, when the decision was given that common employment was a legal defence. The matter was then brought to the House of Lords from Scotland, and from that time the law had been established and acted upon. There had been circulated a pamphlet by Lord Justice Bramwell, who had discussed the matter at considerable length, and whose opinion was entitled to very great weight, not only because he was a distinguished Judge, but also because he was a worthy and kindly gentleman. He was, however, unable to arrive at the same conclusion as the learned Lord Justice. Of the rule of common employment he found no trace before 1837. No doubt the Judges acted upon what they rightly believed to be a tradition of the law which was handed down to them. He could well understand that in the primitive ages there was some such rule applicable to the small transactions of life, such as wood cutting, but not in the same sense applicable to the present conditions of society. The origin of this rule was, to say the least, obscure; its parentage was doubtful; and there had been conflicting decisions which had been discussed from time to time. He was entitled to say that the law as laid down was uncertain, was difficult of application, and was exceptional in character. There was a rule of life and of sound common sense that a man was responsible, not only for his own acts, but for the acts of those persons whom, from the necessities of his position, he engaged to carry out acts it was impossible for him to perform himself. This rule was of no recent or obscure origin; it had existed as far back as the law could be traced on the subject. The rule which the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) sought to set aside was an exception to this sound rule of law. It might be assumed that there was a general agreement that the law could not be allowed to remain in its present state. When a proposition of that kind was established, the only statesmanlike way to deal with the matter was to abolish the exceptional rule altogether, and to relegate the persons affected by it, as far as possible, to the position they occupied before the rule of law was laid down. It was said there was no necessity to abrogate the rule, because the object desired could be attained by contract. Theoretically that was an answer; but practically it was nothing of the kind. The workman did not stand upon the same footing as the employer. If the workman proposed to make the employer's liability a condition of service, the employer would say—"The law does not place that liability upon me, and why should I take it upon myself?" The result would be that the workman must accept work upon the terms of the employer, or else he must starve. If it were said that this was not quite so, because workmen combined and acted through their unions, he replied that that fact made it all the more desirable that they should legislate as soon as possible, and that their legislation should, as far as possible, be of a complete and final character. Everything that could be done ought to be done to prevent these questions becoming burning questions between combinations of employers and employed. It was said that a change of law would lead to litigation; but that would depend upon circumstances. If the relation of employers and employed were placed upon a reasonable footing, he saw no reason for such a result; and he believed both parties would endeavour to apply the law in a fair and temperate spirit. He could understand that if employers attempted to evade the law by special contracts or notices, and thus to deprive workmen of the advantages which the law was supposed to give them, there would be great dissatisfaction, and there might be serious litigation; but he hoped the law would be carried out in a fair spirit, and that there would not be any great amount of litigation. It would not be just or right simply to abrogate the law of common employment and to do nothing more. If the House had been called upon in 1837 to pass a measure in the sense advocated by the Amendment, no one would have had any cause to complain; but with the immunity of employers since that date there had grown up a kind of vested interest which would have to be compensated to some extent. Several schemes had been formulated to meet that difficulty. One proposal was that the liability should be limited to the sum of £200; and a further proposal was that a person injured should have his average earnings for six years—both of which propositions he objected to. With respect to the question of insurance, he doubted the propriety of an insurance mutually effected by the workmen and employer. He had given considerable attention to the matter; and he thought the desirable course to take, if a scheme of insurance were considered indispensable, would be to give the employer the opportunity of relieving himself from liability by effecting such an insurance on behalf of each workman as would insure to the workman payment of compensation in case of accident, and would afford to the employer a full and absolute defence. The insurance should be effected under Government guarantee, so that the payment should be absolutely secured. If the master chose to avail himself of the authorized mode of insurance, he should be entirely free from liability. The man injured would be certain of his compensation, and he might not have the same certainty in case of mutual insurance in companies. If the master did not choose to avail himself of the means of insurance authorized, his liability should be unlimited, and he should be bound to pay to his workmen such compensation as a tribunal might award.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no measure dealing with the Employers' Liabilities for Injuries sustained by their Servants can be accepted as a satisfactory solution of the question which admits, as a ground of defence in any action or proceeding brought for the recovery of damages or for compensation in respect to bodily injury or loss of life, that the person by whose negligence the injury or loss of life is alleged to have been occasioned was employed in a common employment with the person killed or injured,"—(Mr. Macdonald),

—instead thereof.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR, who had an Amendment on the Paper to the following effect:—

"That while it is desirable workmen should be placed on the same footing in regard to compensation for accidents as the general public, equality should be sought rather by altering the general principle on which compensation for accidents is now awarded, than by merely abolishing or modifying the existing exceptions to it,"

said, that neither of the hon. Gentlemen who had just spoken had insisted at any length on the grounds which had influenced them in calling the attention of the House to the Amendment which they had advocated. The real ground which had influenced them he believed was this—that under the law, as it stood, and even as it would stand when modified by the Government, workmen were not placed on an equality with the general public, in the matter of compensation for accidents. So long as that inequality existed, this question would never be finally or satisfactorily concluded. So far, then, he entirely agreed with both the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment. But while he so far agreed with them he saw the greatest objection to the particular solution which they proposed, which was to leave the law as it was with regard to the outside public, but to produce the desired equality by modifying it with regard to workmen. Now, either the wages of workmen were determined with reference to accidents or without reference to them. If insurance against accidents was included in the present rate of wages, which he believed to be the fact, workmen, by the operation of this Bill, would be paid twice for the same risk. If compensation was not included in the wages of a workman, then practically this was a Bill for modifying the consequences which resulted from the free operation of contract between master and workman. How far were they prepared to carry such a principle? Many employments were exceptionally detrimental to the health and life of those engaged in them, not because they were liable to accidents, but because they inevitably produced disease. Did the wages of those workmen include insurance against those risks? The advocates of the present Bill (if they were consistent) must hold that they did not. They must also hold that the masters of such workmen ought to be compelled by law to insure the lives of their workmen in addition to paying them wages at the market rate. Was that a course which the House was prepared to enter on? The solution which he ventured to suggest, and which he had endeavoured to embody in the Amendment he had placed on the Paper, was to produce equality between the workman and the general public, not by placing the workmen in the position of the general public, which was the proposal of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), but by placing the public in the position now occupied by the workmen. He admitted that this would produce a very large change in the existing law. But was the existing law either just or reasonable? It compelled a man to pay for the infliction of injuries in which he neither directly nor indirectly had any hand. He might employ the best and most careful workmen, he might take the utmost pains to secure the very best machinery, he might leave no stone unturned to secure the lives of his workmen, and yet he had to pay damages for injuries for which he was in no sense responsible. Such a law could not be regarded as equitable; but it might be thought necessary or expedient. It might be supposed to be the only means of making employers of labour careful of the lives of the public. So regarded the present law belonged to the Criminal Code in regard to its objects, though to the Civil Code in its procedure ; and was naturally enough, therefore, very clumsy in its operation. Among other instances of the absurdities to which it led was that damages were awarded not at all in proportion to the carelessness which produced the accident, or even to the amount of injury it caused, but were largely determined by the position of the persons who suffered by it. The Government should take into consideration the whole state of the law as it existed. Their present proposal combined many of the evils which existed under the present law, and many of the evils which would be introduced into it, if the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) had his way. The Bill would unduly interfere between employer and employed, and would tend to promote litigation, while it would not secure that final solution of the question which the House had a right to expect.

SIR HENRY JACKSON : The House is placed in an unfortunate position with regard to the present debate. During the debate on the second reading of the Bill complaint was made that we were not discussing the real Bill ; and that complaint has, I think, proved to be well founded. In what position are we now ? A Bill has been read a second time on the distinct understanding that, for purposes of discussion, the House should be in the same position as if the real Bill, and not the original Bill, was being debated. But how has that been carried out ? Why, a real, practical discussion is prevented, for the Motion to go into Committee is met by an Amendment which, though not equivalent to the negating of the second reading, at any rate prevents the House from expressing its opinion upon the substantial question involved. The opponents of the Bill, who stood by on this promise, and let it be read a second time, object that the Bill goes too far ; but the issue raised by the Amendment which will be put from the Chair is not whether the Bill goes too far, but whether it goes far enough, as the hon. Member for Stafford who moves it asserts that it does not. The result is that a proposition, to which the Government do not assent, and which the majority of the House repudiate, prevents any vote on any other of the Amendments on the Paper, several of which raise questions, and suggest modes of dealing with this legislation, of the highest value. The second reading has been assented to, not because the House likes the Bill, for it does not ; the feeling of the House is against it, and its true supporters are few and far between. It has been submitted to as a necessity that cannot be avoided. My idea is that so strong is the individual feeling against this Bill, that, if in this House we voted by ballot, the result would be very different to what it is. For my own part, however, I look the position in the face ; and I accept the necessity for legislation as established and inevitable—and that being so, I disclaim any intention of talking this Bill out or frittering away its provisions, and I shall do what I can to make it work out as a settlement of this most serious question, but with due regard to all interests involved. When once this line of action is resolved upon, it becomes important to see how it can best be carried out ; and I concur in the strong desire which exists on both sides of the House that the Bill should be sent to a Select Committee ; but that, we are told, the Forms of the House make impossible. I cannot but think it very unfortunate that such should be the position of a most important social measure ; but as the Bill cannot be sent upstairs for full and calm consideration, there is all the more necessity that it should be fully discussed in the House. What, then, will be the practical effect of the measure upon the great industries of the country ? The House now stands as arbiter between two great factions. On the one hand we have the capitalist, whose capital is the result of foresight, economy, courage, self-denial, and industry—of the exercise of all those qualities which made England what it is ; on the other hand we have the working classes, whose share in our economical system is as important and necessary as that of the capitalist, and who have as much interest as we have in keeping up the great edifice of British prosperity. The capitalist is alarmed at this Bill. It is the fashion to sneer at the proverbial timidity of capital. Admit this timidity, but recognize it, and be careful not to drive capital out of the country. The working classes, or some sections of them, have taken this agitation up, and with them it has become a burning question ; and on their part, as well as among employers, there is great and natural anxiety as to the course the House will adopt. With the working classes that anxiety is aggravated by the mistaken notion that the present law was directed against them as a class. I have always asserted that this is an utterly unfounded idea. No such notion is to be found in any legal conception or expression of the law, and does not exist in fact. The present law is, in fact, based upon this fundamental ground—that the rule of natural justice is that no man ought to be legally responsible for any misfortune resulting from an act for which he is not morally responsible. There are certain exceptions, and the question we have really to consider is whether those exceptions should be extended. I do not stop to consider whether the exceptions are new and the law old, or the law is old and altered by new exceptions. That discussion is now profitless, and will only secure more or less contradiction from some hon. and learned Members near me, whose opinions on the abstract question differ from my own. I recognize that difference of opinion; and, however strong my own views may be, I, in all sincerity, am ready to admit that they may have been warped by circumstances, or may be wrong. I feel that I am right; but I concede that there is a considerable amount of authority against me. And, therefore, I admit that something has to be done. The most logical solution of the problem is that suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford; but I fear that is the least practicable. Indeed, I suppose that my hon. Friend himself hardly imagines that the law can now be altered in the direction he indicates. He would make the moral and the legal responsibility coincide. On the other hand, the hon. Member for Stafford would make every employer liable for everything which happens to everybody in his employment or out of it. That is logical, too. Indeed, I am far from seeing how the interests which that hon. Member is understood to represent are to gain very much by this Bill. If a platelayer is killed on Monday by the negligence of a fellow-servant in authority, and gets compensation, a platelayer who is hurt on Tuesday, by the negligence of a fellow-servant not in authority, will not get much satisfaction out of the new law; and we may be having further proposals to meet his case, and to inclose employers in one comprehensive net of liability. Is the object to insure safety? is the proposed law, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford has asked, a police law? If by fining you intend to make employers more careful in selecting materials and superintendents, why do you stop at fining? Why do you not send them to prison for negligence on the part of agents, which, if brought home personally to themselves, would be criminal? But is such a Bill as this to be carried through at a Morning Sitting? I do not wish to stop the Bill. I will be party to no obstruction. What I ask is that adequate opportunity should be afforded to the House for fully discussing it. As the result of a bond fide discussion, I hope that the Bill may be made a fair and equitable settlement of a vitally important question—that it may prove, not the mere result of hustings promises, but the deliberate outcome of the wisdom of Parliament applied to one of the most difficult of social problems. There seems to be considerable diversity of opinion as to the object aimed at. Is its object to protect the lives of workmen? If I could think that such would be its effect in a single instance, I, for one, would withdraw from all opposition, and would hurry the Bill on; but I do not believe it will have any such effect. The House must remember that the interests that most dread the Bill—the mining interest, for example—are carried on—every single operation of every day's work is performed under the direct supervision of officers appointed for the purpose by the State. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the protection thus afforded is sufficient, or as much as is practicable. But it is said that, apart from its effect, this Bill raises a question of justice, and is to be supported on that ground. No one can have any other feeling in reference to a demand for justice on any question than one of sympathy. But on a matter like the one before the House, where the relations both of employers and of workmen are intimately concerned, questions of justice or injustice are not simple and easy, but of great difficulty and delicacy. Both sides claim justice, and both sides allege injustice; possibly the truth may lie between them. It, therefore, becomes important to consider whether that justice which is desiderated by both cannot be obtained by means of a fair compromise which would have the effect of allaying instead of aggravating the differences now existing between labour and capital, to the disadvantage of both. I cannot admit that there is any compromise in one side merely conceding half of what is asked. There must be something conceded on both sides, in order to bring about a bargain likely to be a permanent settlement of this difficult and delicate question. The only course open, as far as I am able to see, is either to leave the existing law alone, or to amend it in such sort that the employés may be satisfied without terrifying the capitalists whose money is invested in the various industries in this country. This is without doubt a danger of this, and the best thing to be done is to reduce that danger to a minimum. After much deliberation, I have come to this conclusion—that if this new liability is to be put on employers it must be limited in amount, so that the employers may know the maximum they may have to provide in case of the worst accident, and, knowing it, may provide against it by insurance. I wish the House to understand that I am against compulsory insurance. Put it how you will, insurance to which anyone is compelled to contribute is only a tax in disguise; and I recognize the impossibility of such a tax. I only ask for facilities. I am bound to admit that in the Bill now before the House the Government has recognized the principle of limiting this new statutory liability, and I desire to thank them for this concession. But they propose to carry it out by confining the liability of employers to the amount of a limited number of years' earnings of the person injured; but I do not think that this means of carrying out that principle is a wise or satisfactory one. It seems to me that, notwithstanding what my hon. Friend the Member for Rye has said, this proposal will be a perennial well of litigation. I can imagine no more tempting subject for unscrupulous lawyers than the inquiry into three years' probable earnings of any workman; and the House must not lose sight of this practical consideration—that every law-suit would be at the cost of the employer, who would necessarily have to pay costs when the plaintiff recovers, and who never receives any costs when the plaintiff fails, for the simple reason that no plaintiff, under this Bill, would have any means for paying costs. Now, the only hope of escape from this most serious practical difficulty will be found in fixing some maximum sum. In the Workmen's Trains Acts, the sum of £100 has been fixed, and that has worked well in practice. But take that, or any other just sum. What will, then, be the employers' position? He will, at any rate, know the worst; and it will then be for him to secure the means to discharge this new liability when it comes. He can only do it by insurance; and I suppose that the course he will take will be to ascertain the number of his employés, and multiplying that number by the extreme limit of the sum fixed, to induce as many persons in the same peril as himself as he can get to form some sort of combination by which they may cover their liabilities up to the amount of the maximum sum they would have to pay in case of the greatest imaginable disaster. For years the actuarial value of these risks will be doubtful; but they will eventually be discovered. Large premiums on such insurances will have to be paid, and the capitalized value of those premiums will represent the burden which this Government Bill is proposing to put on the struggling industries of this country; and that at a time when, according to my information, they are least able to bear any additional weight. Eventually, doubtless, this weight will fall upon the consumer; and, so far as home trade is concerned, will adjust itself. But the interim disturbance will be very serious; and I question whether, in competition with the foreigner, we shall ever cease to feel it. I also hope, Sir, that, in addition to fixing a definite maximum sum, the Government will admit clauses which will facilitate arrangements for insurance between employers and employed. What could be more simple than such a provision as this? Suppose you fix £100 as the limit under the Act, and then provide that if the master and workmen together agree to effect an insurance for any equivalent or greater sum, such insurance shall exclude the operation of the Act. No one would be hurt by such a provision, and it is obvious that it would tend to promote insurances, which mean providence and economy. But under the vague scheme of the Government, the employer would be unable to know the amount of his liability or danger, or to enter into any agreement with the employed for effecting an insurance which should free him from liability. If Her Majesty's Government will intimate that they have no objection to the principle of this proposal, and will consent that the Bill shall be sent to a Select Committee, which I can undertake, on the part of those interested, shall sit with a determination to forward rather than retard the passing of the measure, they will be remembered, not as having brought forward this Bill for political purposes or as a weak-kneed concession to agitation, but as having made a bond fide effort to arrive at an equitable and reasonable solution of one of the most difficult problems ever presented to Parliament. I do not think that they will be able to work out these complicated proposals on the floor of the House in Morning Sittings in July; but there may be some hope of doing it if the Bill is referred to a Select Committee. The late Government had this subject forced upon them, and they have seen how difficult it was to deal with; but it has by no means been forced upon this Government; they have rushed at it. I have heard it said that they had picked up the Bill somewhere about the platform of the Chester Railway Station. That, of course, is a piece of electioneering jocularities; and I have no doubt the Government have taken the matter up seriously and honestly. Still, whatever may have been the intentions of the Government, it is evident that they have not yet quite mastered the subject. But, while giving them credit for their good motives, I trust they will not force the Bill on without giving those who would be most affected by it an opportunity of being heard by a Select Committee of the House. I have thought it right to make these few observations, though I have not thought it right to divide the House; and, as the Notice Paper now stands, it will not be possible to do so on the Motion for a Select Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) observed, that three classes of objections had been raised to this measure by the hon. Members for Stafford, Hertford, and Coventry. Those hon. Members agreed that some legislation on this subject was necessary; but they took different views of what the principle of that legislation should be. The position of the Government was this. They found that this question had been before the House and the country for years; that a Select Committee had taken evidence bearing upon it in 1877; and the Government had done their best to embody in the Bill the principle which was the most consonant with public opinion. What were the objections raised to the measure? The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) held the view that the Bill did not go far enough, and that the defence of common employment ought to be abolished altogether, so that the employer would be liable for all injuries resulting to workmen from the negligence of other workmen in the same employ. He (the Attorney General) did not think the House was prepared to accept that view, for the total abolition of the defence of common employment would cast such a burden on the employer, and cause such a disarrangement in the rate of wages, that the proposal could not be regarded as practicable. The hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Balfour) took quite a different view. Instead of increasing the liability of the employer, he would diminish it, and would say that employers should not be liable at all, unless they had been themselves guilty of some misconduct. That was a suggestion which it was too late to consider, for the existing law carried the employers' liability beyond that point. More important matter was to be found in the arguments of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson), who had spoken not only as a lawyer, but apparently with a knowledge of the subject which was not entirely theoretical. Now, his hon. and learned Friend admitted the necessity of some legislation. His propositions amounted to this—in the first place, they must alter the law; and, secondly, they must logically either let the law alone or accept the proposition of the hon. Member for Stafford. His hon. and learned Friend apparently did not desire to leave the law as it was. [Sir HENRY JACKSON: I would if I could.] Now he understood his hon. and learned Friend. But why should he desire that result? On account of the injustice of the law? If that were so, why was any alteration inevitable, and why should he admit that alteration really could not be avoided? Why had he not the courage of his opinions, and why did he not endeavour to convince the House of their justice? His hon. and learned Friend's position was untenable. He gathered that his hon. and learned Friend was disposed to accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Stafford, and to abolish the defence of common employment. But then in return he asked for concessions that would make the concessions granted in the Bill of no value. His hon. and learned Friend had wished to appoint a fixed sum as the maximum amount that could be recovered—a proposal that he, for his part, thought very unjust. Was it likely that an artizan earning 40s. a week would think himself well treated if he recovered no more than the amount awarded, perhaps, to a boy receiving 10s. or 12s.? The suggested maximum of £150 was certainly not so just to all parties as the arrangement by which the maximum would vary in accordance with a varying scale of wages. His hon. and learned Friend's second suggestion was one that seemed to have satisfied him that the views of the hon. Member for Stafford were acceptable. His answer to the Bill had been contained in one word, "insurance;" and he seemed to wish that there should be no responsibility as long as the master contributed to the common insurance fund. Now, he believed that that idea of giving the master immunity in consequence of his part in an insurance scheme was a matter that could not be managed by legislation. No doubt it was desirable that the master and servant should enter into a contract, as they easily could do [Lord ELCHO: As yet], and make an agreement, the one to give compensation, and the other not to appeal to the liability created by the Bill; but he could not imagine how the law was to give any real effect to an insurance scheme. Were the subscriptions of the master and the workmen to be levied compulsorily, or in what other way? He thought that the question of insurance could be settled better by personal arrangement than by legislation; and he believed that even his hon. and learned Friend, if he attempted to draw clauses that would get rid of responsibility by a system of insurance, would find the extreme difficulty of effecting practical legislation on that subject. [Sir HENRY JACKSON: Make it their interest.] That was not a matter of legislation. The view of those in charge of the Bill was that insurance depended upon the combined action of employers and employed; and, though they were heartily in favour of it, they had not embodied it in their Bill. He did not think that there was any reason for sending the Bill to a Select Committee. The question of insurance controlled by legislation had come into existence by virtue of the Bill being placed on the Table. ["Hear, hear!" and "No, no!"] At all events, the subject had not even been suggested before the Select Committee of 1877, or a change in the law would certainly have been proposed. [Sir HENRY JACKSON: They suggested no change in the law.] His hon. and learned Friend was on the Committee, and why was he prepared to do now what was not suggested then? Holding views on the subject such as he had described, he could not think that another Select Committee would be useful or necessary. If a Select Committee were appointed, the Bill would still have to come down to the House, where matters of detail would have to be discussed. There were practical men in the House who were well qualified to consider any alterations in the Bill which might be necessary. There was no desire on the part of the Government to press the measure without due consideration. On the contrary, there was every desire on their part to accept suggestions from practical men. His hon. and learned Friend had said that if the votes of hon. Members were to be taken by ballot the Bill would not pass. But why should not his hon. and learned Friend and every other Member vote according to their opinions? Did his hon. and learned Friend mean that he and other Members thought one thing and their constituents thought another? If his hon. and learned Friend meant that, he ought to have recollected that he was speaking in the presence of a great many employers of labour who had been returned by the men they employed. He believed the judgment of those hon. Members would be different from that of his hon. and learned Friend, and that they would sacrifice what they believed to be their own interest in order to do justice to those who were not present in the House. He did not believe that those hon. Members would vote for what they thought to be unjust as if it were just, or that if they were to vote by ballot they would vote differently from what they would do now. He trusted before the Session concluded that the Bill would receive the sanction of Parliament.

MR. MACDONALD said, in order to facilitate the Bill going into Committee, after the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, he would, with the leave of the House, withdraw his Amendment. ["No!"]

MR. J. W. PEASE said, that where this Bill came from everyone knew. It was one of the praiseworthy, if not very successful, attempts of his hon. Friend the Member for Hastings (Mr. Brassey) to settle a very difficult question. He did not know whether he was one of those referred to by the hon. and learned Attorney General, who were returned by the men whom they employed; but he had come from a contested election, and he could state that not a word was said to him all the time about employers' liability. But if a question were put to him on the subject, he would say, as he did now, that, as no one could say that the present state of the law was satisfactory, he would be prepared to deal with it. In endeavouring to deal with the question, however, they were running a great risk. This Bill, if passed into law in its present state, would do a great deal more harm to the working classes of this country than it would do good. At present working men were very much protected by benevolent and insurance societies; but the moment this Bill was passed every man would think that the law was going to take care of him, and that he need not look out any longer for himself. In the trade with which he was connected there were 117,000 members of various mutual provident associations, to which the masters subscribed as well as the men. These 117,000 were very nearly, if not more than, a fourth of all the men employed above ground, and were nearly one-third of those employed under ground in the coalfields. The funds accumulated already amounted to £112,000, the widows supported by the fund were 720, the children 1,400, and the disabled class 19,000. There would always be a difficulty in working compulsory and voluntary funds side by side. No doubt insurance could be carried out voluntarily; but might it not be encouraged if it were recognized in an Act of Parliament? The unfortunate opening for litigation which would be made by the Bill in reference to disputed causes of accident would bring into the mining districts that greatest of pests, the low-bred attorney, who would promote differences between masters and men which did not now exist. In his district, happily, trade disputes were obviated by appeal to the Council of Conciliation; and he was jealous of opening the door in any way to that class of attorney that would produce conflict between capital and labour. The door would be closed against litigation by encouraging the principle of insurance; and if carried out properly it would do much, not only to help masters and men, but to relieve the ratepayers of the country. As the Bill stood, it would do harm to the working classes and to the ratepayers. While heartily assenting to the further progress of the Bill, he earnestly supported the views of the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson), though he would not go quite so far in opposition; but he believed it was essential to the success of the Bill that it should deal with the question of insurance.

MR. GREGORY said, he heard with regret that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General offered no concessions to the appeals that had been made. Practically, this Bill had not been read a second time, for this was another Bill substituted for that to which a second reading was given. It was a great improvement; but practically it was a new Bill. For one, he could not consent to abrogate altogether the doctrine of common employment. He regretted to hear it said that provisions relating to insurance were incompatible with the principle of the Bill, and must be made the subject of private arrangement. The Bill would give the workman the right to compensation, on which he would rely, and the workman who had been contributing would say that a new law had come into operation which ignored his former contribution and threw the liability on the master. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was acquainted with the doctrine of set-off, and had heard of paying damages by anticipation. Why not apply these doctrines to insurance, and let the employer set off what was provided by insurance? Under the Factories and Mines Acts penalties were imposed upon employers in cases of injury to workmen, and these penalties were recoverable by the workmen. By the Bill, as it stood, the workmen could recover these penalties as well as compensation. These were matters that could be dealt with only in a Select Committee; and he believed the reference of the Bill to such a Committee would facilitate its being passed. They might very well adopt the principle that the employer should be responsible for the agents he employed; but they could not make him responsible for those over whom he could not exercise direct control.

Mr. CRAIG: Sir, I shall not detain the House more than two or three minutes. We have had speeches from several hon. Gentlemen; but with the exception of the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease), and the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), we have had none from practical men. I will confine my attention to one practical point. I am one of those who dislike this Bill. It is neither liked by employers nor employed. Here we have an Amendment by the hon. Member for Stafford, which declares that it will not be satisfactory to the employed. I do not dislike this Bill on account of the compensation with which it will saddle the employers. What I dislike is that it will induce litigation to a great extent, and that it will break down all those kindly relations which at present exist between employer and employed. I should, as an employer, much prefer the Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Stafford. I have always declared myself in favour of some measure which will relieve those serious accidents to miners; and I believe that the measure brought in by the hon. Member for Stafford, although it would to some extent swell the contents of the cup, would take away that poisonous element which will destroy the good feeling between employer and workman. I do not know any man who endeavours to retain the respect of his neighbours who will remain in the profession of colliery management after the passing of the Bill. I think the great defect is that it is applying indiscriminately a general principle to all the trades and industries of the country. Now, Sir, these learned Gentlemen ought to have known that there are two classes of trades—those that are dangerous, and those that are not dangerous. When an accident happens, in some cases it is almost impossible to discover what is the cause. Look at the Coroners' inquests in reference to mining accidents, where evidence upon evidence is given, and yet no satisfactory result is arrived at. How much more difficult is it to foresee and prevent an accident? I say that there is no accident which happens but what leaves behind it some trace of human imperfection; depend upon it there will be a tendency on the part of the employed to bring actions against the employers in order to saddle the manager with negligence, and to obtain compensation. There ought to be a distinction drawn between those employments where the accident can be traced, such as building and other employment above ground, and those employments below ground, where it is almost impossible to ascertain the cause of the occurrence. I prefer the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford, because it is more consistent than the Bill of the Government. I also prefer it because it would remove further back the boundaries of litigation on accidents arising from neglect of fellow-workmen, and will be much more to the point, because, under it, there would not arise the necessity of distinguishing between the negligence of one class of workmen and that of another; and, whatever may be the issue, I am sure it will fall considerably below the amount that would arise from more litigation. If general litigation takes place between employer and employed, the disarranging effect upon every trade will be very serious. I think, therefore, this Bill requires a great deal more serious consideration than it has had; and although these learned Gentlemen may give reliable opinion as regards the law, whenever they venture on practical matters they are mere children. I have read all the evidence given before the Committee in 1877, and it is most lucid and trustworthy. Lord Justice Bramwell, so long as he confined himself to the exposition of the law, was clear; but, so soon as he gave an opinion as to the practical effect of the proposed legislation, he sinks down below the rank of a practical witness. In order to show how very necessary it is that this question should be better considered, it is desirable to refer to what Lord Justice Bramwell says. He has given an opinion. He says that cases of negligence by fellow-workmen would be more numerous, and he says that the workmen would be in a better position than the employers for detecting negligence; and, therefore, the employers should not be made liable for injuries of that sort. The hon. Member for Stafford said to him—"Do you know anything of mines?" He said—"Very little."

"Then you do not know that the work of miners is defined by statute?—I cannot say. I believe there has been a good deal of statutory regulation, and miners have had their share of it."

The hon. Member for Stafford said that in mines where 300 or 500 persons were employed, they were required to remain in their own particular working place, but if they left it they were liable to imprisonment. He asked—

"How can it be said that these men have control over their fellow-men?—I cannot say it is so. I think you have alleged it is so.—No, I spoke generally of masters and servants, not particularly of miners. It would be great presumption of me to do so not knowing about miners."

This Bill is founded on the recommendation of that Report. It is on all fours with it. It is a Bill which I had in my hands 12 months ago. It is, in reality, the Bill of the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Brassey). We all considered it, and saw that it was really a dangerous Bill. However able the gentlemen may have been who drew up that Report, I say it is not what we should have expected it would be, but is an interference with many important industries, and however learned the drawers of the Report may be, they would probably feel puzzled to state in detail the difference between employment in a coal mine and employment in a cotton mill. We want further knowledge as to this Bill, and to have further discussion; and, depend upon it, that would not take a long time, but would be all the better for the Government, because the Bill would have received due attention before it was passed. I do not intend to offer any opposition to it. I think it is very desirable to have something done. It has been a long time agitated; but I do hope the Government will seriously consider the propriety of referring this Bill to a Select Committee again, in order to have the matter fully and fairly discussed, and especially to consider the suggestions made by the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson), with a view of seeing whether in these dangerous employments at least something in the nature of insurance will not be more desirable than the provisions which appear in this Bill as it now stands. I do not think that in this House, as far as I am able to ascertain, there is any employer who wishes to delay the passing of a measure this Session. All they want is a Bill that will not bring them into daily conflict with their workmen. I think it is most desirable, especially in regard to those dangerous employments, that there should be some other principle than that contained in the Bill. I shall not detain the House longer with any observations of mine. I could have spoken on other points; but as time is pressing, and there are probably others who would like to speak, I will only say further that whatever good arises out of this Bill, whether it arises in this House or "elsewhere," it will be to the credit of the hon. Member for Stafford; no one else ever suggested anything relating to a change in the law either to secure compensation or relief to workmen injured by accident during his employment until he did; but I do maintain that it is an error to suppose that this Bill will mitigate accidents when it is passed. I believe it will increase them, because it will drive from the profession of mining the competent persons who are now in it as managers. I can say from personal experience that I have never known a colliery manager who is not first of all anxious for the safety of his men. They are men of courage, men of intelligence, men who are educated for their profession, and who would be seriously interfered with if what is proposed in this Bill were brought about. They are often said to be careless, and it is often said that accidents might have been prevented by them; but these things are generally said by those who have never had experience in colliery management. There is another ground that will show conclusively that this will not lessen accidents. Her Majesty's Government and the hon. Member for Stafford say that if this Bill passes and gives compensation it will induce greater care on the part of employers and managers. It has, on the other hand, been said, I know, by many, that if men had this compensation for accidents it will not make them less careful. That I endorse.

I do not believe that any man will injure himself in order to obtain compensation; but surely if this is the case with regard to the men, you will allow it with regard to the managers. If the reception of compensation will not make a man less careful, upon what ground can we come to the conclusion that payment of that compensation will make managers more careful? The Government must, I think, take some other means of dealing with dangerous employment than that proposed in this Bill.

MR. STAVELEY HILL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Staveley Hill.)

MR. DODSON said, that the alterations which had been made in the Bill were matters, not of principle, but of detail. That had been admitted over and over again in the course of the debate, and it was admitted also that the House were anxious that the question should be settled and that the Bill should pass. Taking these two facts together, he appealed to the House, in the name of common sense, to allow the Speaker to leave the Chair. In Committee the details of the Bill could be fully considered.

MR. WARTON agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) that the present law was satisfactory. He was further of opinion that in bringing on the Bill the Government had but yielded to agitation.

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

CENTRAL AFRICA — ALLEGED OUT- RAGES BY MISSIONARIES.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

DR. CAMERON, in rising to call attention to recent reports of outrages committed by missionaries on native inhabitants in Africa and elsewhere; and to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to take measures to prohibit British subjects, not commissioned by Her, from assuming rights of criminal jurisdiction over the natives of uncivilized countries, and perpetrating upon them acts of war; and praying Her further to cause communications to be entered into with the other Great Powers with a view to the protection of uncivilized tribes from acts of violence at the hands of persons not commissioned by the Government to which they owe allegiance," said, that in bringing forward this Amendment he was actuated by no unfriendly spirit towards missionary enterprise; his motive was, if possible, to remove from that enterprise and the proceedings of travellers a blot which threatened to impede the progress of Christianity among savage tribes, and the march of exploration and research. He intended to be as brief as possible, and to confine his observations to acts committed by missionaries and travellers which constituted crimes against the laws of this country, and which would subject the perpetrators to penalties if they were tried in this country. What made it more necessary to draw attention to the subject was the fact that the missionaries who had done these things did them apparently under the impression that they were doing no harm, and were acting in a manner which was for the advancement of justice and the benefit of missionary enterprise. Now the law upon the subject was very simple. It was laid down in the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 9, that whenever a murder or manslaughter was committed in any part of the world, whether under the jurisdiction of Her Majesty or not, upon a person whether a subject of Her Majesty or not, the person committing that murder or manslaughter, or implicated as accessory in it, might be tried in this country under precisely the same laws as if the offence had been committed in this country. Reports had recently reached this country of extraordinary doings on the part of missionaries established at the Blantyre Mission, Central Africa; and they recently formed the subject of a paper by Mr. Andrew Chirnside, a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society. His statements had caused considerable excitement in the country. It was said he had been rather hard upon the missionaries; but he should found his arguments entirely upon the admissions of the missionaries themselves, and upon such admissions he should argue the necessity of some such Resolution as he should submit for the judgment of the House. Mr. Chirnside's statements were to the effect that the Blantyre missionaries had assumed a criminal jurisdiction over the people in whose midst they resided; that on a certain occasion two persons being suspected of murder, in Mr. Chirnside's opinion erroneously, the missionaries held upon them a sort of trial, and they were condemned to death; one, however, escaping, and the other being shot. He need not dwell upon the circumstances which characterized the execution according to Mr. Chirnside. The man was shot upon by a large firing party. This volley did not prove fatal. Another volley was fired which was equally ineffectual, upon which a Native Chief standing by, out of pure compassion, snatched a gun from the hands of a European and blew out the brains of the unfortunate man. These details were denied; but so long as the fact of the execution was admitted they were really beside the question. The second charge made by Mr. Chirnside was that a Native carrier, suspected of having stolen a chest of tea intrusted to his care, was tied to a tree and received 200 lashes with a very heavy whip, and that in consequence of this he died within a very few hours. Mr. Chirnside, in support of his allegations, brought home the whip with which the flogging was accomplished, and certainly it was a most formidable weapon, far exceeding in power and danger any of the numerous "cats" with a sight of which the House had been favoured during the flogging debates of last Session, and that instrument had been deposited with his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Of course, he did not desire action to be taken upon such ex parte assertions; but subsequently a pamphlet had been published by a Mr. Andrew Riddell in defence of this Mission, and a Report had been made by the Committee of the Church of Scotland, to which the Blantyre missionaries were responsible, in which a number of admissions were made on behalf of the missionaries. Regarding the execution, that was admitted. According to the statements of the missionaries, contained in letters sent home to this country to the Mission Committee of the Church of Scotland, the facts of the case were these:—A woman was found murdered on the 26th December 1878, and shortly before that event a slave had taken refuge in the Mission. Two men, one of whom was her owner, were supposed to have wished to have revenge on some persons connected with the Mission for having afforded her shelter. According to the statements made in defence of the missionaries, it was supposed they had murdered the woman, and their trial was decided upon.

"Anxious deliberation was held, and authorities consulted as to the course to be followed, and there was a general concurrence in the conclusion expressed by Dr. Lawes, that wilful murder must be punished by death, and that this was in the circumstances unavoidable in accordance with Divine law."

The murderers were captured and tried before a jury composed of Natives, and presided over by a White man of the Mission, Dr. Macklin. That gentleman appeared to have presided over a sort of jury composed of the rest of the staff and the headmen of the Mission. "Then the people clamoured for their death;" but it seemed the missionaries shrank from any responsibility in this direction. However, after the men had been kept in the stocks for a fortnight, according to Mr. Riddell one of them escaped, and it was resolved to execute the other, and he was executed. Then, as to the charge of flogging, that was admitted too. The missionaries admitted that the man who was flogged had died; but not, according to the opinion of the surgeon, in consequence of the flogging, though they stated that in deference to the opinions of the Natives they abstained from making a post-mortem examination. After, however, the 200 lashes which had been administered, it was certainly no wonder that the man had died, and the fact of their having been administered went very far to present a solution of the cause of death. Mr. Chirnside had told them that these proceedings landed the missionaries in a little war; and that gentleman quoted extracts from a missionary journal concerning various skirmishes, in one of which two men were killed, and in another of which more lives were lost—Mr. Chirnside said nine. In other reports it was admitted that some skirmishing had occurred, though it was denied that this originated in their attempted jurisdiction. When this matter was before the Committee on Missions, that body sent out a letter pointing out that they could not give their missionaries any criminal jurisdiction over the people among whom they resided, and that such acts were likely to involve them in very serious responsibility. Again, the matter had been debated before the General Assembly, and some speakers had denounced the acts mentioned as unjustifiable, while others had taken a different view. It was because of this that he thought it necessary to bring forward this Motion for; it was, above all things, necessary, to preserve our missionary enterprise abroad, that missionaries should be made aware exactly how far they could go, and not, as was said by one gentleman, allow them to perform their duty with a lash in one hand and a halter in the other. The only excuse urged for the missionaries was that their settlement was not merely a Mission, but a Mission Settlement, and that, according to the laws of the people among whom they resided, they had a sort of territorial jurisdiction; but the illogical nature of this plea was shown by the fact that while, on the one hand, they had assumed territorial jurisdiction, and power of life and death, on the other they had refused to exercise the duties of their territorial jurisdiction when it came to protecting poor savages from the vengeance of their barbarous Chiefs. He need say no more about that matter. But he now came to a question that was far more serious, and he referred to the New Britain Mission, the missionary being Mr. Brown. The Mission was situated in a group of islands not far from Sydney, and the Natives from a neighbouring island set upon four Native missionaries, killed, and ate them. That was followed by certain hostile demonstrations against the missionaries generally. A Chief had taken forcible possession of a missionary's wife, and the Chief who was supposed to have instigated the murder threatened to eat Mr.

Brown, one of the leading missionaries, and Mr. Brown stated that several intimations to that effect had reached him. Mr. Brown, who was in one of the other islands, proceeded to New Britain, and found that some of the missionaries in the settlement were very anxious to avenge themselves, and they were preparing to go on an expedition for the punishment of the cannibals. He, however, thought that would not be desirable, and asked them to take his advice, and act according to his instructions. He was told that the reputed murderers had come to the Mission Station for the purpose of murdering those who were there, and he said—"The story we knew to be true, as some of the teachers saw them outside the place." He found that the teachers were planning an expedition that night; but he felt it would fail, and be attended with loss of life. So he begged them to trust the matter to him, and they did so. He held a council of war, gathered together as many Europeans as he could, and looked among the Natives for allies. One Chief, who was suspected of having murdered a Mr. Jackson, and eaten him, was sought as an ally by Mr. Brown. He spoke of the missionaries who were murdered as being under his protection, and Mr. Brown sought his aid in avenging the missionaries. Mr. Brown told him that he could not allow any cannibalism, as it was not our custom to eat men, and he stated that the Chief looked at him in a way that indicated surprise at their conduct and pity for their folly. He professed himself, however, willing to help Mr. Brown; but, owing to the restriction put on their warfare, they found the Chief was not much to be trusted. An expedition was, however, started, and hostilities ensued. In the first encounter which took place two men were killed, and Mr. Brown said that he subsequently found that these men belonged to a friendly tribe, and paid for them to the satisfaction of the Chief. After killing some 20 or 30 persons, some seemed to think they had had enough of revenge; but that was not the opinion of others. Subsequently, the Chief, who had held back, was induced to commence hostilities; and the expedition, which commenced on the 16th of April, went on to May. According to Mr. Brown's statement, many lives were lost, "probably between 50 and 80;" but he went on to say that the present and future good of thousands would far outbalance that. What he (Dr. Cameron) wished to call attention to was that in this expedition there was a number of men armed with rifles fighting against savages who had no weapons but slings; and a painful circumstance in the case was that several women were killed; although, said Mr. Brown, the Natives did not care about that, for they declared that the women were worse, both as cannibals and in exciting hostilities, than the men. What were Mr. Brown's reasons for taking the punishment of these cannibals into his own hands? The Pacific Islands were under the jurisdiction of Commissioners, and men-of-war were not unfrequently in those seas. Why did not Mr. Brown report the case to Sydney, and wait for the arrival of some man-of-war, in order that the punishment might be inflicted by proper authority? Mr. Brown said that he did not think that desirable, because he did not think the captain would interfere unless he had strict authority to that effect; and, secondly, he said that when men-of-war came upon the scene the most they would do would be to bombard the town. This matter was taken up by the Aborigines Protection Society. They appealed to the Colonial Minister, and a tribunal consisting of Sir Arthur Gordon and the Chief Justice of Fiji was directed to investigate the case. It appeared that the Admiralty had instructed Captain Purvis to proceed to New Britain to make inquiries; and he had drawn up a Report which reached Fiji when Sir Arthur Gordon was there. The Report exonerated Mr. Brown from blame, and declared that his responsibility was shared by the European residents. According, however, to his (Dr. Cameron's) reading of the Act of Parliament, all the persons connected with this transaction were guilty of murder or manslaughter. The trial of Mr. Brown was eventually fixed; but the day before Sir Arthur Gordon called Mr. Brown to him and said he had read the statements prepared, and that the evidence would not have led him to institute or recommend a criminal prosecution. Sir Arthur Gordon added—

"I cannot but hope the evidence to be adduced to-morrow may free you from all imputations of criminality, and enable me to continue the investigation that has been interrupted."

He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies would be able to give some explanation of the circumstances which induced one Judge to express an opinion like that without consulting his Colleagues. The result was that the Attorney General of Fiji refused to prosecute, and Mr. Brown was not tried at all. That, he thought, demanded the most careful and dispassionate judicial inquiry. Then, in a letter addressed to The Christian World by the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard), some two years ago, that Gentleman remarked that the The Christian World had done itself honour by protesting against the conduct of a missionary in New Guinea who shot the Natives because they would not receive the Gospel at his hands. There must have been some foundation for that, but he left his hon. Friend to give details; therefore, there were three cases in which missionaries had taken upon themselves the right of putting persons to death and commencing a war. Now he came to the second part of his Resolution, which related to similar acts, but not committed by British subjects. Mr. Stanley waged something like a war with some Native tribes in Africa. He did not object to the taking of life in self-defence; but all the instances he had introduced had been instances in which life had been taken, not in self-defence, but in exercise of quasi-judicial or quasi-sovereign functions, against the assumption of which he altogether protested. Mr. Stanley's description of the affair was that he was threatened by a tribe, and was compelled to kill some in self-defence. In fact, there were 14 of the Natives killed and wounded. He had no wish to challenge that; but what he did challenge was what occurred subsequently. Mr. Stanley managed to get clear away from the Natives; but he considered it necessary to go back and wage war upon them, so that it was no longer a question of self-defence. In the second encounter 42 were killed and over 100 were wounded, whilst only two of Mr. Stanley's men suffered from contusions from stones slung at them. Mr. Stanley had no right to do that, and if it were allowed they would be having other travellers waging war upon Native tribes. Lord Derby had been written to on the subject at the time, but had expressed himself unable to interfere, as Mr. Stanley was not a British subject. Therefore the necessity for the second portion of his Resolution. In conclusion, he thanked the House for its patient hearing, and begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to take measures to prohibit British subjects, not commissioned by Her, from assuming rights of criminal jurisdiction over the natives of uncivilised countries, and perpetrating upon them acts of war; and praying Her further to cause communications to be entered into with the other Great Powers with a view to the protection of uncivilised tribes from acts of violence at the hands of persons not commissioned by the Government to which they owe allegiance,"—(Dr. Cameron,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL did not rise to offer any opposition to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), for he entirely concurred in the Amendment that had been proposed. The Resolution, however, was founded upon reports of outrages; and he wished to make a few remarks in reference to one of the Missions mentioned by the hon. Member. He would ask the House not to form a judgment in regard to the charges of cruelty and injustice that had been brought against the missionaries until those charges had been thoroughly inquired into. On an early day this Session, in reply to a Question of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs mentioned that the attention of his Department had been called to the report of cruelties and outrages in connection with the Blantyre Mission, and that an inquiry had been instituted by Her Majesty's Consul at Mozambique. That inquiry was now going on, and he had further to say that the Church which sent out the Mission—the Church of Scotland—had instituted an investigation on her own behalf, in order that the truth of the matter might be ascertained. The Church of Scotland was sending out a special Commissioner to inquire into the whole circumstances of the Mission, and

the charges that had been made against the missionaries. The Commissioner, he might mention, was the Rev. Dr. Rankin, of Muthill, a highly esteemed parish minister, a man of ability and good sense, who enjoyed the full confidence of his Church. He was accompanied by a layman, who went out at his own charges, who also had the confidence of his Church, and who had instructions to take up the Commission in the event of Dr. Rankin by any accident being prevented from finishing the work. These gentlemen would act in conjunction with Consul O'Neill, so that the House and the country had every assurance that there would be a thorough and impartial inquiry. The Motion, however, as his hon. Friend was careful to say, proceeded not upon the charges of Mr. Chirnside, as if these were established, but upon admissions made by the Church itself, or by its missionaries. Now, he granted that, without reference to charges of cruelty and injustice, there was enough to justify some such Motion as this. There was enough to justify some prohibition of private subjects of the Queen, whether missionaries or not, from assuming criminal jurisdiction in uncivilized countries. But, while the facts which were admitted justified this Amendment, he held that they were by no means so compromising as would be supposed from the speech of his hon. Friend, in which he thought the charges in Mr. Chirnside's pamphlet had, to some extent, been assumed to be true. He was unwilling to enter into particulars; but, as the House had heard of the execution which took place at Blantyre in the spring of last year as an act of very questionable justice, even if those who were responsible for it had a right to exercise jurisdiction, it was only right to say that there was another view to be taken of it, and until they had the result of the inquiry now in progress before them, it would be hardly fair of them to take the worst view of the matter. According to the accounts received by the Committee at home, the missionaries were thoroughly satisfied as to the sufficiency of the evidence against the two men, one of whom was executed. As to the execution itself, the Committee had the assurance of the missionaries that there was no cruelty in the mode of execution. Then, as to the flogging, the Committee were now making inquiry. Dr. Macklin

on to say that the present and future good of thousands would far outbalance that. What he (Dr. Cameron) wished to call attention to was that in this expedition there was a number of men armed with rifles fighting against savages who had no weapons but slings; and a painful circumstance in the case was that several women were killed; although, said Mr. Brown, the Natives did not care about that, for they declared that the women were worse, both as cannibals and in exciting hostilities, than the men. What were Mr. Brown's reasons for taking the punishment of these cannibals into his own hands? The Pacific Islands were under the jurisdiction of Commissioners, and men-of-war were not unfrequently in those seas. Why did not Mr. Brown report the case to Sydney, and wait for the arrival of some man-of-war, in order that the punishment might be inflicted by proper authority? Mr. Brown said that he did not think that desirable, because he did not think the captain would interfere unless he had strict authority to that effect; and, secondly, he said that when men-of-war came upon the scene the most they would do would be to bombard the town. This matter was taken up by the Aborigines Protection Society. They appealed to the Colonial Minister, and a tribunal consisting of Sir Arthur Gordon and the Chief Justice of Fiji was directed to investigate the case. It appeared that the Admiralty had instructed Captain Purvis to proceed to New Britain to make inquiries; and he had drawn up a Report which reached Fiji when Sir Arthur Gordon was there. The Report exonerated Mr. Brown from blame, and declared that his responsibility was shared by the European residents. According, however, to his (Dr. Cameron's) reading of the Act of Parliament, all the persons connected with this transaction were guilty of murder or manslaughter. The trial of Mr. Brown was eventually fixed; but the day before Sir Arthur Gordon called Mr. Brown to him and said he had read the statements prepared, and that the evidence would not have led him to institute or recommend a criminal prosecution. Sir Arthur Gordon added—

"I cannot but hope the evidence to be adduced to-morrow may free you from all imputations of criminality, and enable me to continue the investigation that has been interrupted."

He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies would be able to give some explanation of the circumstances which induced one Judge to express an opinion like that without consulting his Colleagues. The result was that the Attorney General of Fiji refused to prosecute, and Mr. Brown was not tried at all. That, he thought, demanded the most careful and dispassionate judicial inquiry. Then, in a letter addressed to The Christian World by the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard), some two years ago, that Gentleman remarked that the The Christian World had done itself honour by protesting against the conduct of a missionary in New Guinea who shot the Natives because they would not receive the Gospel at his hands. There must have been some foundation for that, but he left his hon. Friend to give details; therefore, there were three cases in which missionaries had taken upon themselves the right of putting persons to death and commencing a war. Now he came to the second part of his Resolution, which related to similar acts, but not committed by British subjects. Mr. Stanley waged something like a war with some Native tribes in Africa. He did not object to the taking of life in self-defence; but all the instances he had introduced had been instances in which life had been taken, not in self-defence, but in exercise of quasi-judicial or quasi-sovereign functions, against the assumption of which he altogether protested. Mr. Stanley's description of the affair was that he was threatened by a tribe, and was compelled to kill some in self-defence. In fact, there were 14 of the Natives killed and wounded. He had no wish to challenge that; but what he did challenge was what occurred subsequently. Mr. Stanley managed to get clear away from the Natives; but he considered it necessary to go back and wage war upon them, so that it was no longer a question of self-defence. In the second encounter 42 were killed and over 100 were wounded, whilst only two of Mr. Stanley's men suffered from contusions from stones slung at them. Mr. Stanley had no right to do that, and if it were allowed they would be having other travellers waging war upon Native tribes. Lord Derby had been written to on the subject at the time, but had expressed himself unable to interfere, as Mr. Stanley was not a British subject. Therefore the necessity for the second portion of his Resolution. In conclusion, he thanked the House for its patient hearing, and begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to take measures to prohibit British subjects, not commissioned by Her, from assuming rights of criminal jurisdiction over the natives of uncivilised countries, and perpetrating upon them acts of war; and praying Her further to cause communications to be entered into with the other Great Powers with a view to the protection of uncivilised tribes from acts of violence at the hands of persons not commissioned by the Government to which they owe allegiance,"—(Dr. Cameron,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL did not rise to offer any opposition to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), for he entirely concurred in the Amendment that had been proposed. The Resolution, however, was founded upon reports of outrages; and he wished to make a few remarks in reference to one of the Missions mentioned by the hon. Member. He would ask the House not to form a judgment in regard to the charges of cruelty and injustice that had been brought against the missionaries until those charges had been thoroughly inquired into. On an early day this Session, in reply to a Question of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs mentioned that the attention of his Department had been called to the report of cruelties and outrages in connection with the Blantyre Mission, and that an inquiry had been instituted by Her Majesty's Consul at Mozambique. That inquiry was now going on, and he had further to say that the Church which sent out the Mission—the Church of Scotland—had instituted an investigation on her own behalf, in order that the truth of the matter might be ascertained. The Church of Scotland was sending out a special Commissioner to inquire into the whole circumstances of the Mission, and

the charges that had been made against the missionaries. The Commissioner, he might mention, was the Rev. Dr. Rankin, of Muthill, a highly esteemed parish minister, a man of ability and good sense, who enjoyed the full confidence of his Church. He was accompanied by a layman, who went out at his own charges, who also had the confidence of his Church, and who had instructions to take up the Commission in the event of Dr. Rankin by any accident being prevented from finishing the work. These gentlemen would act in conjunction with Consul O'Neill, so that the House and the country had every assurance that there would be a thorough and impartial inquiry. The Motion, however, as his hon. Friend was careful to say, proceeded not upon the charges of Mr. Chirnside, as if these were established, but upon admissions made by the Church itself, or by its missionaries. Now, he granted that, without reference to charges of cruelty and injustice, there was enough to justify some such Motion as this. There was enough to justify some prohibition of private subjects of the Queen, whether missionaries or not, from assuming criminal jurisdiction in uncivilized countries. But, while the facts which were admitted justified this Amendment, he held that they were by no means so compromising as would be supposed from the speech of his hon. Friend, in which he thought the charges in Mr. Chirnside's pamphlet had, to some extent, been assumed to be true. He was unwilling to enter into particulars; but, as the House had heard of the execution which took place at Blantyre in the spring of last year as an act of very questionable justice, even if those who were responsible for it had a right to exercise jurisdiction, it was only right to say that there was another view to be taken of it, and until they had the result of the inquiry now in progress before them, it would be hardly fair of them to take the worst view of the matter. the cognizance of the Foreign Office. The New Britain case did not. It had been dealt with by the Admiralty, and was under the Colonial Office. With regard to the Blantyre case, that seemed a bad case, so far as the circumstances were known; but he did not think it was necessary to go into this matter at length, because it was one which, as the hon. Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen (Mr. J. A. Campbell) had shown to the House, was actually under investigation at the present time. The hon. Gentleman, in the very temperate observations which he had made on the matter, also admitted that the investigation was being conducted by those who were not strongly hostile to the missionaries. There was one point on which some of the defenders of the action of the missionaries differed from others, and that was as to the question of jurisdiction. He had heard a defence of the Blantyre Mission to the effect that the missionaries did not claim jurisdiction, that they had placed a Native Chief on the juries, and that they sheltered themselves by the Chief's jurisdiction. There was no desire on the part of the Foreign Office to be a party to any exercise of jurisdiction by Europeans in this indirect manner. But at first sight he was bound to say there did appear to be a case deserving in the highest degree of careful investigation, and the only reason why he declined to enter into details and deal with it was that the acts which had been committed were the subject of investigation at the present time. The foreign Mission, as the hon. Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen had told them, had sent out some gentlemen to inquire into the affair, and Her Majesty's Consul at Mozambique had been instructed not only to assist them, but to proceed to the spot and join in the investigation. It would be an impartial investigation, and Her Majesty's Consul would endeavour to arrive at the truth. With regard to the New Britain case, he believed some sort of approval was given to the conduct of the missionaries by the late Board of Admiralty; so he supposed something was to be said for them. It did not come within the Department with which he was connected, and it was impossible for him to give the House any information on that subject. The third case had nothing at all to do with missionaries; although he could not help coming to the conclusion that the case might on some future occasion usefully form the subject of a debate in the House. He did not, however, think the case should be debated now, because the friends of Mr. Stanley in that House would not have been really informed by the terms of the Notice of his hon. Friend that it was intended to bring the subject before the House that evening. The hon. Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen stated that, on the whole, he concurred in the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron). He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) could not concur in the actual terms of the Amendment, though he wished it to be understood that he gave his entire support to the doctrines which had been enunciated, that being not only his own view individually, but the view of those who were responsible for the administration of the Foreign Office. It had been the desire of the Foreign Office not only to discourage, but, as far as possible, to actually prevent, the exercise of jurisdiction by British subjects over whom they had no control. The exercise of such a jurisdiction was not only calculated to lead to acts of which they disapproved, but to involve the country in serious complications; and such a thing must be discouraged, and, as far as possible, prevented by all who had to do with the direction of Colonial affairs. If the Resolution of his hon. Friend merely expressed the disapprobation—he might say the extreme disapprobation—with which Her Majesty's Government viewed the exercise of irregular jurisdiction by British subjects in uncivilized parts of the world, he should give his cordial assent to the Resolution. But the Resolution did more than that. In the second part of the Resolution, by which his hon. Friend expressed his wish that there should be a communication with other Great Powers with the view of protecting uncivilized tribes; but his hon. Friend had not brought forward a sufficient number of cases, or sufficiently strong cases, in which foreign Powers would be likely to interfere. Except Mr. Stanley, he knew of no foreigner who had been mentioned in this matter; and Mr. Stanley was not a subject of any of what were usually called the Great Powers,

Member had, however, made a mistake in his statement of the law, inasmuch as he appeared to assume that almost the only Act bearing on the question was 24 & 25 Vict. In truth, there were several other statutes, and we already possessed considerable—he might say ample—powers for dealing with British subjects out of the jurisdiction of civilized Powers. Besides this Act of 24 & 25 Vict., under which we could try any subject for murder and manslaughter when the offender could be brought to trial in the United Kingdom, there were also Acts under which they could try an offender even if he had not been brought to trial in the United Kingdom. Even if he was caught in foreign parts, there was power of trial by commission to Colonial Courts under an Act of George III.; but the Act to which he would specially direct attention was the Act of 1878. Under the operation of the Jurisdiction Act of 1878 there was power to issue an Order in Council for the legal exercise of British jurisdiction over British subjects. This was a very unusual power, and it was one which up to the present time had not been exercised. The Act had only just come into force; but it was an Act which could be put into force, and might be exercised. Under that Act they could claim jurisdiction even over British subjects in parts of Central Africa which were not subject to any regular Government. Now, what were the special powers as regards Africa which affected the circumstances in this case? It was a fact not generally known that for criminal purposes the jurisdiction of the Cape Colony extended northwards vastly beyond the boundaries of the Colony itself up to 25 degrees of south latitude. But the Blantyre station was considerably to the north of that limit. But the Act of 1878 said that Her Majesty should have power and jurisdiction over her subjects who might for the time being be residing in, or resorting to, countries or places out of her Dominions. That power might almost be described as enormous; and the real question for them to consider was, not whether they possessed sufficient powers, but whether in a particular case they would run the risk of putting them in force. And when he spoke of legally raising and putting these powers in force, of course the House would understand exactly what he meant. He had been asked the other day by an hon. Member whether it was the intention of the Government to appoint a Consul General in the heart of Africa for the purpose of exercising jurisdiction, and he replied that there was a very great danger in making appointments of that kind. If a Native Chief should carry off a British Consul, who could hardly be environed with a sufficient guard in the heart of Africa to resist the capture by a Chief who happened to be very powerful, they would be probably committed to a military expedition, which would involve great cost and great danger to the troops, in order to release our representative. Therefore, they must be very careful how they attempted to acquire jurisdiction in places where they could have no sufficient force. In the Pacific, where this country possessed, by naval means, far greater power than it could have in the heart of Africa, very large special powers had been given to the High Commissioner, Sir Arthur Gordon, who was Governor of Fiji, and in many cases the High Commissioner had been able to exercise great influence in the direction which the hon. Member for Glasgow would desire. The hon. Member's Amendment began with a preamble referring to the reports of recent outrages alleged to have been committed by missionaries; but out of the three instances which his hon. Friend had laid before the House, one did not concern the missionaries at all. From reading the Notice of his Amendment, he had thought his hon. Friend was going to deal almost exclusively with the case of the Blantyre Mission. But his hon. Friend had gone on to speak of the New Britain case, and also of the case of Mr. Stanley, as to which there was no allusion whatever in the Motion. The Stanley case was one in which missionaries were not concerned, and had that case been adverted to specially by Resolution, great difficulty might have been experienced in defending the exercise of jurisdiction which there occurred. As he had already pointed out, however, that case did not come within the preamble of the present Resolution, and it was certainly not his intention to go into it, or attempt to offer any defence or justification of the circumstances concerned with it. As to the two cases in which missionaries were concerned, the Blantyre case came under the cognizance of the Foreign Office. The New Britain case did not. It had been dealt with by the Admiralty, and was under the Colonial Office. With regard to the Blantyre case, that seemed a bad case, so far as the circumstances were known; but he did not think it was necessary to go into this matter at length, because it was one which, as the hon. that that gentleman had expressed his great disappointment that no one had come forward to defend him against the accusation brought against him. The fact was that Mr. Stanley had been in continued danger of his life while travelling down the river. The Natives had been very threatening in their attitude towards him, and the act of which complaint had been made was described by Mr. Stanley as a single event constituting his defence during his journey through the country. Had that gentleman not acted pluckily as he did, the probability was that he would never have returned from the heart of Africa to give an account of his Mission to discover the sources of the Congo. He did not believe Mr. Stanley would commit any wanton outrage.

Dr. CAMERON said, that, after the satisfactory statement of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, he would ask the leave of the House to withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MOTION.

RUSSIA AND BRITISH INDIA.

RESOLUTION.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT rose to call attention to the relations of Great Britain and of Russia with Afghanistan and Central Asia; and to move—

“That, in view of the great advance made by Russia since 1862 towards Afghanistan and British India, and of the desirability of preventing that Power from obtaining a foothold south of the great desert between the Caspian, the Hindoo Koosh, and the Oxus, which forms the natural boundary to a further advance southwards; and in view of the necessity of preserving the independence of the Turcoman tribes as a bulwark against the Russian armies, and of the importance of Afghanistan from a military, commercial, and political aspect as constituting the key of British India and as commanding all the great trade routes of Central Asia; and in view of the great expenditure and labour already incurred on several occasions in occupying Afghanistan, it is desirable for the safety of the British Empire in India and the security of the 250,000,000 of people inhabiting that Country, and for the highest interests of civilisation, that the British occupation of Afghanistan shall be maintained, but more especially that the great fortress of Kandahar shall be permanently garrisoned by British troops.”

QUESTION.

ALLEGED POISONING AT WELBECK.

MR. MAPPIN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the alleged wholesale poisoning at Welbeck, Nottinghamshire, where several deaths have occurred, and it is said sixty persons have been ill; and, if he will send a Government official to inquire into the whole affair, as the adjourned inquest has been held and the Deputy Coroner expressed an opinion very much in opposition to the medical evidence produced?

MR. ARTHUR PEEL, in reply, said, he understood that the Local Medical Officer of Health had been in communication with the Local Government Board on the subject. The inquest was now pending, and the medical officers were examining the intestines of some of the victims of this unfortunate occurrence. If it was thought necessary to have an independent inquiry by the Local Government Board, no doubt that would be done.

quired into by Captain Purvis, acting under the Admiralty. It was no part of his (Mr. Grant Duff's) duty to defend the proceedings of Mr. Brown, but it was only fair to say that the report of Captain Purvis to the Admiralty after the inquiry instituted by him was very favourable to Mr. Brown's conduct. Captain Purvis came to the conclusion that the act of Mr. Brown was an act committed in legitimate self-defence. A document which had reached the Admiralty fully confirmed that view. It was the report of a German officer to the German Admiralty in relation to some other proceedings, and it was decidedly favourable to Mr. Brown. The contradictory opinions that had been expressed made it difficult to arrive at a correct view of the situation from a distance; but it would seem that in the opinions of impartial persons on the spot, as well as in the opinion of our own Admiralty, there was a great deal more to be said for Mr. Brown than was to be said against him. Shortly afterwards, Mr. Brown came to Levuka and told Sir Arthur Gordon that he was ready and willing to submit his proceedings to a full investigation. Sir Arthur Gordon, while holding that it was impossible to inquire into such a matter at a distance from the place where the events occurred, would probably so far have gone into it as to have enabled Mr. Brown to state his case, if the Chief Judicial Commissioner, without any concert with Sir Arthur Gordon, had not directed the commencement of criminal proceedings against Mr. Brown. The continuance of the inquiry before Sir Arthur Gordon would have been manifestly improper; and he, therefore, informed Mr. Brown that, while proceedings before the Chief Judicial Commissioner were pending, he felt it necessary to adjourn the further prosecution of his own inquiry, adding that, whatever opinion he might entertain of the judiciousness of Mr. Brown's action, he felt bound to inform him that no evidence had been laid before him which appeared to render the prosecution of a criminal charge against Mr. Brown necessary. Sir Arthur Gordon also wrote a letter to the Chief Judicial Commissioner, in which he communicated to that officer an opinion similar to that which he had expressed to Mr. Brown. Partly in consequence of this letter, and partly, if not, as might be presumed, chiefly, because there was really no informant or prosecutor in the case, the charge against Mr. Brown was dismissed when it came on for hearing before Mr. Gorrie, and Mr. Brown immediately afterwards sailed on his return to Duke of York's Island. Most of the witnesses had since left the locality; and even if it were possible to do so, it did not appear that any useful purpose would be served by re-opening the inquiry.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, the House owed the hon Member for Glasgow a debt of gratitude for raising this question. It had been stated by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke) that the Government were determined, as far as they could, to prevent missionaries or other persons from exercising illegitimate authority over the Natives with whom they might come in contact. He hoped the Government would make it understood that the matter was not to end by their merely making that statement, and expressing that opinion, but they would enforce what they had stated. Very serious difficulties had arisen because former Governments had not made it known that they were determined to enforce such a view. There was a tendency on the part of missionaries in foreign countries to interfere with the political and territorial affairs of the countries in which they were stationed; and he could not help thinking that if Her Majesty's Government, in conjunction with the other Powers, could put an end to this state of things, they would do a large amount of good. There could, he thought, be no doubt that the work of missionaries in the making of converts would be helped forward by their not taking part in any political operations in the countries to which they were sent for very different purposes.

SIR HARRY VERNEY thought it necessary that where the Government gave any sanction or approval to the establishment of British subjects in any part of the world, and especially in uncivilized parts, there should be, if possible, some means of protecting and controlling them, and preventing them being guilty of actions which bring disgrace on their country.

MAJOR NOLAN wished to explain to the House that he had had some private conversation with Mr. Stanley with reference to his African Expedition, and indeed. He might state that the rates were 112 per cent over the market price previously asked. The rise in the price of the seed was in consequence of the passage of that Act. The great demand for fresh seed caused an increase in the price. Consequently, Boards of Guardians had to buy seed at a price at which potatoes never reached before in Ireland. So, from every point of view, the charge was an exceedingly heavy one upon tenant farmers, and it would be impossible for them to meet it at the present time. The Guardians admitted that if the advance were collected at the present time, the result would be that the feelings of the people would be set against the re-payment of the loan altogether. The people desired to pay it; but if pressed by the Guardians for re-payment before their crops were brought in, public opinion in Ireland would be more or less set against the re-payment altogether. At present, the desire was to look upon this as a just debt, and to avoid any unnecessary hardship in the collection of the money. They, therefore, thought that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor of Dublin was a fair and proper one. They asked the assent of the Government to the proposal that the landlords should not be asked to repay their loans for two years; but they now asked that the same period should be extended to the tenants. The tenants were willing to pay half of the advance, if postponed for a year, and the remaining half at the end of the year. He begged to move—

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he thought they were not proceeding quite regularly. The moneys for this purpose would be paid out of the Public Funds, and not out of the funds of the Irish Church Temporalities Commission. Under those circumstances, it was necessary that an Instruction should be received by the Committee, in the form of a Resolution passed by a Committee of the Whole House, before an Amendment could be proposed.

MR. PARNELL said, that they did not propose to take money out of the Public Funds. The money had been already taken out of the Public Funds, and the Amendment dealt only with the question of the postponement of re-payment. With all submission to the Chair, he thought it was quite competent to move the Amendment. He would also point out that the Bill already dealt with grants from the Public Funds. By Clause 5, the Commissioners of Public Works were authorized to make advances of certain amounts of public money.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he only desired that their proceedings should be regular. If it were desired to take money from the Public Funds, the proposal must emanate from a Minister of the Crown; or if the purpose were to postpone an instalment of a debt due to the Crown, the consent of the Crown would be necessary. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would state his opinion on the matter, in order that he (the Chairman) might more clearly understand the points involved.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he understood that any proposal with regard to the postponement of the re-payment of money to the Public Funds might be brought within the scope of this Bill without going through the form of a Resolution in Committee to obtain the approval of the Crown. He had, however, to make a proposal to which he trusted the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) would agree. He could not see that a loan for seed was in the same position as a loan for works. Loans for works, which necessarily took some time in making, could not repay themselves for some years; but loans for seed, which he believed had done a great deal of good, would repay themselves in a very short time. They had every reason to believe that, in an enormous majority of cases, the loans for seed would abundantly repay themselves very soon. There was a larger crop of potatoes in Ireland than there had been for a long time, and much good would result from the advance. He was very glad to find that the feeling in Ireland was strongly in favour of the re-payment of these loans. If it had not been so, it would lead them to suppose that it was thought unnecessary to repay any loan. A loan which would repay itself so soon, eminently required to be repaid. About £600,000 had been granted for these loans, and in a very large proportion of cases it would be far better for everybody that the re-payment should be made soon. It would be a dangerous thing to let the crop, for the Clause 1 (Short Title).

On Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill?"

MR. BIGGAR said, that he had intended to give Notice of an Amendment to the clause. The result of the Bill was to give assistance to the landlords and not to the tenants, and he felt very much disposed to move that the clause should not stand part of the Bill. He hoped, however, that such amendments of the Bill would be made in the course of its progress through Committee as would entitle it to be called a Bill for the Relief of Distress in Ireland. At present, it seemed rather a Bill for the relief of landlords than tenants.

THE CHAIRMAN asked whether the hon. Member proposed to move an Amendment to the clause?

MR. BIGGAR said, he was proposing to criticize the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Question was that the clause stand part of the Bill.

MR. BIGGAR said, he proposed to move that the clause should not stand part of the Bill. The result of the Bill would not be relieve Irish distress, but only to give a large bonus to Irish landlords. He had recently received letters from various of his constituents in the County Gavan, making complaints that a highly respected gentleman who was formerly a Member of that House had borrowed a large sum of money from the Government and was making objectional improvements upon his property, instead of employing the money in the relief of the small farmers. He was, in fact, giving employment to the sons of those farmers who were able to pay their rent, instead of granting relief to those who were in distress. Some complaints had been made in a great many other places, and he (Mr. Biggar) thought he was right in saying that the result of this Bill, particularly of this clause, would be to perpetuate that state of things. He thought that the clause should be expunged from the Bill, until they could see what the result of Amendments to the measure would be.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 2 (Amendment of Relief of Distress Act).

MR. PARNELL said, that in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the County Carlow (Mr. Gray), he had to ask for permission to move the Amendment of which the right hon. Gentleman had given Notice. The Amendment related to the advances made by Parliament for the purpose of enabling Boards of Guardians in certain districts of Ireland to lend or advance seed in the shape of the potato seed, and for other crops, to such persons as should require them. By the Act under which these advances were authorized, it was provided that the loans should be repaid by the Boards of Guardians to the Treasury at the end of next year. But, in order to effect that re-payment, it had been necessary for the Boards of Guardians to collect the first instalment of the advance from the tenants. This was done, in many cases, before the growth of the crop to produce which the seed had been lent had been got in. It was very commonly the case, with regard to potatoes, to allow them to remain in the ground until a late period, because it was found that they ate the better for being left in the ground; also that they were less liable to disease afterwards. There was some talk in Ireland during the late Election of asking the Government to remit the whole of the amount advanced for seed; but the leaders of public opinion, upon re-considering the matter, had thought that if they could obtain for the tenants the postponement of the re-payment of the first instalment for another year, they would be thus in a position to pay the amount to the Treasury. The loans had been described as having been of enormous assistance to all classes in Ireland, and it had been felt by the tenants that they ought to endeavour to do their very best to repay the loans as soon as it was possible to be done. The seed purchased for the purpose of making these loans was purchased at a very high rate

indeed. He might state that the rates were 112 per cent over the market price previously asked. The rise in the price of the seed was in consequence of the passage of that Act. The great demand for fresh seed caused an increase in the price. Consequently, Boards of Guardians had to buy seed at a price at which potatoes never reached before in Ireland. So, from every point of view, the charge was an exceedingly heavy one upon tenant farmers, and it would be impossible for them to meet it at the present time. The Guardians admitted that if the advance were collected at the present time, the result would be that the feelings of the people would be set against the re-payment of the loan altogether. The people desired to pay it; but if pressed by the Guardians for re-payment before their crops were brought in, public opinion in Ireland would be more or less set against the re-payment altogether. At present, the desire was to look upon this as a just debt, and to avoid any unnecessary hardship in the collection of the money. They, therefore, thought that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor of Dublin was a fair and proper one. They asked the assent of the Government to the proposal that the landlords should not be asked to repay their loans for two years; but they now asked that the same period should be extended to the tenants. The tenants were willing to pay half of the advance, if postponed for a year, and the remaining half at the end of the year. He begged to move—

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he thought they were not proceeding quite regularly. The moneys for this purpose would be paid out of the Public Funds, and not out of the funds of the Irish Church Temporalities Commission. Under those circumstances, it was necessary that an Instruction should be received by the Committee, in the form of a Resolution passed by a Committee of the Whole House, before an Amendment could be proposed.

MR. PARNELL said, that they did not propose to take money out of the Public Funds. The money had been already taken out of the Public Funds, and the Amendment dealt only with the question of the postponement of re-payment. With all submission to the Chair, he thought it was quite competent to move the Amendment. He would also point out that the Bill already dealt with grants from the Public Funds. By Clause 5, the Commissioners of Public Works were authorized to make advances of certain amounts of public money.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he only desired that their proceedings should be regular. If it were desired to take money from the Public Funds, the proposal must emanate from a Minister of the Crown; or if the purpose were to postpone an instalment of a debt due to the Crown, the consent of the Crown would be necessary. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would state his opinion on the matter, in order that he (the Chairman) might more clearly understand the points involved.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he understood that any proposal with regard to the postponement of the re-payment of money to the Public Funds might be brought within the scope of this Bill without going through the form of a Resolution in Committee to obtain the approval of the Crown. He had, however, to make a proposal to which he trusted the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) would agree. He could not see that a loan for seed was in the same position as a loan for works. Loans for works, which necessarily took some time in making, could not repay themselves for some years; but loans for seed, which he believed had done a great deal of good, would repay themselves in a very short time. They had every reason to believe that, in an enormous majority of cases, the loans for seed would abundantly repay themselves very soon. There was a larger crop of potatoes in Ireland than there had been for a long time, and much good would result from the advance. He was very glad to find that the feeling in Ireland was strongly in favour of the re-payment of these loans. If it had not been so, it would lead them to suppose that it was thought unnecessary to repay any loan. A loan which would repay itself so soon, eminently required to be repaid. About £600,000 had been granted for these loans, and in a very large proportion of cases it would be far better for everybody that the re-payment should be made soon. It would be a dangerous thing to let the crop, for the purpose of which the money had been advanced, come to an end without any repayment being made. That was an argument that tended very strongly against the proposal that had been made. But there were some very distressed Unions; and if the clause, which he believed was not strictly in Order, were now withdrawn, he would undertake before Report that a clause should be brought in which would give the Local Government Board the power to postpone payment for one year in cases in which it might be right to do so. He must accompany that statement by saying that they should require very strong cases of hardship to be shown before declining to exercise the power to exact re-payment in the present year. They should recollect that the largest sum to be demanded from any tenant would be £2 10s. He was aware that was a large sum to some of the small tenants in Ireland; but, generally speaking, the amount to be repaid would not be so much. He was informed that this money would be in process of collection between November and March, and, therefore, it would be paid out of the crop of the present year. He hoped that the hon. Member would consent to the course that he had suggested.

Mr. CALLAN said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to be disinclined to extend the time, except in certain distressed Unions. The Seed Act applied to all Ireland, and in counties such as that which he represented it was only the very poor who, in extreme cases, had applied for seed. The seed given was of a very inferior quality, and it was only applied for when persons could neither beg nor borrow from any other source. It was, therefore, only the very poorest of the farmers who had applied for this miserable seed last spring. Although they had had no food for a long time, they were to be called upon to repay these small loans immediately after the harvest. If that were done, they would only bring the poor into the same condition next year that they were in this. If this year there was a good harvest, by means of the loan farmers might be enabled to tide over to next year. He was not in favour of the extreme measures put forward by hon. Gentlemen with whom he did not act; but he believed there could be no greater boon than the extension of the time sought for. He hoped that the Government would accede to the proposal that had been made.

Mr. SYNAN said, that he thought the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to postpone the matter until the Report was very fair. He did not think there could be any objection to leaving it to the discretion of the Local Government Board in Dublin, and to the Boards of Guardians, to determine in which cases re-payment should be postponed. It might be necessary in some cases to permit postponement, whereas, in others, there might not be the same necessity.

Mr. TOTTENHAM said, that there was no doubt that in many Unions cases would arise in which the discretion of the Local Government Board and the Poor Law Guardians could be fittingly exercised. He thought it should be clearly understood that this was not to be taken as the commencement of a movement for the repudiation of the loan. He regretted that in several Unions in Ireland there was a desire to repudiate the re-payment of the loans.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) had stated, on another occasion, that he had originally intended to bring forward something very like a proposal for the remission of the debt on account of this loan; but that he had found public opinion in Ireland did not justify that course. For that reason, they might rest assured that the Irish people did not desire to do anything like repudiation. He should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland meant to extend the discretion of the power to cases in the unscheduled, as well as in the scheduled Unions? He hoped that he would undertake that power should be given to the Local Government Boards to extend their discretion to the Unions which were not scheduled as well as to those which were scheduled. He should suggest that, under the circumstances, the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlow should be withdrawn, and that it should be brought forward on the Report in order that they might see what the proposals of the Government were.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, that the clause should be so framed that the Local Government Board should consult the Boards of Guardians as to the Unions in which postponement of the instalment should apply. He understood from the Clerk at the Table that there was some difficulty as to the form in which this matter should be brought forward. In the case of an additional grant from the Public Funds, it was necessary to go through the form of a Committee.

MR. BIGGAR said, that he could not understand the grounds upon which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland opposed the Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell). The right hon. Gentleman admitted that the proposal was right in principle, but only objected to the details of it. There was no doubt that the Local Government Board in Ireland was thoroughly overworked. If the independent occupiers had any substantial moveable property that could be turned into money, the Guardians would not have made these advances; but they had not, and they not only required seed for their land, but they required sustenance for themselves. In many districts the people were more or less paupers, and were dependent upon charitable assistance; yet it was proposed, in remote districts, to exact re-payment of these loans before the people had the money to repay them. He did not think there was anything unreasonable in the proposal for postponement. It was only proposed that in the suffering districts the re-payment should be postponed for one year from the present time.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not consider the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was quite so satisfactory as some of his hon. Friends seemed to think. But, in the absence of his right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Gray), who had placed this Amendment on the Paper, and who took a great interest in the question, he could not take upon himself the responsibility of rejecting the compromise, more especially as he was assured that they could not continue the discussion upon this question by reason of the Rules of the House; but he would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that he should take the power in his proposed new clause for the Local Government Board to postpone the repayment of a portion, or the whole, of the instalments in any Union that the Local Government Board might think proper, because it was exceedingly probable that there would be a great many Unions where it was difficult for a portion of the tenant farmers to pay this year, and yet the remaining portion of the farmers might be able to pay. At the same time, he thought it would probably have been better if he could allow the whole of the charge to be postponed for a year. The Committee would recollect that that was the intention of the Legislature on the passing of the Act of Parliament. The intention of the Legislature was evidently that the farmer should pay in the next 12 months. That was shown by the way the Act of Parliament referred to the Boards of Guardians; but by a rule necessarily adopted by the Local Government Board, in order that the Boards of Guardians should pay next year, it became necessary that the tenants should pay this year, so that the intention of the Legislature was clear that the tenants should not be called upon to pay this year. He thought that where the payment could not be made without undue harshness or pressure upon those who had contracted the debt, then the re-payment was a matter which could not fairly be insisted upon. Of course, they had been charged with the desire to repudiate their debts; but he believed that no people were more willing than the people of Ireland to carry out their just contracts—contracts entered into according to the conditions under which contracts were usually entered into in civilized countries. He had seen no disposition on the part of the Poor Law Unions in Ireland to repudiate their just debts. He should ask permission to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. TOTTENHAM said, that he had accurate information as to the desire shown in some Unions to repudiate the re-payment of the loans granted under the Seeds Act. In one case a resolution had been agreed to by the Guardians of a Union, declaring that it would be morally impossible in a great majority of cases to collect the tax for the supply of seed potatoes.

MR. FINIGAN said, that one swallow made no summer, and the fact that one Board of Guardians wished to repudiate their debt did not prove that the purpose of which the money had been advanced, come to an end without any repayment being made. That was an argument that attended very strongly against the proposal that had been made. But there were some very distressed Unions; and if the clause, which he believed was not strictly in Order, were now withdrawn, he would undertake before Report that a clause should be brought in which would give the Local Government Board the power to postpone payment for one year in cases in which it might be right to do so. He must accompany that statement by saying that they should require very strong cases of hardship to be shown before declining to exercise the power to exact re-payment in the present year. He should suggest that, under the circumstances, the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlow should be withdrawn, and that it should be brought forward on the Report in order that they might see what the proposals of the Government were.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the clause should be so framed that the

wish to throw the responsibility for this upon him, because, no doubt, it had come as one of the heritages created by the ineffectual attempts of the late Government to deal with the distress. The people of Ireland had been living on meal supplied by charitable contributions; those contributions had fallen off, and in a few weeks the strain of relieving the people would be thrown upon the system which the Chief Secretary for Ireland was putting into operation. But the few Poor Law Boards administering relief had been doing so in an inefficient manner, and with the most careful regard to the pockets of the ratepayers; and already the Chief Secretary for Ireland had had to nominate paid Commissioners in their stead. The Committee possessed little information as to these official Guardians, and it might, he believed, be assumed that it was not easy to get men capable of dealing at short notice with the emergency which existed in Ireland. Any inducement, therefore, which the Legislature could give the Poor Law Unions to co-operate in the system of relief, would be of the utmost importance. He would, therefore, suggest that, in the event of his Amendment being agreed to, the Local Government Board should announce to such Unions as they thought proper, where any emergency existed, that they would give one-half, one-third, or one-fourth of the amount paid for out-door relief. The Unions would then have a direct stimulus to administer relief, because, if they refused, they could be forced to do so, and if they threw obstructions in the way of the Local Government Board, they could be punished by withholding from them the proposed grants in aid. He had a right to say that the unanimous opinion of the Irish Members was entitled to consideration; and when he moved the second reading of his Bill, hon. Member after hon. Member had risen and urged its acceptance by the Government. The Irish Members had in every way met the wishes of the Government, and they had agreed to leave the distribution of the money in the hands of the Poor Law Boards, although they were convinced that there existed an emergency with which it was impossible to cope, even by means of those Boards. He, therefore, urged upon the right hon. Gentleman the necessity of accepting his Amendment. The money was to come out of the Irish Church Fund, and would therefore lay no burden on the Imperial Exchequer. It was the money of the Irish people. Already £1,500,000 had been given out of the Irish Church Fund to the Commissioners of Works; and he believed that this grant, which he now proposed, would be instrumental, during the six weeks which intervened between that time and the harvest, in preventing much sickness and in saving a good many lives. The Special Commissioner of The Freeman's Journal reported that fever was raging in Swinford Union; a total of 21 people had been removed to the workhouse suffering with fever. Some doubt had been cast upon the opinion that it was famine fever; but, if it was not famine fever, it was fever caused by distress, and by want of food, as well as by the want of change of diet. Again, if it was not famine fever, it was because there had not been the same extremity of distress and actual famine in Ireland as there had been in 1846-7; but it was more virulent and more catching, and was likely to spread over a large area, if some machinery could not be had to provide better food and clothing for the people than they had during the last six months. He had information that the allowance of Indian meal to each person per day was about 32 ounces, and this, it would be seen, was not so good as the allowance in the prisons in this country, where they gave soup and potatoes twice a-day. Under these circumstances, he urged upon the Government the necessity of making further provision for the relief of the people of Ireland. But, unless some relief were given to the bankrupt Poor Law Boards, it would be impossible to make any change in the scale of diet which they were obliged to adopt. With the object, therefore, of preventing further sickness and loss of life in Ireland, he begged to move the insertion of the Amendment of which he had given Notice, such Amendment to be taken, as he proposed, in connection with the next Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, after "Act," to insert "And whereas it is desirable to enable the Commissioner of Public Works, on the recommendation of the Local Government Board, to advance moneys, by way of grant, to Boards of Guardians in scheduled Unions, subject to the restrictions and conditions hereinafter set forth."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. LITTON said, he thought it would be extremely desirable if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland could adopt some such suggestion as had been made. No doubt, it would be an encouragement to the Unions if they knew that a certain portion of the expenses of out-door relief would be paid out of some such fund as that indicated by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell). He had the more pleasure in supporting these suggestions, because he had strongly opposed the Bill of the hon. Member. He could not help thinking, however, it was most desirable to give relief to Unions in the manner proposed; and, as they were to have a clause brought up on Report having reference to the postponement of the instalments of the loan for seed potatoes, he thought that power might also be given to the Local Government Board to grant sums of money in aid of out-door relief, out of a portion of the Irish Church Fund, as suggested. This would be accepted as an indication of the intention of the Government to meet the wishes of the people in Ireland.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, the proposal made by the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell), the other evening, differed from that now made. In the course of the interval, the hon. Gentleman had abandoned certain features of his project. The Amendment, as it now stood, meant that the Local Government Board should take to themselves the power to make grants, if it became necessary to do so, and was intended simply as a matter of precaution. They had lost one of the means by which distress in Ireland had been relieved—namely, the voluntary societies which had collected alms, but which were now at the end of their means, and were about to cease to exist, and the entire expense was now to be thrown upon the Local Government Board, who were confessedly unable to meet the distress of the past. Was it possible, he asked, that the Government were about to reject the means by which the hands of the Local Government Board could be strengthened at the moment when the machinery hitherto employed at their side was about to pass away? He urged on the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to accept the terms in which the Amendment was drawn. No constraint was put upon the Local Government Board to give the money. If they gave it, they were to have regard to the financial condition of the Unions, and were not to throw it broadcast over the land. They were only to give it in cases where the Unions would be reduced to further pauperism by the additional rates, and it was on recommendation of the Local Government Board, the Central Board itself, that any such grant should be made. Therefore, he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork City contained every provision and precaution which could be deemed necessary for the purpose of saving the proposal from abuse; and, in his opinion, the proposal was one which might be abused unless it were so protected. It might be abused by those Boards of Guardians who had shown signs of neglecting their duty; but means had been taken to prevent this, because it rested with the Local Government Board to recommend the grant. Under those circumstances, surely the Government would hesitate before they refused to accept the Amendment. The Government organization in Ireland had already required the assistance of additional voluntary helps—the Mansion House Fund, and the other Funds which had been created. But those Funds were now disappearing, and a worse time was at hand, when the distress, according to all official accounts, would reach its acme. Again, he asked, would the Government cast away means which need not be called into use, but which, if the distress continued, would become absolutely necessary? There was now an almost unanimous opinion on the part of the Irish Members in favour of this proposal. The hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton) had objected to the machinery which the hon. Member for Cork City had proposed to set up for the purpose of applying these grants. He had come down the other night, and was the only hon. Member who had made a speech against the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork City, grounded on his objections to the machinery proposed to be used; but the hon. Member had that morning joined in recommending the Government to adopt the Amendment. He (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) could not say what were the views of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan); but it was certain that, with the possible exception of that hon. Member, the whole of the Irish Representation approved the principle of the Amendment. Under those circumstances, apart altogether from what he believed would be the danger of losing the machinery suggested, he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork City.

MR. WARTON said, it appeared to him that the sentence on the Paper was incomplete, inasmuch as it had no termination.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not but admit that hon. Members who were interested in this discussion were approaching the question in a way which showed their desire to meet all the difficulties of the case. Perhaps he might be allowed to explain his position in the matter. He did not want to make a larger dip into the Irish Church Fund than he could help; but he admitted there were purposes to which it might be usefully applied. He could not absolutely forget what was the wording of the Land Act—namely, "That the said property should be devoted mainly to the relief of those in suffering, yet not so as to impair the obligation which attached to property under the Acts for the relief of the poor." He admitted that, inasmuch as this was an Irish Fund, the opinion of the very large majority of Irish Members with reference to it ought to be considered. But he could not forget the duties of his own position. If he were responsible for the management of the Poor Law in Ireland, he must be careful before assenting to what would be, to his mind, of very injurious effect upon the future action of the Poor Law. He thought it would be a very grave defect to weaken the sense of obligation on the part of the ratepayers to relieve distress, especially when it was remembered that the rates fell in Ireland more directly upon the land than they did in England. It was a very serious matter to lay down the principle that the rates should be excused when a period of distress arrived. He could not, also, forget the great benefit arising to the rates by the public subscriptions to the charitable funds, in consequence of which they had been remarkably exempt from pressure during the late distress. In many Unions where distress had occurred there had been scarcely any increase in the rates. They had now only four or six weeks to wait before the harvest would be ripe, and if the distress was not relieved by a good harvest, the Government would be driven to take steps beyond anything they had yet taken. That was the reason why he had been obliged to take up a strong position against the proposal made on a former occasion. The proposal now placed before them was, however, different. It was not absolutely to give a grant; but it left it to the Local Government Board to make a grant, if they found the distress could not really be relieved otherwise. He confessed he was not unwilling to accept that principle; but he must state that, in what he considered to be the interest of the Boards of Guardians, he should in all cases require definite proof that such grant ought to be made. He was grateful to have the burden of responsibility lightened by having that resort in the back ground, but wished to be clearly understood. He hoped the Guardians throughout the distressed districts would understand that the Government thought they ought to be able to do with the offer of loans made to them, and that they should clearly prove the necessity of a grant in the event of the offer of loans not being sufficient to meet their distress.

MR. CALLAN said, he was at a loss to understand why his name should be drawn into this discussion by the hon. and learned Member for the City of Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy). The course taken by him (Mr. Callan) the other evening had been alluded to.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member was out of Order in referring to other proceedings in the House of Commons.

MR. CALLAN said, he was referring to what had taken place in this discussion. When the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) came before the House, he adopted the course which he should recommend to hon. Members—namely, he supported his opinion, and never shirked a division in support of that opinion. This Amendment was quite different from the question before the House the other evening. The other evening he opposed the Bill;

Mr. Litton

But he gave this Amendment his warmest and cordial support. For many reasons he supported the proposal that the Local Government Board should advise the Commissioners of Public Works to grant money to the Boards of Guardians by way of a grant. There were many cases where relief could not be given except money was advanced by way of grant. Some Unions would be happy to accept money by way of a loan who would not take anything as a grant. He thought, therefore, that it should be in the power of the Local Government Board to recommend that certain Unions should receive part by grants and part by loans; but he would suggest, however, that it would be better to leave the words "in scheduled Unions" out of the Amendment.

SIR H. HERVEY BRUCE said, that he did not wish to be understood as agreeing with the principle of the Amendment. He did not think it fair to give to one district in Ireland a preference over others.

MR. P. MARTIN said, that he thought the power of the Local Government Board to make grants in cases where the Unions might be unable to bear the excessive strain on their resources in consequence of exceptional distress ought not to be confined to certain districts, but should be extended to the whole of Ireland. There might be a difficulty about the extension of the Amendment, if it were not proposed to leave the Guardians in the hands of the Local Government Board and within the direction of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. In many Unions, as the right hon. Gentleman well knew, which were not scheduled under the Relief of Distress Act, the suffering and destitution had been on the increase. The rates struck in these unscheduled Unions had been very high, and would, if continued, pauperize many of those who had not up to the present sought relief. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would listen to the suggestion which had been made on the other side; and, as this Fund belonged to the entire Irish people, the principle of the Amendment should be extended to include every Union throughout Ireland where exceptional distress which ought to receive aid should be ascertained to have overtaxed the resources of the Union.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that he begged to thank the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland very much for the manner in which he had accepted this Amendment. He thought it might be worked so as to produce the greatest benefit to the county from which he came, and he thought it might also prevent much distress in Coleraine. If there were any distress in Galway or Kilkenny, he had no doubt relief would be sent to those counties through the Local Government Board, and, in that way, distress in any part of Ireland would be met. In the distribution of large funds like those of the Irish Church, it was inevitable that poorer districts should get more than rich ones, and the sooner people made up their minds to that being the case the better. He had a suggestion to make to the Government with respect to this Bill. It was clear that the Bill could not receive the Royal Assent before the 25th of July, and the Boards in Dublin could not do anything in the matter until the Bill received the Royal Assent. He knew that that was so, because he had some correspondence on the subject when the Seeds Act was passed. He was then anxious to issue Circulars before the Statute received the Royal Assent; but they explained that it was very difficult for them to act upon any Bill passing through the House, and that they must wait until the Act had received the Royal Assent. In the present state of the case, it would make a great difference to the distressed districts whether the good intentions of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland were to be put into effect within four or five days, or whether they were not to be carried out before the 25th of July. This was a matter of the greatest importance, and he hoped that the Government would at once issue instructions to the Local Government Board, that they might venture to act upon this clause before it received the Royal Assent, and after passing the House of Commons. He might mention that, to his knowledge, fever was very bad at the present moment in many districts. In the neighbourhood of Loughrea, and in the County of Galway, as many as 10 families were down at once with fever. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would not only, as he had done, accept the proposal of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell), but that he would take care that it was carried into execution.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought that the Amendment must be restricted to the scheduled Unions, or rather to the action of the 3rd section of the Relief Act, which gave power to the Local Government Board, or certain Unions, to break the old Poor Law by giving outdoor relief. He thought, therefore, it would be better to withdraw the words "in scheduled Unions," because the scheduled Unions were understood to be those scheduled for the purpose of loans made. It did not follow that the 3rd section of the Act must apply to the Unions also which had been scheduled. But this power given to the Local Government Board ought to be restricted to those Unions in which only the power had been given to break the old Poor Law and to give outdoor relief. He must tell the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin) that he understood the wish of the Committee to be that, if such grants were made, they ought to be made not simply because the rates were high, and with the view of relieving the rates, but because, without such help, the people could not be relieved from distress. The mere fact of the rates being high was no reason for making a grant. With regard to the observations of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), he thought he could show him that the Government were anxious to do all that they could. He might state that, yesterday, he gave directions that all the distressed Unions should be informed that the terms for loans would be much more favourable than at first, and that whatever money was borrowed would be advanced on the terms, and would be fixed by this Act. He thought that that would anticipate the good effect of its passing, and let the information go out to the distressed districts. He should suggest to the hon. Member to strike out the word "scheduled" from his Amendment. He thought it would be better to put it in this way—

"Power should be given to advance money by way of grant to Boards of Guardians of any Union which gives outdoor relief under Section 3 of the Relief Act."

They could not exactly settle the terms until they came to the clause.

DR. LYONS said, that it might be necessary to provide for very exceptional circumstances. Without going into the figures that he had produced to the Committee on a former occasion, and which proved that the measures proposed to be adopted were very inadequate to meet any great increase of distress in Ireland, he thought it would be desirable for the right hon. Gentleman to make some elementary calculations as to the sum which would be required. Before fixing the amount to be advanced, it would be very desirable to ascertain how much per head it would be necessary to provide for a given time in case of the recurrence of severe distress over an extended period. It would be found that £400,000 already distributed had not afforded above 1d. per head per day for the 500,000 persons who had been relieved. The relief of those 500,000 persons extended over a period of four months, and the right hon. Gentleman must be aware that in various districts of Ireland the exact amount of rates levied was no measure of the distress existing or of the relief given. They knew that relief was given very much by the varying theories of Boards of Guardians. In some districts where the distress had been considerable the rates were not high, and in other districts where less distress had existed the rates had been very high. As he said on a former occasion, if it should unfortunately happen that they had to face another bad harvest, and that this should turn out to be a wet year, there was no doubt that they would have before them a period of suffering such as Ireland had not gone through for a quarter of a century. In view of these circumstances, it would be well to make provision for the greatest possible pressure of distress that could occur. He would suggest that it might be much wiser to take the outside figures as the ground-work for the relief which could be distributed. He was not naming any figure; but he would strongly recommend the right hon. Gentleman only to go into an elementary calculation, when they would be able to see the necessity there was for providing for large contingencies.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, it would contribute to the progress of the Bill if they were to confine themselves to the Amendment, the principle of which the Government accepted. That principle was a definite one, and he was not going to raise any objection to its acceptance; but he thought it would be more convenient that the Government should undertake to bring up a clause, either before or upon Report, embodying the matter, inasmuch as the details required their consideration, and they would lose a great deal of time by discussing them in the present state of their opinion. Whatever clause was to be adopted, there was no use of discussing the details at the present time.

THE CHAIRMAN asked if the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) withdrew his Amendment?

MR. PARNELL assented.

Amendment (Mr. Parnell), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. W. E. Forster) agreed to.

MR. SYNAN said, that he did not wish to move the Amendment which stood in his name. There was an alternative one on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins).

MR. PARNELL said, that he thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Synan) was under a wrong impression. He would see that the Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins) was not of an alternative character for that which stood in his name. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Roscommon was one throwing an additional sum of £750,000 upon the Consolidated Fund, whereas that in the name of the hon. Member (Mr. Synan) was one reducing the rate of interest to 1 per cent.

MR. SYNAN said, in that case, he would briefly call the attention of the Committee to his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he had called upon the hon. Member to move his Amendment, and that, as he had not done so, he had called upon the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray).

MR. PARNELL said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the county of Carlow (Mr. Gray) not having risen to move his Amendment, and no Amendment having been before the Committee subsequently, he submitted that his hon. Friend (Mr. Synan) was entitled to move that which stood in his name.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he understood the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was going to move the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray).

MR. SYNAN said, that the object of his Amendment was to save the Irish Church Surplus Fund from bearing the loss of interest which would accrue by giving this money out of that Fund at 1 per cent. He thought it would be well for Her Majesty's Government to consider whether the interest, to be charged by the Treasury in its loans for this Bill to the Irish Church Commissioners, ought not to be 1 per cent. The Church Fund had only a balance to its credit of £350,000, whereas it owed a sum of £7,500,000. By having to give this sum of money at 1 per cent interest, the Church Fund would lose the difference between 1 per cent and $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent for a period of 37 years, and which would amount to over £13,000 a-year. That would make a heavy addition to the charges already placed upon the Fund. The balance of the Church Surplus would, if capitalized, amount to about £6,000,000, and it would be reduced by the present loans, and the Education loans, to less than £4,000,000. In fact, at present there was no actual surplus at all. The Church Commissioners were only in receipt of a yearly income, from different sources, which were pledged to the Treasury for loans, amounting to a large sum. In fact, it might turn out that there might be no surplus at all, if this mode of mortgaging it was to be adopted. It seemed to him that there were various purposes for which the Church Fund might be more usefully applied than this. This money might be expended in various ways for the benefit of Ireland. When the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act was before the House, he moved that the money for the purpose should be taken from the Public Treasury, and not from the Irish Church Surplus. The Government of the day was then against them, and the Government was also against them on the present occasion. He did not think that the Church Fund should bear the loss of the interest, and he would put it to the Government whether it would not allow the loss to be borne by the Treasury? It would be a heavy burden upon the Church Fund, while it would be a light matter upon the Treasury. It would also be well to say to the people of Ireland, that the Imperial it was absolutely impossible that the further sum now asked for could in the meantime have been sanctioned conditionally. He confessed he could not understand upon what ground they were now told, in the course of this discussion, that the Government was morally bound to increase the amount. Originally, the Notice issued by the Government to the landlords distinctly stated that the amount of loan would be limited to £250,000, and that amount was subsequently increased to £750,000. But up to the 10th of April, the amount of loan sanctioned was only £354,520. He could see no excuse for the present Government asking that these loans might be sanctioned. The amount sanctioned by the Act of the last Session was only £750,000, and he could see no reason that they were morally or legally bound, or in any sense bound, to increase that amount. He wished now to make an explanation upon another point. The Government had given them the difference of this money, £200,000, and had taken power, by accepting the Amendment which he introduced later on, to apply a certain sum for the purpose of out-door relief. He thought it was only fair to them to pay interest and principal for such useful purposes out of the Church Surplus Fund. So far as the money at present advanced was concerned, not more than £60,000 had reached the hands of the distressed people, and he could not, therefore, regard the Act as one for the purpose of relieving Irish distress; but by the acceptance of his Amendment the Government had changed the situation, and he should be willing to accept such sums as the Government might advance to the Poor Law Board from the operation of the Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Synan). He was sure that his hon. Friend would be willing to agree to that Amendment. He wished to point out to the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury that the Government were dealing in a most shabby way with Ireland with respect to this distress. Up to the present time the Government had not given a single penny from the Imperial Exchequer for the relief of distress in Ireland. The Government of the Dominion of Canada had given £20,000, and the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. J. Lowther) was not ashamed to accept that amount and apply it to the relief of distress, although he refused to recommend his own Government to apply a single penny for the same purpose. The Legislature of Canada, one of the States of the American Union, and charitable persons throughout the entire world had subscribed sums for the relief of Irish distress amounting to £300,000, while the rich Government of England had refused to put its hands into its pockets for one single sixpence for the same purpose. He could not but think that the continual perseverance of the Government in that niggardly policy was a discredit to the Government of the country, and he trusted that his hon. Friend would press his Amendment to a division.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, he rose for the purpose of making an appeal to the noble Lord on the Treasury Bench (Lord Frederick Cavendish) in support of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan), upon the following grounds. It was obvious that the present measure was either one of generosity, or one of pure business. He had understood during the discussion, to which he had listened with great attention, that it was the wish of the Government to behave in the most generous spirit possible in the case of the distress of the Irish people, and, in fact, the Bill said as much as that. Now, he thought it was most unfortunate for the notion to get abroad, as being the true one, that the Government and the people of England and Scotland intended only to be generous so far as it involved them in no cost. He thoroughly admitted the whole of what had been urged by the noble Lord on the Treasury Bench, that a loss must result from the acceptance of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick; but he (Mr. Bradlaugh) begged to submit that that was no sort of objection to a measure of generosity, and he appealed to the Government not to be generous with half a hand. The giving £200,000 for out-door relief took the matter entirely out of any range of discussion that might be bounded by the hard-and-fast rules of political economy. On behalf of an English constituency, which consisted of a very large number of English working men, he thought he should be only doing his duty in asking the Government to allow some loss to fall upon them, rather than that measure of generosity should be misunderstood.

Mr. Parnell

It was possible that the day might come when England or Scotland might have to ask the same favour that Ireland now asked of us. If that unfortunate occasion should ever arise, and either of those countries should be so reduced as for deaths to result from famine, and appeals were made to Ireland, he had no doubt that she, in her turn, would be as generous to the people of Scotland or of England as she now asked the Government in this crisis to be to her.

MR. GIBSON said, he thought the hon. Members for County Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan) and for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) seemed to be labouring under some slight misapprehension with regard to the sum now sought by the Government to be added to that which had been already voted. The hon. Member for County Wicklow had stated that the late Government were not justified in exceeding £750,000, and that the present Government were not justified, also, in making grants in excess of that amount. He (Mr. Gibson) wished to say a few words with regard to the actual position of affairs in relation to that matter. Under the 9th section of the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, passed under the auspices of the late Government, for which they were responsible, and which he might remind the Committee was passed unanimously without a division, the following was the state of the law. Having re-stated fully and without the slightest reserve the contents of the two Circulars of November, 1879, and January, 1880, it proceeded to deal with the instructions laid down in them, by which the Government were enabled, up to the 29th of February, 1880, to allow applications to be made for loans, both by landowners and the sanitary authorities in Ireland. Those applications were allowed to be entertained on the following conditions:—No interest should be charged for the first two years, and the interest thereafter, for the remaining 35 years, was to be at the rate of 1 per cent. The second Circular had words referring to loans not exceeding £150,000, and he supposed that was what the hon. Member for the City of Cork drew attention to; but that was not a condition. That was, briefly, the state of things under the two Circulars and the 9th section of the Act of last Session. All loans made by the Board of Works in compliance with those Circulars might also thereafter be made, inasmuch as all things done, or to be done, until the 29th of February, 1880, should be valid and effectual, in accordance with the terms and conditions he had read. Furthermore, the applications which had been received in accordance with those terms and conditions they were bound to entertain, inasmuch as the Bill authorizing the grants to be made had not only been accepted by the late Parliament, but adopted without a division, and had since become the law of the land in the same way as if it had been incorporated in the Land Improvement Act. That was, generally stated, the position of the present Government and Parliament in regard to that matter, and the late Government had never shown any desire to flinch from the responsibility which fell upon them in regard to it. When the present Government came into Office they had found that the sum offered under the Circulars had failed to a certain extent on account of not being sufficient, and they therefore, no doubt, decided to introduce a Bill for another sum of £750,000 to be devoted to the same purpose. Originally, it was thought that a much less sum than that first mentioned would be sufficient. First, £200,000 was agreed upon as being enough; it then reached £500,000, and before the Bill left the House it had reached £750,000. The sum required had grown, and, no doubt, grown legitimately, from that first stated to be required to that proposed to be ratified by the second Act of Parliament. For his part, he failed to see how the terms of the 9th section of the recent Act could be reasonably cut down or qualified, and by that section the limit had not been fixed at £750,000. That sum, if considered sufficient by the present Government, would, no doubt, have been adhered to; but it had proved inadequate for the purpose. That being so, the present Government were merely carrying out the obligations cast upon them by the action of their Predecessors and the late Parliament, and he, therefore, thought that discretion ought to be allowed them, as they were in possession of the facts, to say what they considered was a sufficient sum by which to augment that which had been voted by the recent Bill.

MR. PARNELL said, he had never hinted that the Government had no power to make these loans; but he contended that there was no boon in making them. He quite agreed with what had fallen from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). It was quite true that under the 9th section of the late Act the Commissioners had the power to make advances to the extent of £750,000, instead of £250,000, the sum promised in the Circulars of the Treasury. But his contention was that it was not a boon to issue grants to landowners, other than those granted or sanctioned by the Board of Works up to the 19th April, 1880. According to the Return moved for by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), the amount of loans sanctioned to landowners in Ireland was £354,520. He (Mr. Parnell) contended that it was that sanction that was referred to in the portion of the 9th section quoted by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, when he intimated that all contracts, express or implied, which had been fully entered into between the Commissioners and any person, or the sanitary authority, respecting any such loans, should be valid and effectual. He would admit that if the Board of Works had entered into contracts up to the time when the late Government left Office to the extent of £1,250,000, the landowners would be, undoubtedly, legally entitled thereto; but, according to the Return of the Board of Works, they had only entered into such contracts to the extent of £354,520; therefore, the present Government could not shield itself if any excess beyond that sum was entered into. He wanted to know what the present Government did under these circumstances? There had been no Return on the subject and no information, although inquiry had been made, and the matter had been frequently alluded to in the discussion on that Bill. There had, he repeated, been no information whatever as to the amount of loans sanctioned by the present Government to landowners. When they came into Office, they had information in their possession to the effect that £354,520 had been sanctioned; but that was not £250,000. He should like to know how much had been sanctioned by the present Government, and the reasons why they sanctioned any additional sum to that they were entitled to do. The Government had often expressed their disapproval of those large grants, and they had thrown the blame of making such grants of public money, for purposes entirely useless, he must say, on their Predecessors. But the late Government, he contended, was only responsible for the sum of £354,520, sanctioned up to the date when they left Office. They must necessarily exonerate them from any further responsibility, and such responsibility must undoubtedly fall on the present Government.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that, without question, the statement as to the amount sanctioned by the late Government was entirely a mistake. More than £1,000,000 was sanctioned. [Mr. PARNELL said, the Return did not say so.] Perhaps, technically, it did not; but it must be understood that the loans were applied for upon terms which relieved the Government of all responsibility whatever as regarded their sanction. With reference to what had been done since, the Government considered they were only carrying out the actual undertaking made by the late Government, in sanctioning loans to landowners that had been applied for, on the condition of producing the requisite security. The Government had, clearly, no option in the matter. The hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) had asked for a statement of the amount advanced. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) was informed that more than £1,000,000 had been agreed to be advanced, of which a certain amount, in instalments, had already been paid. The hon. Gentleman was, he thought, not correctly giving the remarks which he (Mr. W. E. Forster) had made on a previous discussion. He had not stated that they considered those loans useless, for he never thought for one moment that they would be so.

MR. PARNELL said, what he had meant was that the present Government disapproved of the low rate of interest on the loans to landowners, and had expressed a belief that they were useless for the purpose of relieving the present distress.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he had stated that it was the lowest rate of interest he had ever heard of for such a loan. He did not say that he disapproved of it, for he was not sure that employment could be profitably given at a higher rate of interest. He did not recollect having given any definite opinion upon the subject, for he had been aware of the difficulties with which the late Government had to contend. What he chiefly regretted was that there were not more exact conditions with regard to the time in which the money was to be spent, and also as to the mode of employment. But their position was this—they, practically, found that the whole of the applications made before the 29th of February were to be considered as contracts which remained to be completed, provided the conditions were fulfilled and the requisite guarantees produced. In the same way he should have acted in his own business, if he had found a list of applications made to the persons into whose shoes, as it were, he had stepped. Considering that the Government had entered into certain transactions with individuals upon certain terms and conditions, he did not think that those loans could be in any way repudiated or substantially modified. The word "sanction" had a different meaning, as regarded the baronial presentments and the sanitary authorities, because then the loans were more immediately under the eye of the Government. The purpose for which the money was to be used was, in those cases, well ascertained.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought it was desirable that he should endeavour, as far as he could, to clear up the position in which the late Government understood that they had left that matter. For that purpose he had particulars before him; but it was not a matter of great consequence what were the particular figures. He could state, generally, what was the principle upon which they proceeded, and what they considered to be the position in which they had left the matter. In the beginning they made an offer, thinking it desirable that landowners should be encouraged to take up money for the purpose of executing works which would furnish employment in the distressed districts; but those offers had failed to produce any large number of applications. Finding that to be so, and being anxious to pursue that line of conduct—he would not argue whether rightly or wrongly, considering that that line of policy had been proceeded with—they amended their offer, and accordingly offered lower terms of interest and greater inducements to landowners to come forward and make claims, and they stated that the applications were to be received before a certain day—namely, the 29th of February—and, in that case, they would be carefully considered. Of course, those applications had to be examined into. At the same time, they stated that they had estimated what they thought likely to be demanded upon those terms. Well, certainly, they considerably under-estimated the amount. In the first instance they estimated that, probably, £250,000 would be required. Very soon, however, they found that more than that would be required, and they accordingly raised it to £500,000; but, as matters proceeded and applications came in, they found that a still larger sum would be required. When they reached the end of February, the late Government found themselves in this position. Applications had been made very much beyond the amount contemplated, even on the highest estimate, and it became necessary to consider whether they should arbitrarily put a stop to those applications, or whether they should be all considered, and then, if necessary, application should be made to Parliament for further funds. Again, they had been obliged to consider whether it would have been right to proclaim suddenly, in the state in which the country was placed, and in the uncertainty which prevailed, after announcing that applications might be sent in up to the end of February, that they had drawn a line, and that no more applications would be considered; or, again, whether in the case of an application for, say, £1,000, they should grant only a portion of it, which might have the effect of spoiling the work intended to be done. When the late Government considered these difficulties, they came to the conclusion that their proper course, having regard to the distress existing in the country, was not to stop any of the applications, but to take upon themselves to accept them for examination and to consider the propriety of afterwards asking Parliament for such money as the increased number which might be agreed to might render necessary. They knew that when the applications came in they would be very carefully sifted, and they had calculated that, perhaps, a large number of them would be rejected from their not meeting the proper conditions upon which the grants were to be made. It was not known, therefore, how much of this sum—upwards of £1,000,000—which had been asked for, would upon examination turn out to be really required. Up to the time the Return was made, no doubt, not more than £300,000 or £400,000 had been passed and authorized; but they had so far undertaken to deal with the other applications that they had rendered themselves liable, in honour and good faith, to provide means for advancing as much of the whole of the £1,200,000 applied for as might meet the conditions laid down. He presumed that the examination since made had shown, to a large extent, that the applications were sound and proper, and that it was on that ground the present Government now came forward to make this proposal. It was, of course, open to the Government to say—"We will provide the money by some other machinery;" but he considered the action taken by the late Government and approved by the late Parliament bound the present Government and Parliament, in good faith, to provide in some way or other for the amount now asked for.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, there was an obvious inconsistency in the position taken up by the late Government with reference to the Amendment. The Government had said that the distress was so intense that they found it absolutely necessary to bring in a Bill to increase the original sum obtained from Parliament by another like sum of £750,000. They went further, and, accepting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell), granted £200,000 in aid of outdoor relief; and, going farther still, they took a portion of the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), and said the distress was so intense that tenants must be protected from the consequences of the non-payment of rent which they were not able to pay. If the statement was correct, that the distress was so severe as to warrant those various measures, then he maintained that a case had been made out for aid from the Imperial Treasury. He was inclined to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) upon the ground that, if it was not accepted, the Church Commissioners might be left in an insolvent condition. He found that they had an available income of about £800,000. On the other hand, they had to pay the National Debt Commissioners £600,000 a-year capital and interest on account of the original advances for commutations. They had also had cast upon them the interest of £1,000,000 for intermediate education, of £1,300,000 for pensions of school teachers, and since that time £1,500,000 had to be borrowed on the security of their income for the relief of Irish distress. Such being the case, he wished to ask the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) what would be the exact balance, at the present moment, after providing for these demands, in the hands of the Commissioners of the Irish Church Temporalities? Could the noble Lord say that, after the provision for meeting distress in Ireland, the Commissioners had an available balance sufficient to bear the loss inflicted on them by having to meet the difference between $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent and the 1 per cent? On the ground of finance as well as of policy, he was, therefore, strongly tempted to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the question of security had received the most careful consideration of the Government in consultation with the National Debt Commissioners, who were fully satisfied that the security was sufficient. Again, with regard to the interest, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had had this question under consideration, in connection with the Savings Banks Bill, and had come to the conclusion that $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, instead of $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, would be sufficient interest for the advance, and that the security given by the Church Commissioners was substantial. With respect to the appeal to the generosity of England put forward by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), the Committee ought not to consider the question as one simply affecting Ireland, but should consider it with reference to the course adopted by that House when the Cotton Famine occurred in Lancashire. If ever there was a case of great distress in England it was that of the Cotton Famine; but still it was felt at that time that it was not wise to come upon the Imperial Exchequer, and practically interfere with the operation of the Poor Law. Once lay down the principle that, in times of distress you are to come upon the general taxpayers, and you will do far more mischief by your supposed generosity than you would do good. He wished the Committee to understand that, in rejecting the appeal for a grant from the National Exchequer, the Government were not animated by any feeling applying specially to Ireland, but were merely pursuing a policy which had been followed for the last 40 years in all cases of distress. He believed that to reverse that policy would be fatal in dealing with the distress existing in Ireland, which, after all, was not of an exceptional character, and was due simply to the fact that there had been three or four bad harvests.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he would like to explain to some English Members who might not be aware of it, the exact demand which Irish Members were making upon the Government, and upon which they would probably have to elicit the opinion of the Committee by a division. The money lent under the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Bill was provided, first, by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. And while the Church Temporalities Commissioners were authorized to lend money at 1 per cent, they had to pay 3½ per cent to the National Debt Commissioners. He called the attention of the Committee to this statement, because he had just been asked by an hon. Member in the Lobby to give him some idea of the matter under discussion. He was glad that the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had given them his support on that occasion, and he thought the arguments brought forward by him were very strong. They had heard a fair statement from the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish); but it was not a conclusive statement, although, from the stand-point of one determinedly opposed to the principles of Irish Members, it was not unfair as an argument. With reference to the Cotton Famine, that was, no doubt, a great national emergency; but it had occurred in the centre of masses of wealth acquired in the cotton industry, and if the operatives were thrown out of employment, they might fairly be left to the charge of their fellow-countrymen whose great wealth they had contributed so much to amass. He thought the Secretary to the Treasury had not conclusively shown the evil consequences which would flow from meeting a national calamity with contributions from the National Exchequer. The noble Lord had simply laid it down as an axiomatic principle; but which he (Mr. O'Connor Power), so far from regarding it as self-evident, believed to be absolutely false. He had hoped the noble Lord would be prepared to prove his theory, and show exactly how the Poor Law would be superseded. But the argument of the noble Lord was absurd, especially in the case of Ireland, where the life and death of millions was concerned. During the whole time that Ireland had had the misfortune to be governed by an alien Parliament the doctrines not only of political economy, but of constitutional liberty, had been set aside, and appeals had been afterwards made to protect life and property in Ireland by the suspension of personal rights. What greater emergency could arise than the state of national starvation which was now bringing the people of Ireland to the verge of the grave by the sure and speedy agency of famine and fever? He submitted that this was a case of great national emergency, and that the Government should accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Synan).

MR. M'LAREN said, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) meant, in other words, that the Treasury should lend money to the landlords and other parties in Ireland at the rate of 1 per cent. If the people of Ireland, through their Representatives in that House, desired to lend out their Fund at that rate of interest for 25 years, he had not a word to say against it; but he did not think that the Imperial Funds should be advanced on the same improvident footing, and he should certainly vote against any such proposal. It came to this—after paying 3½ per cent for 35 years, the landlords would practically receive a present of the principal. If the Irish people liked to squander their money in that way, let them have the responsibility of doing so; but he was dead against asking the Treasury to lend under such an improvident system.

MR. GORST said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) that the proposal of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) was extraordinary; but the question was, whether they were not extraordinary circumstances that the proposal was intended to meet? In judging of Irish affairs, he thought many hon. Members were much more inclined to judge by what the Government did than by what they said, because, as far as his experience in that House had gone, he believed Governments said almost anything; but when it came to action, and they had to put their views into force by the introduction of Bills, they were tolerably sincere. The Government had proposed extraordinary measures, which they only attempted to justify on the ground of the extraordinary character of the Irish distress. Therefore, it seemed to him that, under circumstances which the Government deemed to be extraordinary, it was not unreasonable for Members of the Committee to propose a grant out of the Treasury. It was clearly a grant in aid of Irish distress which was proposed by the Amendment, and therefore he felt inclined to support it on the ground that extraordinary circumstances must be met by extraordinary measures. He wished to say a word upon another matter that had occurred to him. Were the Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners financially capable of bearing the drain put upon them? And here he agreed with the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), who had pointed out that they were really being asked to embark in a procedure which must drain and impoverish their resources. The hon. Member had asked whether that was the way in which Irish Members wished their funds to be squandered? But it was not the Irish Members, it was the Government, who were proposing to squander those funds in that particular manner; and before they did so the Committee, in his opinion, should have before them the facts necessary to enable them to judge whether, financially, the funds at the disposal of the Commissioners of the Irish Church Temporalities could bear the strain. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) had said that the Government had satisfied themselves that the security offered by the Commissioners was sufficient. No doubt, that was so but he (Mr. Gorst) thought the Committee also would like to see that the security was satisfactory. They were not yet prepared to hand over all the finance of the country to Her Majesty's Government; and he hoped before the third reading of the Bill, before the matter was finally disposed of by the House, that some further information would be given than the extremely meagre information which the noble Lord had given in answer to his noble Friend (Lord Randolph Churchill). It was quite clear that the Fund of the Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners was nearly at an end, and if the Fund could bear the burden which the Government were now about to put upon it, it would very likely prove to be the straw that would break the camel's back; and though they were close to the very last of the Fund which Parliament had at its disposal, no facts or figures had been laid before the Committee which would enable them to judge whether they were doing right or wrong. He had already suggested that the House should be furnished with an intelligible account of the Fund of the Church Temporalities Commission, in which the assets and liabilities might be clearly shown, in order that they might be able to see whether that Fund would bear the drain that was now put upon it, and in case it would not, that they might have an opportunity of providing the requisite expenditure from other sources. He did not think that his request was an unreasonable one, and he therefore trusted that some sufficient information might be furnished.

MR. RYLANDS said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Gorst) had charged the Government with squandering the Church Fund. That responsibility, he begged to say, rested with hon. Gentlemen opposite. If the hon. and learned Member was anxious to look to some one who was responsible for that business, he should refer him to his own Leader; it was he that was responsible for a transaction which, in his (Mr. Rylands') judgment, was one of the most objectionable proceedings any Government, in his recollection, had ever done. The action of the late Government having ceased, it fell upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland

(Mr. W. E. Forster) to carry out the scheme, and that was rendered necessary on account of the official position to which he had succeeded. That right hon. Gentleman had just before pointed out very clearly that the transaction had been a bad business transaction, and that, if he had had the initiation of it, a better arrangement would have been made. What was the fact? The right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir Stafford Northcote) had told them in a few words, what they already knew, that the late Government wanted landowners in Ireland to join them in the operations for the relief of distress, and they accordingly suggested that money should be advanced to them for that purpose upon moderate terms. The landowners stood aside, they held back, because they wanted to get greater advantages, and would not apply for loans until they were offered at terms that made them almost gifts. He objected to that transaction, whether or not the Church Fund could bear it; but they were unable now to alter it. He protested, altogether, as a British taxpayer, against that boon to Irish landlords, or rather that gift, being taken out of the pockets of the English taxpayers. He trusted that the proposition then before the Committee would not be entertained for a moment, and he, for one, regretted that they had been called upon to increase the amount voted to a scheme which, in his judgment, was open to so many serious objections.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that, as an Irish Member, he could look with impartiality on the discords between English Members in regard to the gift to the Irish landlords. In their position as Irish Members, they were not responsible for that transaction, for the English Members had settled the matter between them. He accepted the proposition which had been laid down by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) and the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren); but he arrived at a different conclusion. He agreed with the remarks of the noble Lord as to the inadvisability of giving money from the National Exchequer in aid of the rates; but he would point out to the noble Lord that the question they were then discussing was not whether the money should be paid, but the particular manner in which it ought to be given. With regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) fully agreed with him, that to pay money out of the Irish Church Fund was an extravagant and ridiculous proceeding; but he must impress upon the Committee that no responsibility rested with the Irish Members in regard to that matter. That rested with the Imperial Government, whether Conservative or Liberal. The opinion of the Irish Members had been expressed over and over again, that the moneys of the Irish Church Fund ought not to be spent in bolstering up the credit of the Irish landowners. He wished to point out to the hon. Member for Edinburgh that the expenditure they were discussing was a gift of money made by the Imperial Government, in spite of the protest of Irish Members. That was why they contended that the loss of interest ought to be borne by the Imperial Exchequer.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had told them that Irish Members were not responsible for that proposal of loans to landlords. He (Lord Frederick Cavendish) must say he could not quite agree with him. He remembered what took place in that House when the proposal was made, and he believed, unless his memory deceived him, that that proposition was received and passed without a single dissentient voice. ["No, no!"] The hon. Member said, "No, no!" The reports would, no doubt, show whether he (Lord Frederick Cavendish) was right or no. But it was not merely that; but, if he was not mistaken, in the late Parliament the Leader of the Irish Home Rule Party, the hon. Member for County Cork (Mr. Shaw), in discussing the question, stated that—"The Government on the 1st of January, finding those advances under the terms of the November Circular were not taken up, issued another Circular in which more substantial advantages were offered; 1 per cent interest was then offered, and he ventured to say that if that had been done in the first instance, there would have been an amount of employment throughout Ireland almost sufficient to meet the entire case." Taking that to be the representation of the feeling of Irish Members upon that matter, he thought he might say that there was really no question in the former discussion as to whether the money should come from the Exchequer or the Irish Church Fund. He believed it had been admitted that to relieve the distress from that Fund was a good means to employ to meet the difficulty. He therefore thought that the Members of the Third Party were responsible for what was done. With regard to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), he must say he welcomed those remarks. The Treasury had been assailed from day to day, and subjected to abuse, with regard to those loans, and he was therefore glad to hear him say that they were only carrying out the engagements entered into by their Predecessors. For his own part, he did not believe that the Treasury was at fault in regard to that matter.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he was one of the Members who had taken part in the debates on that subject in the late Parliament; and he certainly must say that, in his opinion, the memory of the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) was somewhat short in regard to it. He (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) remembered many Irish Members speaking in those debates, and all of them, he believed, protested as strongly as they could against squandering away the Church Surplus Fund in grants to Irish landlords. The fact was, the Irish Members were naturally most anxious to obtain money for the relief of the growing distress, and they said that the late Government had resolved to throw the burden upon the Church Fund, and they could not take on themselves the responsibility of standing between the Government and the relief of the distress in the country. All that could be done by private charity was being done, and they knew that those funds would probably soon come to an end. The hat had been carried round, so to speak, all over the world. His hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had taken scrip and staff and gone to America, in order to raise money there for the same purpose. But all those sources must soon dry up, and they therefore came to ask for further assistance, and they were now treated to a dissertation on the rules of political economy, by which it appeared that Irish distress might properly be relieved out of any Treasury except that of England. They had obtained assistance from the Government of the Dominion of Canada and from other Governments, and they had heard no objection raised on the score of political economy; but political economy was instantly appealed to as a reason why no grant should be made out of our own Imperial Exchequer. Under the condition of things he had described the Irish Members had been driven to accept the Government proposal; but they had condemned it over and over again, and had expressed their strong conviction that the Church Surplus Fund ought not to be squandered away for such a purpose. He could not admit that a gift to Irish landlords, out of that Fund, was intended for the benefit of the Irish people. It was strictly and properly what the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had called it—a gift, because, after a certain time, both the principal and interest would be paid off in the easiest way, the landlord would have the full advantage, and the Irish people, to whom, strictly, the money belonged, would receive no permanent benefit from it whatever. Considering the extreme distress that existed—which the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury had admitted—he thought it was not a time when the rules of political economy were to be strictly adhered to. When extreme distress, national distress, was shown to exist in one part of the Empire, it was only just that the Imperial Exchequer should assist in relieving that distress.

MR. SYNAN said, he thought it was due on behalf of the Irish Members to defend them against the accusation which had been made against them with regard to the action of the late Government, in lending money to Irish landlords at the expense of the Church Surplus Fund for 1 per cent. The Irish Members had resisted that proposal on the second reading of the Bill, they had resisted it on going into Committee and divided upon it, and 40 Irish Members voted against it, the whole of the rest of the House being opposed to them. If the Government wanted to give money at 1 per cent, why should they give it at the expense of the Church Surplus Fund? Was it not the duty of the Government to tell Irish landlords that the money was to be had at 3½ per cent out of the Public Treasury? He thought it was unjust, when they had been forced and beaten down in their divisions, and when they had protested against the proposal in the Bill, to be accused of having been parties to the lending of the money out of that Fund. They never had been parties to that. He should like to refer to the real question before the Committee. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), with his usual ability when he came to figures, had exaggerated to an enormous extent when he talked of £750,000 as being asked for by his Amendment. In fact, the sum would be only about £14,000 a-year for the period during which the money was lent at 1 per cent out of the Treasury. What Irish Members wanted was that the Treasury should bear the expense of the difference between 1 and 3½ per cent, which would amount to the enormous sum of £14,000! That £750,000 was to come out of the Treasury was altogether an exaggeration; they only wanted £14,000, and he thought that was sufficiently reasonable to be accepted by the Committee.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, that the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) was right as to the amount he proposed to charge upon the National Debt Commissioners. Deducting the £200,000 referred to he had made a calculation, and the loss between 3½ and 1 per cent would amount to £13,750 a-year. He submitted to the Irish Members that that being so, the sum was a small one, and that the charge would be light, wherever it might fall. He was bound to say that he was surprised at the remarks that had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). In reality, the clause with which they were dealing was an inevitable extension of the powers of the Irish Relief Act of 1880. That Act, which was carried by the late Government, lent a sum of £750,000 to Irish landlords out of the funds of the Irish Church Commissioners. Not only was it an act of the late Government; but it had been admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer that morning, that it was a measure of the late Government, and that they were undoubtedly responsible for it in the first instance. He (Mr. Illingworth) could not see, therefore, how the present Government were in any way responsible for it. An appeal had been made on the score of generosity. His opinion was that the original grant was a great mistake, and nothing could be more unfortunate than making the Irish landlords the medium for relieving distress. If there was genuine Irish distress, the money should have been given through the Guardians, as it would be in this country. In fact, the whole affair was a huge job. He exceedingly regretted that the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) had not raised a further objection when it was proposed to double the sum to be given to the Irish landlords in order to relieve the distress. He thought it was agreed on both sides that the money granted in the first instance was not effectual for the purpose. If the scheme failed, then he, for one, should deplore ever having consented to make a loan of public money, or that such funds should have been allowed to be tampered with by Irish landlords under such conditions. If they required money, they should have gone into the market for it. But the House was in this position—they had been asked by the Government to supplement the original loan. He appealed, therefore, to Irish Members, that if they had a grievance with regard to that matter, it was scarcely worth while to detain the Committee upon the clause. If it was a question of generosity, the money ought, perhaps, to come out of the Public Funds; but, at any rate, the matter was one that ought to be treated on its own merits rather than on technical grounds. For his own part, he was not sorry that the Irish Church Surplus Fund was coming to a close, as it was, no doubt, the cause of a deal of jobbery; but, he must say, that if they in England had a corresponding fund of that character, it would be grossly unjust to come on the Irish taxpayers to relieve the English. If the English Church were disestablished and a huge fund were available for other purposes, the hon. Gentleman would be entitled to say that that fund ought to be exhausted before the English came upon the taxpayers of Ireland. He could not agree with the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) as to the willingness of the working classes to pay towards such an object as the distress, when there was a large fund already available. Besides, he thought it would hardly be fair to call upon them to do so, inasmuch as it was a well-known fact that the Imperial Funds were more largely contributed to by the humbler classes than by the owners of property. He hoped that the Committee would be allowed to proceed with the measure before it.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Illingworth), that they were not making great progress, and that the amount at stake was so small as scarcely to seem worthy of the amount of time that had been spent in discussing a question of such an amount as £15,000. He frankly admitted that there was a good deal more at stake than the question of that amount. It appeared to him that important principles were at stake; and while he did not complain of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) raising the question on the grounds he had stated, he had felt it was impossible that he could sit still and hear such statements as had been made, and such arguments as they had lately listened to, without protesting against the misrepresentations in which hon. Members had indulged as to the action of the late Government and the late Parliament in that matter, and putting on record a strong protest against the proposal now before the Committee. It seemed to him that they had been rather gratuitously going back upon the discussions which had taken place in the late Parliament, and on the principles embodied in the Act then passed. It was all the more gratuitous to do so, because, at an earlier stage of that very Bill, the same question had been raised, and remarks of the same character as those to which they had just been listening were discussed, and the House came to the conclusion that it was, at all events, desirable to proceed with the measure without renewing those attacks upon the two classes who seemed to be the favourite objects of attack—he meant the late Government and the Irish landlords. He could quite understand that it might be agreeable to certain persons to represent the matter so as to make out that those loan transactions were arranged by the late Government particularly for the benefit, not of the Irish people, but of a particular class, and that an unpopular class—namely, the Irish landlords. He did not think it necessary, then, to enter into the question as to the mode in which the Irish landlords were being treated; but he protested against the manner in which a measure of last Session was being treated, and that it was grossly unfair, and an entire misrepresentation of the facts of the case, to represent the legislation of last Session as only in favour of landlords. The facts of the case were that the distress had to be dealt with, and that that distress was undoubtedly imminent upon the people of Ireland. At the same time, it was most objectionable, as being contrary to the rules for the general administration of the Poor Law and the rules of political economy, to come forward with grants from the Public Exchequer. He did not believe it would have been possible, even at the worst period of the Irish distress, to have come forward and proposed grants in aid of the poor rates out of the Imperial Exchequer, without raising questions in other parts of the United Kingdom which it would have been seriously difficult to meet. What they found was this—that if they attempted to deal with the matter in that way they would not only be raising awkward questions, but they would also be in danger of demoralizing the people of Ireland themselves, and pauperizing them in a way that was not necessary. It had been urged by many of the best Representatives of the true interests of Ireland that they should—[Mr. BIGGAR: Hear, hear!]

—he did not refer to the hon. Member for Cavan, but to other Representatives—it had been urged that they should take such steps as would secure the people from the demoralizing effect of mere charity borrowed out of the Public Exchequer, and enable them, if possible, to earn themselves the means for subsistence. How was that to be done? They were told that it was wrong to lend money to landlords; but what was the alternative? They had offered sums to the sanitary authorities; but as to doing public works, he had more than once endeavoured to impress upon that House, by the light of the lessons they had received in the Irish Famine of 1847, that in adopting such a course there would have been great danger of doing serious evil. He was sorry to detain the Committee; but he had felt it his duty to place the matter clearly before them. It would have been a bad thing for Ireland if they had taken to the system of public works while a better system was open to them. They found the offer they first made to landlords not of the Cotton Famine; but still it was felt at that time that it was not wise to come upon the Imperial Exchequer, and practically interfere with the operation of the Poor Law. Once lay down the principle that, in times of distress you are to come upon the general taxpayers, and you will do far more mischief by your supposed generosity than you would do good. He wished the Committee to understand that, in rejecting the appeal for a grant from the National Exchequer, the Government were not animated by any feeling applying specially to Ireland, but were merely pursuing a policy which had been followed for the last 40 years in all cases of distress. He believed that to reverse that policy would be fatal in dealing with the distress existing in Ireland, which, after all, was not of an exceptional character, and was due simply to the fact that there had been three or four bad harvests.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he would like to explain to some English Members who might not be aware of it, the exact demand which Irish Members were making upon the Government, and upon which they would probably have to elicit the opinion of the Committee by a division. The money lent under the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Bill was provided, first, by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. And while the Church Temporalities Commissioners were authorized to lend money at 1 per cent, they had to pay 3½ per cent to the National Debt Commissioners. He called the attention of the Committee to this statement, because he had just been asked by an hon. Member in the Lobby to give him some idea of the matter under discussion. He was glad that the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had given them his support on that occasion, and he thought the arguments brought forward by him were very strong. They had heard a fair statement from the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish); but it was not a conclusive statement, although, from the stand-point of one determinedly opposed to the principles of Irish Members, it was not unfair as an argument. With reference to the Cotton Famine, that was, no doubt, a great national emergency; but it had occurred in the centre of masses of wealth acquired in the cotton industry, and if the operatives were thrown out of employment, they might fairly be left to the charge of their fellow-countrymen whose great wealth they had contributed so much to amass. He thought the Secretary to the Treasury had not conclusively shown the evil consequences which would flow from meeting a national calamity with contributions from the National Exchequer. The noble Lord had simply laid it down as an axiomatic principle; but which he (Mr. O'Connor Power), so far from regarding it as self-evident, believed to be absolutely false. He had hoped the noble Lord would be prepared to prove his theory, and show exactly how the Poor Law would be superseded. But the argument of the noble Lord was absurd, especially in the case of Ireland, where the life and death of millions was concerned. During the whole time that Ireland had had the misfortune to be governed by an alien Parliament the doctrines not only of political economy, but of constitutional liberty, had been set aside, and appeals had been afterwards made to protect life and property in Ireland by the suspension of personal rights. What greater emergency could arise than the state of national starvation which was now bringing the people of Ireland to the verge of the grave by the sure and speedy agency of famine and fever? He submitted that this was a case of great national emergency, and that the Government should accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Synan).

MR. M'LAREN said, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) meant, in other words, that the Treasury should lend money to the landlords and other parties in Ireland at the rate of 1 per cent. If the people of Ireland, through their Representatives in that House, desired to lend out their Fund at that rate of interest for 25 years, he had not a word to say against it; but he did not think that the Imperial Funds should be advanced on the same improvident footing, and he should certainly vote against any such proposal. It came to this—after paying 3½ per cent for 35 years, the landlords would practically receive a present of the principal. If the Irish people liked to squander their money in that way, let them have the responsibility of doing so; but he was dead against asking the Treasury to lend under such an improvident system.

could be said that such was the case, and for that reason he urged upon them to go to a division at once.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, hon. Members and right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House were in the habit of holding up their hands and appealing to Heaven whenever they heard of a proposition to vote money for Ireland out of the Imperial Exchequer. But there was a great case against the Imperial Exchequer in favour of Ireland lost sight of as it appeared to him on the present occasion. He held the opinion that the present condition of Ireland was not due so much to landlord exaction—that was to say, to landlordism in its worse phase—as it was to inordinate Imperial exactions from that country. During the last 28 years the Imperial taxes levied in Ireland had been raised from 3s. in the pound to 5s. 3d. in the pound, and that system had been, in his opinion, if not the sole, at any rate the main, cause of the impoverishment of the country. The Imperial taxation of Great Britain amounted to 2s. 6½d. in the pound on the gross income shown in the Schedules for income and property, while the taxation of Ireland upon the whole income returnable was 5s. 3d. in the pound. When Great Britain, through its Representatives, said that a special Irish Fund was to be made the subject of a particular charge arising out of an extraordinary emergency, and that Ireland had no claim whatever upon the Imperial Exchequer, the question presented itself, what were the grounds for Ireland demanding that this extraordinary charge should not come out of their own special Fund, but from the Imperial Exchequer? He said that the present condition of Ireland was an Imperial subject, and that it was mainly due to the system of extortion under which the Irish people had suffered. For those reasons, he, for one, claimed that the £15,000 should come out of the Imperial Exchequer.

MR. M'LAREN said, the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) had charged against him grossly exaggerated statements about the amount of interest; but the hon. Member must have forgotten the wording of the clause—

“And the Treasury may, if they think fit, from time to time continue their guarantee to the loan and security varied as aforesaid.”

Then came the Amendment of the hon. Member, providing—

He did not refer to the annual total amount of interest at all. There was not one word about paying the principal in either of these clauses. The fact was, as he had stated, that landowners obtained loans on condition that they should pay 3½ per cent for 35 years, and then be discharged of all liability for the principal sum.

MR. DALY said, the distress in Ireland was national in its character and ought to be treated nationally. When he remembered that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, coincidently with removing a tax under which the people of England had groaned for years, had imposed upon his countrymen an additional Income Tax of 1d. in the pound, at a time when they were steeped in poverty, he could not but feel that every Irishman, whether Conservative or Liberal, ought to be a Home Ruler. It was most unfair that the people of Ireland were to have no claim upon the Imperial Exchequer in times of national distress after all the demands made upon them by way of taxation and otherwise.

MR. BYRNE said, he had much pleasure in supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan). If the Chief Secretary for Ireland wished to save time, he would do well to give way in this small matter in favour of a starving and suffering people. The resistance offered to the Amendment savoured more of the character of a pettifogging lawyer than it did of a Minister of this great country, with so large a majority behind him, and representing an Empire whose ships sailed on every sea and upon whose territory the sun never set. It was unworthy of the Committee to resist so long such a small concession to the just claim of Irish Members with reference to the source from which the fund was to come. He wished to say that there was no Irish Member who had approved of its coming out of the Irish Church Fund. It was “Hobson's choice” with them; they must have it from some source, or the people would starve. The Government appeared to him to look upon Irish questions as if Ireland were not a part of the Empire; but they ought to regard those

(Mr. W. E. Forster) to carry out the scheme, and that was rendered necessary on account of the official position to which he had succeeded. That right hon. Gentleman had just before pointed out very clearly that the transaction had been a bad business transaction, and that, if he had had the initiation of it, a better arrangement would have been made. What was the fact? The right hon. He trusted that the proposition then before the Committee would not be entertained for a moment, and he, for one, regretted that they had been called upon to increase the amount voted to a scheme which, in his judgment, was open to so many serious objections.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that, as an Irish Member, he could look with impartiality on the discords between English Members in regard to the gift to the Irish landlords. In their position as Irish Members, they were not responsible for that transaction, for the English Members had settled the matter between them. He accepted the proposition which had been laid down by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) and the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren); but he arrived at a different conclusion. He agreed with the remarks of the noble Lord as to the inadvisability of giving money from the National Exchequer in aid of the rates; but he would point out to the noble Lord that the question they were then discussing was not whether the money should be paid, but the particular manner in which it ought to be

He wished to point out to the hon. Member for Edinburgh that the expenditure they were discussing was a gift of money made by the Imperial Government, in spite of the protest of Irish Members. That was why they contended that the loss of interest ought to be borne by the Imperial Exchequer.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had told them that Irish Members were not responsible for that proposal of loans to landlords. He (Lord Frederick Cavendish) must say he could not quite agree with him. He remembered what took place in that House when the proposal was made, and he believed, unless his memory deceived him, that that proposition was received and passed without a single dissentient voice. ["No, no!"] The hon. Member said, "No, no!" The reports would, no doubt, show whether he (Lord Frederick Cavendish) was right or no. But it was not merely that; but, if he was not mistaken, in the late Parliament the Leader of the Irish Home Rule Party, the hon. Member for County Cork (Mr. Shaw), in discussing the question, stated that—"The Government on the 1st of January, finding those advances under the terms of the November Circular were not taken up, issued another Circular in which more substantial advantages were offered; 1 per cent interest was then offered, and he ventured to say that if that had been done in the first instance, there would have been an amount of employment throughout Ireland almost sufficient to meet the entire case." Taking that to be the representation of the feeling of Irish Members upon that matter, he thought he might say that there was really no question in the lords for the purpose of supporting them against the interests of the tenants. He had been very much struck with one of the arguments of the noble Lord, in which he said that he considered it a very strong reason for opposing the Amendment that the late Government had accepted the contrary principle. The noble Lord and those who acted with him were not in the habit of expressing outside the House any approval of the principles of the late Government; but he found, when it suited the purpose of their Party, they were willing inside the House to swallow what they refused to digest outside its walls. The action of the Liberal Government, in dealing with that matter, was unworthy of any Government claiming the name of "Liberal." Liberality ought to be tempered with justice and generosity. They had a right to ask that, so far as was consistent with principle, the views of Irish Members upon Irish questions should be taken in preference to the views of Irish officials. He was much struck by one of the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir Stafford Northcote). He said that the late Government had the lending of money to landlords pressed upon them; but he did not tell them by whom they were pressed, nor why it was that that Government were chiefly interested in gaining loans for the landlords. Certainly, he had not heard from any one Member of the Irish Party any arguments adduced in favour of lending money to landlords; because it was the policy of the Irish nation, and the policy of the Representatives of that nation, to get rid of those landlords by fair and equitable means, and there was no desire that they should be foisted upon the Irish people. But the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer also told them that, so far as the principle was concerned, he was opposed to going out of the ordinary procedure of Parliament to charge the money in the manner proposed in the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan). He (Mr. Finigan) had always found that when Irish Members asked for anything, from an Irish point of view, they were referred to the procedure of previous Parliaments; but he thought it was quite time that they ceased to hear of the procedure of previous Parliaments.

Mr. Finigan

So far as Ireland was concerned, they had been too often ruled by the system of the precedents in that House—as, for instance, in the case of the precedent of the Act of Union. He felt it his duty to support in the Division Lobby the Amendment of his hon. Friend; and he trusted that many Liberals, who claimed to be really so, would go with him, and also that many Tories, acting on principle—for they could act on principle quite as well as Liberals—would give their support to the demand of the Irish Members. He could not sit down without alluding to the generous speech of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh). He had heard many things against the hon. Member's character, but he thought he had shown on that occasion a spirit which self-styled Christians would do well to follow; and he trusted that they would vote in accordance with the principles of justice, and not according to the precedents of misrule.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he did not wish to prolong the debate; but he wished to state why he should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan). He did not think it advisable that the debate should be prolonged, inasmuch as the case on the part of the Irish Members had been fully and completely put before the Committee, and he was anxious that the Bill should be proceeded with. He hoped, therefore, that the discussion would be soon brought to a close, and that a division would be taken. He thought that, in discussing this matter, there was no necessity for going into the policy of the late Government with regard to the loans they had made. He was most ready to accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir Stafford Northcote), giving full credit for the best motives in what they had done. With regard to the question whether or no the loans should be made from the Exchequer, they had heard reasons from the Front Benches why loans of public money should not be made at that rate of interest. He himself was not sufficiently conversant with the question to understand whether those reasons were forcible or satisfactory or not; but he would remind the Committee that that was only a technical question. The real question before the Committee was—

was the distress, was the famine in Ireland to be treated or not as a matter of merely Irish concern or of national concern? Was it, or not, a case in which the people of this country, to which that country was united, should help by taking money out of the purse to which they—the Irish—had also contributed, in order to relieve the distress which was and ought to be regarded as of national concern? He could not but think that it was a matter in which the Government might easily make a concession; for he could see no reason why an Amendment should not be adopted by which the Consolidated Fund would indemnify that of the Church Surplus for the loss it must otherwise sustain.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he wished to say a few words; but he did not wish to prolong the discussion unnecessarily. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members who expressed their hilarity, should recollect that he had not yet spoken in that debate. There was no point that had arisen in the discussion which had not already been ably advocated by his Colleagues; but he felt it incumbent upon him to protest against the attempt of the present Administration to throw responsibility upon the Irish Members with regard to the original acceptance of the principle of giving loans to landlords as a means of relieving the distress. They had protested, all of them, against the adoption of that principle, when the Bill was first brought in. He, himself, when the second reading came on, put on the Notice Paper a separate Amendment, for the purpose of tying up, as far as possible, the hands of the landlords so that they might not be able to misuse those loans. They were against giving them loans in the first place, and when obliged to yield to the formidable majority that the late Government possessed, they did their utmost in Committee to minimize the evils contained in the proposal. His Amendment was that no portion of any loan should be expended in connection with consolidation exceeding the value of the holding of the land, and it also sought to provide that no landlords effecting other loans by means of those loans should be allowed to charge a higher rate than that contained in the Government proposal. They had, in fact, first objected to the proposal altogether, and then sought to restrict, as far as possible, the capacity for misusing it. He could not but think that it was singularly inconsistent on the part of the present Government to renew that principle of giving loans to landlords, because he would venture to point out that, in fact, while the Government was thus proposing to offer landlords an opportunity of incurring liabilities, they were obliged at the same time to bring in what he would call a Crisis Bill—the Compensation Bill—in order to diminish the capacity of landlords to meet their liabilities. Of course, hon. Members need not vote for that Bill; he only referred to it in order to show the singular inconsistency of the Government, when, with one hand they were asking landlords to take loans, and with the other hand obliged, in consequence, as a set-off, to restrict the power of the landlords from calling in such loans as they themselves had made. He was unable to congratulate the Liberal Administration on grafting Conservative measures upon a Liberal policy; but he wished to join his voice in protesting against this matter being treated in the way it was, instead of being made a question of Imperial necessity, and against the whole loss being made to fall upon overburdened, despised, and impoverished Ireland. He certainly sympathized with the position of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) who had just addressed the Committee. He had expressed his surprise at the line the Liberal Government were pursuing. The Government, it appeared to him, (Mr. O'Donnell) spoke of them as a united people, when any measure for assisting to carry burdens was before the House; but they were treated in a very different way and altogether separately, when it was found that there was a question before the House by which they could be deprived of the advantages to which they would otherwise be entitled.

Question put.

MR. DALY said, he begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name. In page 1, line 26, at end, he proposed to add—

"Provided always, That in view of the want of employment of the labouring classes, and the consequent distress in certain districts in Ireland, the time for completion of works by owners of land already sanctioned, or of such other works as may hereafter be sanctioned, be limited to the thirty-first day of May one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one."

He thought it would be the means of making the landowners feel that that House was strongly of opinion that many of the labouring classes should be provided with immediate employment. There was, at present, no recognition of the fact that immediate employment should be given, and the only practical way was, he thought, to annex a term in which the contract must be completed. There could, he thought, be no hardship in compelling the landlords to complete the work by a given time. They were not to be charged any interest for two years, so that, in point of fact, they got the money for nothing, subject only to a future charge for interest. Therefore, the intentions of the Legislature would be best fulfilled by compelling the landlords to execute such works as had been sanctioned within a given time. They ought not to lose sight of the fact that, in case of a bad harvest, a large number of persons would be anxious to work in the autumn. The present condition of affairs was most peculiar; there was no ready money going, nor any credit obtainable by small farmers or labourers. The condition of things was similar in all the distressed districts; men who used to be able to get credit for £2, £3, £5 or £6, could get none at all now. He was not one of those who thought that the wants of the people would be best met by giving them eleemosynary relief. There could be no more direct way of assisting the labouring man than by giving him employment. The Government, in accordance with its benevolent intentions, had placed large sums of money in the hands of landlords on very easy terms. He wished to remind them that not a sixpence would be added to the charges upon those loans by stating to the landlords that they had received money for which they would be charged nothing for two years, and that all the Government asked in return was that they should give immediate employment, inasmuch as that was the purpose for which the money had been granted. He was anxious for the Bill to become law, and he recognized the motives of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland in pushing on with it. He would not delay the Committee any longer, but move the insertion of his Amendment in the clause.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 26, at end, to add, "Provided always, That in view of the want of employment of the labouring classes, and the consequent distress in certain districts in Ireland, the time for completion of works by owners of land already sanctioned, or of such other works as may hereafter be sanctioned, be limited to the thirty-first day of May one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one."—(Mr. Daly.)

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, that, in the case of the first grant of money, no limit had been placed as to the time during which it was to be spent. This Amendment placed a limit at the 31st May, 1881. He had always thought that some such limit should be inserted in the Bill, and he therefore hoped that the Amendment would be accepted.

MR. VILLIERS STUART said, he begged to state that, as an Irish landlord who had himself taken out a considerable loan, he fully approved of the principles of the Amendment. He thought it was only fair that a limit should be fixed, in order to secure the money being used for giving employment within the period that it was needed, and thus relieving distress. For his own part, the only alteration he would suggest was that that limit should be fixed at next year's harvest, instead of May, 1881.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he agreed with the principle that the money should be spent as soon as possible for the purpose of affording immediate employment; but there was a kind of works upon which it was impossible to place more than a certain number of men. Tunnels and drainage works were instances of the kind, and to limit their completion to a certain date would practically put a stop to them altogether. For that reason, it was desirable to add some words to the Amendment which, if it was carried in its present form, would have the effect of putting a stop to useful works and throwing away the money advanced.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the powers sought to be enforced by the Amendment were already given by the Act of 1862. The limit when small works were undertaken was one year, while for larger works two and three years were allowed. The time necessary for completion, of course, depended on the nature of the operations, and it would be seen to be quite impossible that a number of large works could be finished within the time suggested by the hon. Member (Mr. Daly). Again, with respect to the greater number of the works, the time allowed for their completion had been provided for in the bonds executed by the parties to whom the loans had been made.

MR. DALY said, he considered that a grave omission had been made in the Bill, in not appointing an early day for the completion of works on which money was advanced. In the face of the motive for early completion, it was, in his opinion, the imperative duty of the Government to compel the money borrowed to be laid out within a period which would bring food and wages to the working classes.

SIR H. HERVEY BRUCE said, he thought, if the Amendment were carried, it would remove some of the objections which had been made both to this Bill and that of the late Government, on the ground that the money was being advanced simply for the benefit of the landlords in Ireland. The money was intended to be spent during the distress. It might be complained that there had been some slight breach of agreement, if the Amendment were adopted; but he did not expect there would be, and if that should happen it could, no doubt, be very easily got over. As the money was advanced under special circumstances, and at an exceptional time to the landlords, he thought that, perhaps, the matter might be rectified by the money being advanced at the rate originally intended, if the works were not completed within the time mentioned in the Amendment of the hon. Member (Mr. Daly). He should vote for the Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished there had been some period fixed in the original Bill; but it was the duty of the Government to keep faith with those who had applied for loans. He would like to hear the interpretation of those who made the bargain with reference to this point.

MR. GIBSON said, he thought the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Daly) had spoken with sufficient clearness on the subject. He thought the reasonable course was to leave the matter over for Report, and, in the meantime, the Government could consider how far the contracts had been entered into. That proposition would not injure any interest. There could, however, be no doubt that adding terms to a contract already entered into might be a breach of faith. Having regard to the character of the works, he thought it might be assumed that they could be speedily executed, and if the matter were allowed to stand over for Report, it would give the Member for Cork and the Government time to look further into the subject. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) had referred to one of the numerous statements that regulated and controlled the management and spending of these grants, which was a strong reason for postponement, in order to allow the hon. Member for Cork to look into the Act in question. In the meantime, it might be considered by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland how far contracts had been entered into by those who had borrowed money for the completion of alterations. It would be unfair that the borrowers should take up money at a certain date, and then that an Act of Parliament should be passed, saying in effect, notwithstanding the arrangement entered into at the time the money was advanced we will make a new one. It was usual for loans made by the Board of Works to be spread over five instalments, and it was, he believed, provided that the first should be advanced on the 31st July.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, there could be no more important Amendment than that before the Committee, so far as the present Bill was concerned, because the whole of Ireland was studded with incomplete works under the charge of the Board of Works. He, himself, knew of many cases in which loans had been advanced, while the works intended to be executed had remained unfinished for years. The Committee would do well not to be misled by some of the arguments which had been advanced upon the subject. The Act of 1862 did not apply to these loans in the sense in which it had been applied by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law). That Act enabled the Board of Works to make advances, and fixed times for the completion of the works contemplated. But those periods had not been adhered to. That had been found out by the Committee, on which he sat, to inquire into the operations of the Board of Works. But there was, moreover, this extraordinary anomaly in the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. It appeared that the reason why this enormous sum of £1,500,000 was called for to be advanced was that contracts had already been entered into. But, if that were so, how could anybody argue that the Act of 1862 was to regulate the completion of these works? He had never believed that the present Government were under any obligation whatever to carry out the quasi-promises of the late Government. He had already stated that he considered the thing to be wrong, and had since met with nothing which had caused him to alter his opinion. But, having done the act, they ought to be careful that the works should not be left in an unfinished condition. He was not at all willing that the subject of the Amendment should be postponed; hon. Members knew well what that meant. He was not particularly anxious that the date of limitation should be the 31st May; indeed, he thought it would be better to give a longer period, and suggested that the end of October should be the time fixed. His hon. Friend would probably not object to the extension of the period named in his Amendment; at the same time, some period should be fixed for the completion of the works. But he wanted to know in what way borrowers were to be compelled to complete their works? The Government could be compelled to advance the money to the landlords; they advanced it in instalments, and took precautions that a portion of the works should be completed by the 31st July, before the borrower could get the second instalment. And there was also the provision, in the former Act, that the third instalment would not be advanced unless the second had been used when that became payable. But there was no power beyond that. What he asked was to prevent a landlord obtaining three instalments, and never applying for the fourth at all. Enormous sums of money had been spent in that way under the Board of Works in Ireland that were absolutely useless because they had not been completed. Again, the Government had given no strength to the Board of Works, but had put upon that overcharged Department the superintendence of the expenditure of £1,500,000 before they had even given them the means of overtaking their ordinary work, and, at the same time, they asked the Irish Members, the trustees of a Fund for the use of the Irish nation, to sanction the action of the Board. He hoped his hon. Friend would press his Amendment, and not wait for the Report.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) was rather confusing the landlord loans with the presentments of the baronial sessions. The late Government had thought they would get rid of some of the danger of useless works by putting it on the landlord to borrow money for works useful to his own interest, and, accordingly, they laid down the condition that the first instalment must be spent before the second instalment could be obtained. Whether his hon. Friend the Member for Galway was right in his estimate of the Board of Works or not really did not affect the matter in hand. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) quite understood the feeling of the hon. Member that it was a bad thing to encumber Ireland with unfinished public works. But the works referred to were not of a public character. They were private works. And the object of the late Government was to get landlords to undertake private works in order to give employment. He believed this was the whole meaning of the loans to landlords. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) had referred to the Land Improvement Act of 1862. Now, the conditions on which these loans were made to the landlords included a lower rate of interest; but otherwise they were on the same conditions. Therefore, the clause of that Act relating to the period of time for completion of works did apply to the present loans. He entirely and absolutely agreed with the object of the Amendment; but he felt it would not be right to assent to the alterations proposed until he had an opportunity of ascertaining the opinion both of the late and present Attorneys General as to how far the Government could insist upon the execution of the works within the appointed time. He thought the point might be fairly left over for consideration until the Report.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that, perhaps, under ordinary circumstances, they might best meet the convenience of the Government and of Irish Members who desired an important matter to be settled in Committee by postponing the consideration of the clause, because it was quite clear that if it got out of Committee the Irish Members would lose a great deal of their power over it. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had expressed his hearty concurrence with the object of this Amendment, and the postponement of the clause would give him full time for further consideration as well as keep the clause still under the control of the Irish Members. He therefore suggested that the clause should be postponed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was not possible to frame the clause that day. He appealed to hon. Members to remember that the Committee had been occupied for six hours, and now it was proposed to postpone the clause. That proposal meant really that they were to make no progress at all. It meant, further, that they would be obliged to put off the expenditure of the £45,000 until late in the year. He had not the slightest desire to stop the expression of opinion upon the subject of the Amendment; but it was rather too bad to ask for the postponement of the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), that the clause having been amended could not be postponed.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had not moved, but merely suggested, the postponement of the clause. For his own part, he was quite satisfied with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. PARNELL said, he could not entirely agree with the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the Committee should hurry through his Bill for the reasons stated by him. They had seen how much mischief had been done in the last Parliament by the hurried legislation which had taken place with reference to the relief of Irish distress. The various points now raised had been dictated by the experience gained since that time. It was rather unsatisfactory to be told by the Chief Secretary for Ireland that unless the Bill were passed through Committee that evening he did not know when he could again bring it forward, and that, in consequence, a number of benefits would be lost to Ireland. But there was nothing to prevent the right hon. Gentleman agreeing to the loans to Boards of Guardians; and so far as the Fishery Piers and Harbours were concerned the amount of £45,000 was a very insignificant sum, and one which ought to have been considered outside this Bill. He had himself urged upon the Chief Secretary for Ireland the desirability of such non-contentious matters being dealt with in a separate measure. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had not thought proper to agree to that suggestion. For his own part, he was unwilling to surrender his right of discussion for the purpose of getting the £45,000. He would further point out that the Amendment had been down on the Paper for a fortnight; and it was somewhat unsatisfactory that one of the Law Officers of the Crown, the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, who, he (Mr. Parnell) thought was not over-burdened with work, had not considered it and given the Committee the result of his consideration. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had told the Committee of the Act of 1862, and that under it bonds had been entered into. But did he know to what extent the £1,500,000 proposed to be lent by this Bill had been dealt with in those bonds? Again, did he know the terms adopted by the Board of Works under the powers of the Act of 1862, if they limited the works to one, two, or three years? Of course, information upon these subjects was exceedingly valuable, and was very much desired by the Committee for their guidance. Seeing that the Amendment had been on the Paper for a fortnight, it must have been evident to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that a discussion would be raised as to the terms of the bonds which had been entered into. He could not help thinking that the right hon. and learned Gentleman ought to know what terms had been agreed upon. If the Committee were supplied with that information, he could not see why they should not proceed to deal with the subject at once. However, in the absence of that information, he did not think it desirable to postpone the question until Report; because, as it was difficult to obtain from Government reasons why they were honourably bound with reference to this sum of £750,000, they might on Report be unable to furnish reasons why they were honourably bound not to accept the terms of the Amendment. He thought the Committee was entitled to some further information, and would suggest either that the Amendment should be accepted at once, power of alteration being reserved to the Government, or that the clause should be withdrawn; and as it was obvious that the stage of the new clause could not be reached that night, it might be brought in as a new clause a few days later, or whenever the Government wished to take the Bill again in Committee. He preferred that course to postponement until Report, which simply meant a foregone conclusion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the Bill would be allowed to pass through Committee that day. He did not think it was necessary to postpone the consideration of the clause because the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Daly) was not at once accepted. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) was most anxious that there should be a limitation of time, if it could be fairly come to; any man in his position would, of course, desire it, so that the loans might be as useful as possible. He could assure the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) that the fullest opportunity would be given on Report for discussing the matter, and he hoped they might then get on through the Committee stage. The hon. Member must for the present put aside the question of the Fishery Piers, though, certainly, an immense amount of representation had been made about them, and there was, no doubt, much greater interest taken in the matter than hon. Members were aware of. When the hon. Member talked of terms with Boards of Guardians being made, he must be aware that it was impossible that they could delay administering the law, according to the terms of the recent Bill, by making the clauses now proposed retrospective. He was much obliged to the Committee, who, it seemed to him, were willing to proceed with the Bill, and he did not think he was asking much in saying that that matter should be allowed to stand over for Report. He would go further, and say that any appeal made by any hon. Member coming from any part of the Kingdom, with regard to that matter, should be fairly considered.

MR. DALY said, he fully recognized the value of what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) had said, and he was deeply impressed with his anxiety to do good. He would only say that he would put himself in his hands; he had no wish to oppose, but, on the contrary, a great desire that the Bill should become law. But he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman with regard to one point. A large portion of the works the right hon. Gentleman's Government had received as a kind of legacy, and, of course, in good faith, ought to be attended to. Those works had been assisted by loans to which no limitation of time was annexed, and they now sought to bring about some limitation. Would the right hon. Gentleman take the matter into his consideration?

THE CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Daly) wishes to withdraw his Amendment?

MR. DALY said, he was anxious to take any course that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland thought best. Perhaps, on Report, when he brought up his Amendment, he should amend it by leaving out the words "already sanctioned."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not wish that there should be any misapprehension. He did not think that the words had much to do with it. They considered that, as Notices had been sent out on the 1st of November and 12th of January, they might rely on the loans being employed in accordance with the terms of those Notices. He had already stated that he thought the term "sanction" had a different meaning with regard to the landlords as compared with the baronial presentments and sanitary works. In those cases, the sanction lay in the fulfilment of the conditions. He could honestly say that, with regard to the inconvenience they had been put to in keeping faith and making conditions as to time, he was very much strengthened in his opinion by the remarks which had fallen from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson).

Mr. Parnell

THE CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Daly) wishes to withdraw his Amendment, and bring it forward hereafter as a new clause?

MR. DALY: Yes.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your pleasure the Amendment be withdrawn?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he should like to say a few words before the Amendment was withdrawn. He was willing that it should be postponed; but the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster), in his recent remarks, had referred to those of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson). He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman refused to take the responsibility, as he understood him to say that they would accept the Amendment provided that the Law Officer of the late Administration agreed with them that they could do it in good faith? He should like to know what were those arrangements, that they so perpetually heard of, as having been made with the landlords, arrangements which did not seem to be contained in any public documents, or, at any rate, in those sanctioned by the late Act? The Circulars of November and January sanctioned certain uses of public property; and now they were told that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster) could not act for himself, but that he must appeal to the late Attorney General for Ireland as to certain arrangements which had been made with landlords which could not be broken. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) knew how it would be; he dare say that hon. Gentleman would be impatient in discussing that matter, because it was not their money that was to be expended—it was the money of the Irish, and not that of the Imperial Exchequer. He knew perfectly well what would happen—half of those works, and more than half, would never be completed at all, so that that expenditure would be rendered almost worse than useless. He was well acquainted with the way in which things went in Ireland, and he knew that that would be so. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland himself stated that he thought the Board of Works had no right to make conditions with landlords, but only with the sanitary authorities. No doubt, the sanitary work would be completed under the superintendence of the Local Government Board; but it appeared that the landlords would be able to do what they liked with their advances. He thought, unless they had some further assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that some means or other would positively be adopted to insure the completion of works of that kind, it would be the duty of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Daly) to press his Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he should be happy to give the assurance called for if he were able to do so. It was not the business of the Government to insure that those landlords who had borrowed money should complete the works. What they obtained from the landlords was the employment of the people, and he was not aware that Irish landlords were the only class in whom not the slightest degree of trust could be placed to look after their own interests. After having borrowed the money in order to make works, it would be to their interest to finish those works. The money paid to them, and the low rate of interest, would be by no means useless. He thought it was a most dangerous principle to lay down that, having lent that money to private persons that they might employ people for the public good, they should be called upon, and the responsibility should be thrown on them, of seeing that the works were finished. With regard to what his hon. Friend (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had stated about avoiding responsibility, he could assure him that it was not their intention in the slightest degree to do so. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson) had made a bargain, and they should, no doubt, adhere to the terms of it as strictly as they could. His hon. Friend had, two or three times, referred to public documents. Those public documents, or rather the terms of them, were contained in the 9th section of the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act. The documents themselves were the Circulars issued to the Commissioners of Public Works in November and January, by which they were authorized to make loans to landlords. They considered them fully binding, and they were unable to depart from their terms. If it had not been for that, the present Bill would probably not have been laid before the Committee.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he rose because he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was, quite unintentionally, a little unfair in regard to this matter. [Cries of "Agreed!"] Hon. Members might be agreed; but they were not all agreed. He objected, as an Irish Member, to being interrupted by hon. Gentlemen who were responsible, only technically, by that unfortunate Act of Union. The hon. Members on his side of the Irish Party fully recognized the spirit of kindness with which the right hon. Gentleman approached the subject. What was quite patent was the great lack of information possessed by hon. Gentlemen on the Government Benches in regard to this matter. If the right hon. Gentleman himself gave them a certain amount of guarantee then, they knew that when the subject was brought forward on Report the information with which he would be furnished would be little more than the opinion of a number of Irish officials. If there was a statement which, by consent of all Parties, was regarded as unfavourable and unreliable, it was that of the Irish officials. Under all the circumstances, all they pleaded for was more information, and they should like to have the opportunity of pointing out to the right hon. Gentleman what, in their opinion, was reliable information. He certainly thought that it would be a good thing if the information of Irish officials could be corroborated or supported by independent Irish Representatives.

MR. CALLAN said, that, according to those who had been criticizing the working of the Act in Ireland, it seemed to be in a sad plight. He thought that the word "bargain" was an unfortunate one to introduce. He did not recollect whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had used that word, or another hon. Gentleman. If the Board of Works were lavish in giving money to landlords, they should bear in mind that by the Act that money was only to be advanced in instalments, and the second instalment was not forthcoming until a certificate had been produced that the money of the first had been expended. That was a sufficient guarantee. He thought, with regard to the period that remained, the limitation might be inserted as regarded the time during which the money was to be expended; but he thought the landlords and tenants might be trusted to receive the money even without those terms. He believed that the hon. Member for County Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) sat on a Departmental Commission of the Board of Works, and he ought to be aware that these were public documents and not "bargains." He (Mr. Callan) apprehended that there was no such thing as private bargains of that nature, and that there was no arrangement between the landlords and the Board of Works which was not public. Of course, on the other hand, such documents need not be open to everyone.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he would venture to express his opinion that there was a substantial agreement as to the mode of procedure with reference to that Bill, and that hon. Gentlemen should not get up and delay the Business by the introduction of irrelevant matter. If, on every opportunity that presented itself, they were going to discuss the general principles of the Bill, he saw clearly that no substantial progress would be made. He had reason to complain, for there was a difficulty in following the question. He should like to know whether the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Daly), who had moved the Amendment, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster), agreed upon any point before the Committee? Was there an arrangement between them? His impression was, and, in fact, he had understood, that the right hon. Gentleman had made an offer which his hon. Friend had accepted. How was it that they had not advanced a single inch since? He appealed to the Chairman to exercise his undoubted authority not to allow them to sit on until the Sabbath morning listening to such irrelevant remarks as had just fallen from the hon. Member for the County Louth (Mr. Callan).

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question is, is it your pleasure the Amendment be withdrawn?

MR. PARNELL said, he should like to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) whether he could then give them the information for which he asked a short time since? First, as to the number of bonds entered into between the landlords and the Board of Works under the previous Act of 1862. Secondly, the amount of money covered by those bonds. Thirdly, the term of years covered by each class of bonds—for he had understood that there were different terms for the different classes of bonds. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman could give him an answer at the next Sitting it would do quite as well.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he could not now enter into the details of the matter; but, at the same time, he had no wish to withhold any information. As he had already mentioned, the Commissioners were empowered to limit the time of the execution of the works for which the loans were granted; and, accordingly, the bonds given by the landowners as security for the advances provided for the execution of the works in a given time. In reply to the questions of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork, he begged to say that it appeared that the number of landowners to whom loans were granted was 1,590, and the amount of capital represented by those loans was upwards of £1,000,000. He assumed that the regulations of the Board of Works were sufficiently stringent, and that they had taken care, before the issue of the first instalment, to take bonds for double the amount of the entire loan. Assuming this to be so, the 1,590 gentlemen who had thus borrowed money had entered into bonds by which they bound themselves, not only to repay the advances, but also to execute the works within limited periods. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster) had told them that a very large number had borrowed small sums; and in all such cases the completion of the works was, no doubt, required to be within one year.

MR. BIGGAR said, he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster) if he was aware, with reference to the late Act, that these Notices were based upon the Notices in The Dublin Gazette of November and January? He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would be able, on the next occasion that they discussed that clause, to tell them the terms with regard to the payments of the instalments, and whether it was true that the second instalment, for instance, could not be given until the first was certified as having been expended in the manner intended? He believed that hon. Members were very much in the dark with regard to these loans to landlords.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he would answer the question of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar). The Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland were authorized to pay the landowners their advances by instalments, subject to certain conditions. The interest, after two years, was at the rate of 1 per cent, and the borrowers were required to give security, by bonds, in double the amount of the entire loan. If they failed in any one particular of the contract, no further sum would be advanced to them on the present favourable terms.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BIGGAR, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 26, at end, to add the words—

“Provided, That no further loan be granted to owners of land after the passing of this Act except in cases where the Commissioners of Public Works had sanctioned such loan previously to the seventh day of May, one thousand eight hundred and eighty,” said, in November last the late Government made an offer of loans at cost price to landowners. Again, in January, they offered them loans to the extent of £450,000, specifying that sum in the Notice. However, it seemed that the response to that offer was the application for a large number of loans. Then, in February last, the late Government introduced a Bill that proposed to lend a sum not exceeding £500,000. They then proposed to amend the Bill, and make the amount to be lent £750,000. The Committee had been told that day that the clause containing this provision had been passed without controversy or opposition. He wished to state that it was not passed without controversy, although it was ultimately passed without a division, after a number of Amendments had been put forward. One of the provisions of the clause was that a sum not exceeding £750,000 should be lent to the landlords. Irish Members had objected to the giving away of so large a sum of money; but they could not help themselves, and the result was the Bill passed into law. A new Government had since come into power, and many new Members had taken their seats. That new Government said—"We think the late Government made a most absurd arrangement, and having, first of all, by Act of Parliament, obtained authority to lend a certain sum of money in a very objectionable way, they have, in addition to that, contracted to lend a very much larger sum, and wish now for an indemnity." But the present Government were now not only indemnifying the late Government for what they did illegally, and beyond the statutory powers conferred by Act of Parliament, but seemed also disposed to go on lending money in the same way. Of course, if they did not intend to do so, he should not press his Amendment. He had heard that only a small proportion of this money went in relief of the distress in Ireland, and that the landlords got the money. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) had stated that during the early stages of this plan for lending money to landlords he obtained the best information on the subject. But Members of the present Government should bear in mind that the best authorities they could get were the public statements of hon. Members from Ireland made in that House, which were the expression of the opinions of their constituents, and, consequently, of great value. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 26, at end, to add the words, "Provided, That no further loan be granted to owners of land after the passing of this Act, except in cases where the Commissioners of Public Works had sanctioned such loan previously to the seventh day of May, one thousand eight hundred and eighty."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Government had taken no responsibility whatever beyond that which awaited them on taking Office, when they found applications for loans made up to the 27th February, which they thought ought to be complied with upon certain conditions laid down by the Act of last Session. He could not agree to the Amendment.

Mr. Biggar

MR. BIGGAR said, the Act of February last had been passed through the House under great pressure, with the representation that it was very desirable, in order to meet the urgent distress in Ireland. If those persons who made applications for loans in February last were not able or willing to fulfil the conditions imposed by the authorities up to May last, they had, in his opinion, forfeited all claim to the consideration of the Government. It was unreasonable to ask the Committee to agree to a one-sided transaction. He should certainly not withdraw his Amendment. Up to the early part of May something under £1,000,000 of this money had been really arranged for—that was to say, the landlords had fulfilled the conditions imposed by the Government; and he held that any landlord who had not, up to the present, fulfilled those conditions, was not entitled to relief under this Bill.

MR. PARNELL said, there was a Return published under date the 18th March, in which it was stated that the amount sanctioned up to the 19th April was £354,520. That was just before the present Government came into Office, and he did not see why the Government should have gone on sanctioning fresh loans, believing, as they did, that this application of money was not all that it might have been. Now, it appeared to him that the Act of last Session distinctly referred to the Notice of the 12th January, issued by the Commissioners of Public Works, the obvious inference from which was that the Government were not bound to sanction loans to a greater extent than £250,000 until the Act of last Session was passed. It was admitted that the previous Government had not sanctioned loans to a greater extent than £400,000 or £500,000. What the present Government wanted was a sanction for their conduct with reference to this matter in continuing to sanction expenditure. They said they were morally bound to expend this sum of £1,500,000. It seemed that there was no control whatever over the proceedings of the Irish Government, and that when anything was done, all that was necessary was for the Chief Secretary for Ireland to say that he felt himself bound in some way or other; and that was all the satisfaction that could be had with reference to the applications for this money. If his hon. Friend (Mr.

Biggar) went to a division, he should vote for his Amendment. It was a monstrous thing to place a charge upon the Irish Church Fund which was not applied to the relief of distress in Ireland.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, when the Government came into Office he felt it would be a breach of faith not to complete the loans in question. He could only state that the honour of the Government was involved in this matter, and they must adhere to the arrangement entered into with those landlords who had fulfilled the conditions required by the Notice and Act of Parliament.

MR. GIBSON said, it was but right to say he entirely concurred with what had fallen from the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish). The landlords were told that if they complied with certain conditions, the Government would be willing to comply with their obligation to make the loans. The landlords having submitted to those conditions, putting it on the lowest ground, it would be the shabbiest thing in the world to say now that the loans would not be completed.

MR. FINIGAN said, he had very carefully considered the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), which, in his opinion, was a very reasonable one. There was not much difference between the hon. Member and the noble Lord opposite (Lord Frederick Cavendish), who stated that the Government felt bound in honour to carry out the arrangements with regard to loans entered into before the 29th February. He did not think his hon. Friend had any objection to that, because the Amendment said—

“Except in cases where the Commissioners of Public Works had sanctioned such loan previously to the seventh day of May, one thousand eight hundred and eighty.”

He (Mr. Finigan) could not help saying, with regard to loans the arrangements for which were not completed by the 7th day of May, that there must be something very wrong either on the part of the landlords or of the Irish officials. Therefore, he could not see that his hon. Friend was asking too much, and he had yet to understand what the exact position of the Chief Secretary of Ireland was with reference to this matter. He (Mr. Finigan) understood that the hon.

Member for Cavan quite agreed that all loans which were entered into up to the 29th February should be passed and sanctioned, but that any loan not sanctioned previously to the 7th day of May should not be completed by the Government. That proposal being a very reasonable one, he should feel himself compelled to go into the Division Lobby with his hon. Friend.

MR. FAY said, he hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn, as he believed that, unless there was a great principle involved, it was a mistake to delay the advancement of the Relief Bill by Motions of an unimportant, but possibly harmful, character. He had some knowledge of these loans to landlords, and could only say that, from their inception to their completion, they were, so far as he knew, obtained bond fide, and were expended for the advantage not of the landlord alone, but of the tenant and labourer. A Bill like this Relief Bill should be expedited, and he implored his Irish Colleagues to view it as a measure introduced by friends, not foes. Surely this was not a time to minimize, when every day might place the Bill in such a position as not to be passed that Session. If any defects hereafter appeared, they could be rectified in the Winter Session which was surely to follow.

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to take, in the best part, the advice of his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Fay); but he must reply to him, in equally good part, that he intended to occupy as much time in moving the Amendments in his name as he should think necessary. His hon. Friend appeared not to make sufficient allowance for the circumstances of hon. Members from Ireland, who had from the commencement of the Session taken much trouble with the Bill and had imported into it valuable Amendments. He could not imagine how any sensible person could stand up for the proposition of the Government contained in this clause. But to show the absurdity. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) had pointed out that the Government were morally bound to lend money to those landlords who had applied up to the 29th February last. Now, he would ask the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish), who had endorsed that proposition, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland also, whether, if £20,000,000 had been applied—for an amount which the Church Surplus Fund could not guarantee—they would have come forward under this moral obligation, which they so much commended, and carried a Bill through Parliament to grant that sum of money? He ventured to think that had they attempted to introduce a measure dealing with English money as they were now dealing with Irish funds, their tenure of Office would have been very brief. The Government were certainly not legally bound to continue in the disastrous and useless course of their Predecessors.

MR. CALLAN said, he hoped the Government would proceed to a division, as Obstruction was dead and gone.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, it was impossible the Amendment could be accepted; for, if it was, it would put a stop to all loans under the ordinary Act by which loans were advanced out of the Consolidated Fund. He agreed, however, with the spirit of the Amendment. If he rightly understood the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish), no loans under that particular Act would be sanctioned of which instalments had not already been paid, or would be so, up to the 31st of the present month. There was no object, therefore, in passing the present Amendment besides the fact that it was opposed by the terms of the Act of 1862 with reference to loans.

MR. PARNELL said, he should like to ask the Committee to be allowed to amend the proposed Amendment by adding a few words thereto. He proposed to insert the words—"Under the authority of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880,'" at the end of the Amendment.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, he rose to Order. Was it competent for one hon. Member to ask another hon. Member to amend an Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: It is proposed to amend an Amendment by adding the words—"Under the authority of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880.'"

THE O'DONOGHUE said, with regard to the statement made by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish), it appeared to him that there could be no question, that in the case of these loans large sums had been expended by the landlords; and he must say that the statement of the noble Lord was quite contrary to his experience on the subject. He would venture to say that the statement of the noble Lord was inaccurate.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that he referred to the sum of money which had been paid.

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Proposed Amendment amended accordingly.

Amendment proposed,

"In page 1, line 26, at end, to add the words 'Provided, That no further loan be granted to owners of land after the passing of this Act, under the authority of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880,' except in cases where the Commissioners of Public Works had sanctioned such loan previously to the seventh day of May, one thousand eight hundred and eighty.'"—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question put, "That those words be there added."

MR. SYNAN said, he begged to move the next Amendment which stood in his name. It was as follows:—In page 1, at end, add—

"Provided always, That whenever by any award or otherwise the rent of any tenant shall be increased by reason or in respect of any works executed on his holding under said Act, then, and in every such case, the works so executed shall, so far as such increase shall be paid by such tenant or his successor in title, be deemed to be improvements made by such tenant within the meaning of the fourth section of 'The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1874.'"

The Amendment was of great importance to the tenants of Ireland, and the principal difficulty with regard to it arose from the fact that, by it, he (Mr. Synan) proposed to introduce words in the present Bill which would alter the effect of the Act of 1880. Provision was made in that Act for the protection of the tenant, but it did not go far enough. The Act provided that if the rent of a tenant be increased by an award of the Board of Works, it could only be so increased having regard to the amount of instalments paid under that Act. No doubt, if every landlord proceeded on fair and liberal principles, as, generally speaking, they did, there would be no necessity for any further protection for the tenant. It was possible that the landlord might not consent to an award, and would increase the rent more than allowed by the Act, and, as an alternative, give notice to quit; in that case there was no protection for the tenant. The present Amendment was originally framed by his right hon. and learned Friend the present Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law), when the prior Act was under consideration, and although the Amendment was passed in that House, it was rejected by the House of Lords. He now prepared to repeat it in the present Bill. It would, he believed, give full protection to the tenant. It provided—

“That the increase in the rent of the tenant should only be in respect of the works executed, &c.”

That was a larger protection than that given by the 9th section of the recent Act, and would afford complete protection for the tenant. It was contended by some landlords that it went further than giving complete protection, and that it would do them injustice.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was sorry to interrupt the hon. Member (Mr. Synan), but surely the Amendment could not be inserted in the present clause. It must take the form of a new clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: I would call the attention of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) to the fact that the proposed Amendment does not bear directly on the clause now under consideration. The most convenient plan would be to bring it in separately as a new clause.

MR. SYNAN said, it was a matter of indifference to him whether it were taken as a new clause or not. The reason why it appeared to him to be pertinent was that that clause dealt with the amendment of the Act of 1880, and therefore it seemed to him that it was proper to consider his Amendment there, and not elsewhere, in the form of a supplemental clause to the Bill. It could, however, take the form of a new clause if desired.

THE CHAIRMAN: As a matter of convenience, it would be better that the Amendment should take the form of a new clause. The hon. Member will have an opportunity of bringing it forward in that manner.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. FINIGAN said, he begged to move, in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell), the next Amendment on the Paper. It was as follows:—In page 1, at end of clause, add—

“The Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland may from time to time, on the recommendation of the Local Government Board, grant to any Board of Guardians of a scheduled Union, out of the said sum of one million five hundred thousand pounds, such moneys as the Local Government Board may deem necessary, having regard to the financial condition of such Union, to aid in giving out-door relief in such Union: Provided, That the entire sum to be so granted shall not exceed one hundred thousand pounds.”

[MR. PARNELL entered the House while the hon. Member (Mr. Finigan) was moving the Amendment.]

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) will listen, I propose to make some alterations in form, so that the proposed Amendment will make the clause run as follows:—

“The Commissioners of Public Works may from time to time, on the recommendation of the Local Government Board, grant to Boards of Guardians in any Union authorized to give out-door relief in the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880, out of the said sum of one million five hundred thousand pounds, such sum or sums as they may deem necessary, having regard to the financial condition of such Union: Provided, That the entire sum do not exceed two hundred thousand pounds.”

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. GIBSON said, he thought that a very important clause; and he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster), who had assented to it, would desire that the relief proposed to be granted should only be so granted under very stringent and special conditions. The only special condition he found in that clause was contained in the words “having regard to the financial condition of such Union.” He should like to add to the Amendment, in that place, the words “the pressure of distress, and the impracticability of otherwise adequately relieving.” That would render the conditions very special. If the right hon. Gentleman would say that he would consider before Report putting in such special words, he should be quite satisfied. That was the phrase which the right hon. Gentleman had himself employed some time ago. He was satisfied that the right hon. Gentleman would agree to that.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would think over the words. It appeared to him, however, that their spirit was conveyed in the word "necessary." The words "impracticability of otherwise relieving" were very binding. He thought it important that the words should be altered in the following way:—

"They may deem necessary, having regard to the financial condition of such Union and to the partial distress then within its limit."

Amendment of said proposed Amendment agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Railway and other loans); and Clause 4 (Guarantees by presentment sessions).

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he proposed to postpone these clauses until the others had been passed. He should, therefore, move that they be postponed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clauses 3 and 4 be postponed."
—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MAJOR NOLAN said, he took a different view of the matter, and he was extremely anxious that those clauses should be passed, so that arrangements might be made for loans to railways in Ireland by which they might be assisted in their operations. He had never been in the habit of concealing his feelings with regard to any Motion or Bill before the House. He considered it was binding on them not to postpone those clauses. The fact was, they had in them a good deal that was good, and also a good deal that was bad. The good part of the clauses allowed the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland to develop the resources of the country by adding branch railways, and assisting others that did not quite pay, from a capitalist's point of view, although they did so from the point of view of the particular district railways that so nearly paid that they deserved encouragement. That was the good part of the clauses. The bad part of the clauses was with reference to the baronies. Some baronies were, no doubt, fully competent to perform the work allotted to them, and against those he had nothing to say; but there were others which, although originally existing under the old feudal system, now existed only in name, and all that remained of them was their geographical position. Those were altogether useless.

MR. WARTON said, he rose to Order. The Question before the Committee was that Clause 3 be postponed. The hon. Member was then discussing Clause 4.

MR. CHAIRMAN: The Question is, that both clauses be postponed.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the hon. Member (Mr. Warton) was quite right. He (Major Nolan) referred to the 4th clause in order to avoid making a second speech, and so interfering with the time of the Committee, as the hon. Member did so often himself. He did not wish to make another speech on the same subject, and so imitate the example of the hon. Member. He had referred to the bad part of the clauses, and he thought it would be to the convenience of the Committee if they were allowed to discuss those questions of loans then. The money lent by the baronial sessions was lent exclusively to tenants. Now, if some other arrangement, such as, for instance, an equal share granted to both landlords and tenants, were made, he thought it would be better and fairer; and when taxes were raised for the benefit of the country, he thought that the landlord should pay half and the tenant half. He had an Amendment to that effect on the Paper. That was a matter he had pressed on the Government for the last two or three years, and he, therefore, did not think it right to consent to the postponement of the clauses without stating his objections to that arrangement. He was convinced that it was a matter of great importance. He was quite aware that all hon. Members were not quite agreed upon the matter of railway loans; but he was willing to give way, to a large extent, in that matter, in order to meet the general feeling with regard to it. He must say that he was sorry that a proposition had been made to postpone those clauses, as so many districts were interested in their becoming law as soon as possible. He should like the Government to re-consider their decision, and to see whether they would not be able to take the discussion on those clauses at that time. At any rate, he, for one, was of opinion that there were no more important clauses in the Bill than these.

MR. R. POWER said, he would move to report Progress. Hon. Members had been at work from 12 to 7, and had been in the House a great many hours at previous Sittings, and as late as 4 o'clock that morning; therefore, he thought that they ought to get some rest.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. R. Power.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said he was sorry he could not consent to the Motion to report Progress. It was quite true they had been sitting some time, and he supposed he had been there as long as any other hon. Member, and he had been occupied previously. But he was very anxious to get on with the Bill, and he should be glad to have the support of the Irish Members in doing so. He did not see that the Committee were in any way unable to discuss the questions that came before them, and his only object in postponing Clauses 3 and 4 was because he foresaw there would be important questions introduced with regard to them. He was prepared to sit to any time that evening, and, although hon. Members did not seem to be all of that opinion, he hoped they would not think of separating yet. He wanted first to take those clauses which would not involve so much difference of opinion; but he could assure the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) that he would bring up Clauses 3 and 4 afterwards. He hoped the Committee would be allowed to go through the Bill.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN appealed to the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) to let the Committee proceed to make as much progress as possible. There was, however, great force in what the hon. Member had said. They had been kept unusually late nearly all the evenings that week; but it behoved the Irish Members to set themselves right with the country and the House, by working as long as the Government chose to keep a House. If it were for a week they should be ready to sit, and all the more from the necessity of discussing some of the Amendments they had put down. If they adopted the Motion to report Progress they would be in the wrong in the eyes of many other hon. Members, who would think that they failed to earnestly discuss the Bill, and that they were "fiddling while Rome was burning." All the Amendments had substance and merit, and he entreated hon. Members to remain, if necessary, till the next morning. He felt so conscious that the case was one of emergency, and that their Amendments were not obstructive but wise Amendments, that he urged them to make sacrifices of their comfort and time in order to meet the Government in passing the measure.

MR. FINIGAN said, the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) had not been there all the afternoon as they had. [Mr. A. M. SULLIVAN replied, that the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Finigan) was mistaken.] He might be wrong as to the whole of the afternoon, but the hon. and learned Member was certainly absent for a considerable period. But he (Mr. Finigan) was just as anxious as the hon. and learned Member to get the Bill through Committee, and he would suggest to his hon. Friend who had moved to report Progress (Mr. R. Power) that he should withdraw that Motion. At the same time, he thought that the Committee should certainly adjourn for two hours, from 7 to 9, so as to give them time to get some rest. [Cries of "No!"] Well, if there was to be no compromise, he would support his hon. Friend's Motion; but, if they had two hours' rest, they might then go on until the next afternoon.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN explained that, probably, the reason why his hon. Friend (Mr. Finigan) thought he (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) was absent so long was that he held his tongue. He had been sitting behind the hon. Member since 3 o'clock, listening most determinedly to his Colleagues, and thinking he was helping just as much by holding his tongue.

MR. FINIGAN begged his hon. Friend's pardon.

MR. METGE asked Irish Members not to flinch from their duty. At such a time it would be disgraceful to give up.

SIR H. HERVEY BRUCE would much regret to obstruct; but he had been waiting seven hours to get to the most important clauses in the Bill, which would confer more real benefit than any other part of the measure, and he was so taken by surprise at the proposal to postpone those clauses that he should vote for reporting Progress.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he made his proposition merely to suit the convenience of the Committee. He was not against going on with these clauses, and if the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) would withdraw his Motion to report Progress, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) would withdraw his Motion for postponement of the clauses.

MR. PARNELL said, he was one of those who thought those two clauses were so utterly worthless that they could not possibly be made any better, and he doubted very much whether they could be so amended as to carry out his hon. and gallant Friend's (Major Nolan's) views. If the ratepayers, through their representatives, wished to charge themselves for the construction of county works, he (Mr. Parnell) had no objection; but the proposition contained in those clauses was entirely different. It was, that a non-representative body called the associated cesspayers, who were chosen by the Grand Jury and who would be confined to the magistracy of the county, should be entitled to saddle vast sums of money upon the ratepayers, at an extraordinary presentment sessions convened by the Lord Lieutenant. All the checks provided by the Legislature and by the Orders of the House of Commons were dispensed with, and, consequently, there would be practically no guarantee to the ratepayers who might be affected. If they had a representative system of county government in Ireland, these clauses might be made workable and very valuable; but, in the absence of any representative system, he feared to trust the very large power that would be given. He observed that a great number of Amendments had been placed upon the Paper to open the flood-gates still higher, and, in his humble opinion, they would make the clauses still more dangerous than they were already. But he thought the Committee were entitled to have some reason for the postponement of the clauses. They ought to know whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed to postpone them in order to consider the desirability of giving them up altogether, or whether he intended to stand by them. If the first reason was the true motive, and the effect of the proposal would only be to save the time of the Committee, he should certainly be in favour of going on with the other part of the Bill. But, with reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Metge), who seemed to be in a state of intense excitement about the whole measure, and feared they might lose something very wonderful if they did not get it, he could only say that, so far as they had gone, they had not obtained any very important concessions. Perhaps they might obtain those concessions by-and-bye; but, in explanation of the misapprehension of the hon. Member for Meath with respect to the merits of this measure, he (Mr. Parnell) might be permitted to state that he had no recollection of the fact that the hon. Member had assisted in the numerous consultations which had been held for the purpose of practically improving the Bill, notwithstanding that the hon. Member represented that great evils would attend the stopping of so beneficial a measure. He (Mr. Parnell), for one, would very much like to ask the hon. Member for a fuller explanation of what his views really were.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) had depreciated the Bill very much; but he (Mr. W. E. Forster) must remind the hon. Member that he had previously expressed, in the very strongest terms, that it was a matter of almost life and death to obtain the concession that had been included in the Bill. He was, therefore, exceedingly surprised at the remarks which the hon. Member had now made, in the course of which he had described that concession as worthless.

MR. PARNELL said, he certainly did not say the concession was worthless. At any rate, he had no intention of going further than saying that it was not satisfactory.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he should be sorry to misrepresent the hon. Member; but he certainly understood his argument to be to the effect which he had stated. He would state to the Committee his views concerning the Bill, because that would be the shortest way of explaining the reasons for the postponement of Clauses 3 and 4. He should be glad if those clauses could be passed, because he believed they would give a power which would be of considerable use in enabling the Government to devise the best way in which works of the kind could be developed. He was quite aware that there was some objection to the machinery which was proposed; but if they were to wait until they had got the machinery exactly to their mind, they might have to wait for a very considerable time. The position was, that there were several matters of the first importance to be dealt with in the Bill before the Committee. The first was as to how far Her Majesty's present Government were under obligations to carry out what they considered to have been the obligations to which the late Government committed themselves; the second was as to proposals made by the Government themselves, and others which they had accepted from the hon. Member for Cork City, in order to meet the immediate necessities of the case; and the third was the clause in reference to the Fishery Piers, which would enable grants to be made and the work to be commenced at once. He should not ask the Irish Members to say that the first object was one that they cared about; but the second and third they did care about, and so did he, because he thought the interests of Ireland were involved in them. But, with the greatest possible wish to get it done, he did not see how or when he was to get this discussion renewed, if it was continued now as it had been continued hitherto. He did not complain that the debates had been too lengthy; but ventured to suggest that if they were to be continued at the same length, the Government would not be able to give to the Bill more than what might be called the middle of the night. He was very sorry for that; but felt that the matters to which he had referred were of very great importance, and were also matters necessary to be decided at once, and, therefore, he hoped that the Committee would deal with them. If, after that, it was thought well to proceed with the Railway Clauses, he should be glad that such a course should be taken.

Mr. SYNAN said, it was clear to him that some part of the Bill must be postponed; and as it appeared to him that the only question was as to which part should be so postponed, he ventured to suggest that the 3rd and 4th clauses of the Bill were not the most pressing. His hon. and gallant Friend (Major Nolan) would have an ample opportunity, when the rest of the Bill had been disposed of, to insist upon a full discussion of those two clauses; but he (Mr. Synan) saw no reason to object to their postponement on the present occasion. The general wish of the Irish Members, and of the Government, to consider the most pressing part of the Bill first, should be acceded to.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he must also add his request that the 3rd and 4th clauses be postponed, mainly on the ground that his hon. Friend and Colleague (Mr. Shaw), who had suggested that the representatives of the Poor Law Unions should assist in this matter, was unavoidably absent, but would be in his place in the House next week. In his absence, an opposition to these clauses had been developed in most unexpected quarters. He was sure that the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) was acting in opposition, not only to the wish of the county, but to that of the City of Cork. There was no fear of anything like bogus railway schemes being forced upon the ratepayers by the operation of the clauses. It had been said by the hon. Member for Cork City that the scheme would only be submitted to the sessions; but he (Colonel Colthurst) had always understood that they would be submitted also to the Boards of Guardians, and that railways could not be constructed without the consent of the Boards through whose districts they would pass.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY said, he was afraid that, unless those clauses were postponed, little or no progress would be made with the Bill, because they all knew the powers of discussion which were possessed by hon. Members opposite. He would have been very unwilling to agree to the postponement, unless on an assurance from the Government that it was really intended to press on those clauses with as much earnestness as the other parts of the Bill. It was very uncomfortable to him—to say the least of it—to hear the hon.

Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) say that which he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) feared when it was proposed—namely, that they would be postponed with a view to their abandonment. He disputed altogether the right of certain hon. Members who sat below the Gangway on the opposite side of the House to represent to the Committee that Ireland was indifferent or hostile to those clauses. He believed those clauses to be about as valuable, if not more valuable, than any other clauses of the Bill. They had long asked for them, and to set up theoretical objections against them appeared to him to be not for the benefit of the country. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give them an assurance that, if they did postpone those clauses, he really intended to proceed with them; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would couple that assurance with another—namely, that he was open to reasonable suggestions with reference to them. He found some difficulty, sometimes, in discovering whether the Government intended to put its feet down, and carry through what it designed, or whether it was really open to fair argument on the part of those who might be particularly interested; and he would only add that, after a little consultation amongst some of the Irish Members on the matter, they were particularly anxious that these clauses should be improved.

MR. W. E. FORSTER remarked, that he was asked whether the Government had put its feet down? They would certainly do what they could to carry these clauses; but they were not going to risk the Bill for the sake of them. He would give his hon. Friends and the Committee, as far as he could, any opportunity of discussing them; and he hoped it would be done that night, after they had got through the other clauses. Meanwhile, it was a waste of time to talk so much about the postponement. As to the question of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) with regard to suggestions, whenever he had had charge of a Bill he had always endeavoured to entertain suggestions from anyone interested, quite irrespective of the quarter of the House in which he sat; and he could assure the hon. Member for Galway that every suggestion in this matter would be considered.

MAJOR NOLAN did not consider the discussion was any waste of time.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

Honestly, those clauses were a matter of the utmost importance. He looked on the Motion to report Progress as a bogus Motion, and would only remind hon. Members that they could get their dinners in 20 minutes. He desired to press the importance of those clauses. The county he represented had set its heart upon three different railways. In one case the Poor Law Unions had guaranteed the whole of the expense; and, in another, a large railway company had guaranteed the whole of the expense if they could borrow the money at 3 per cent. If the Government brought forward a scheme by which those railways could be made, they would be made to a certainty. He was very glad to find that the difference between himself and the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) was narrowed to a certain extent. The hon. Member for Cork City was vexed with the proposed tribunal. Well, he (Major Nolan) also was vexed with the tribunal; but he would say this—that there was not the slightest chance of their making any bad railways; and, therefore, he did not attach so much importance to the objection, except that he thought it would tend to narrow the scope of the Bill and prevent its being put into operation. The fact was, that the tribunal would be too careful. What he did object to very strongly was the incidence of the taxation; and if some of the Amendments on the Paper were not carried, it might be a question whether they should not reject the whole scheme. He thought it would be most disgraceful to put the whole charge on the ratepayers and the tenants; but there was every opportunity, by Amendments, to change the incidence of taxation, and to put it partly on the landlord and partly on the tenant. The Government would not be able to maintain the position of putting it all upon the tenant, and, consequently, they would have to come forward with some proposition to divide it. For these reasons he was most anxious that the clauses should not be postponed, and that they should be now discussed, and amended in the course of the discussion, which he believed was perfectly possible. He did not even object to the baronies, provided the taxation was amended. The baronies were not such a good machinery as he desired, but still they would be very good. At the same time, if means were wanted for making those branch railways, which would very nearly pay, he knew very well that it would be doing a very dangerous thing if the schemes were not sent to the Boards of Guardians. The hon. Member for Cork City spoke for himself and his Colleagues; but the Committee would remark, at any rate, that the two Members for Galway, the largest county in Ireland, were both anxious for the clauses in question.

MR. SYNAN rose to Order, and inquired of the Chairman, whether the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) was in Order in discussing the clauses on a Motion to report Progress?

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the hon. and gallant Member would not be in Order in discussing the details of the clauses; but as the Motion to report Progress was, practically, for the postponement of those clauses, he could not say that the hon. and gallant Member was not in Order in speaking of their general principle.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he was very sorry that the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) should try to limit discussion on those very important clauses. If hon. Members meant to reject them, let them do so, and take the whole responsibility; and if his county spoke to him afterwards about the railways, he would say—"I will do my best; but certain Members, like the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan), prevented our even having a discussion on the subject." Then the responsibility would not rest upon himself and his hon. Colleague. As to the Motion before the Committee, he thought it would be discreditable to the Irish Members to report Progress, and he hoped the Motion would be withdrawn.

MR. R. POWER said, he should be very sorry to divide the Committee. He was anxious that the Bill should go through; and if the right hon. Gentleman would only let them adjourn for an hour and a-half until 9 o'clock he would be satisfied. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman himself had dined. [MR. W. E. FORSTER: No.] Well, it was a very convenient system not to dine, and he only wished some of his hon. Friends would get into the habit.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that it would not be in Order for the Committee to adjourn.

MR. R. POWER thought if they reported Progress, and the Committee temporarily adjourned, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) would find that it really facilitated the passage of the Bill. They would all come back refreshed and in much better spirits, and prepared to sit until 7 o'clock in the morning.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped the hon. Member would not persist in the proposal for adjournment. He had never heard of its being done in that way, and he did not know that they would be able to do it. He could not consent to do it, and if he did, he was not sure he would get the Committee together again. He must remind the hon. Member that that was not the first debate—he might say it was not the five hundredth debate—in which there had been a great deal of interest, and in all previous instances hon. Members managed to go out and get their dinners. He believed he was the only person who was in any real difficulty, because he was bound to stop and look after the Bill. He did not think it would look well in Ireland if they had to stop because Irish Members wanted their dinners.

MR. WARTON said, he was extremely anxious to put it to the right hon. Gentleman as earnestly and forcibly as he could that he should persevere with his Bill, and that he should proceed with it in its proper order. He was anxious to support the right hon. Gentleman in doing so. He thought it was a matter of the very highest importance, on general principles, that when Business was to be done it should be done in a business-like and regular manner; and the result of taking clauses out of their order was that hon. Gentlemen who had Amendments could not tell when they might come on. He (Mr. Warton) had no Amendments; but there were his hon. Friends the Members for Coleraine (Sir H. Hervey Bruce) and Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham), to say nothing of others, who had Amendments on the 3rd and 4th clauses of this Bill. Moreover, going beyond general principles, he attached special importance to the arguments of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), and quite agreed with them.

Having the interest of Ireland at heart, he was anxious that railways should be promoted as well as fishery piers; and the reason why he put it very strongly to the Chief Secretary for Ireland was that the right hon. Gentleman seemed to him to be fascinated by the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell), who seemed to have a power over him that no other hon. Member had. It was quite clear that the hon. Member for Cork City did not want the railway scheme at all; and it seemed to him (Mr. Warton), if he might say so, with great respect, to show weakness on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to yield to the hon. Member in that respect. He (Mr. Warton) thought he was justified in saying that, because a very ominous expression had fallen from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman, who said that he would not imperil the Bill for those clauses, because the hon. Member for Cork City, as the right hon. Gentleman knew, intended to obstruct their passing. Personally, he (Mr. Warton) was quite willing to sit any length of time to help Ireland, to whom he wished full justice done.

MR. PARNELL said, he must confess he would like to find some way of carrying the Motion without going to a division. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland seemed to think that no one but himself was dinnerless; but he (Mr. Parnell) could assure the right hon. Gentleman that many of them had had nothing to eat since breakfast. He would not press that argument, because he thought all the Irish Members were very ready to vote fasting; in fact, Irishmen were generally understood to be able to fight without anything to eat, whilst Englishmen and Scotchmen always required to be well fed. But as regarded those two clauses, he really thought it would be a great waste of time going into them that night. As the right hon. Gentleman had said, the fishery piers and his own proposal of grants to Boards of Guardians were, in his opinion, the only important parts of the Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER remarked, that he did not give that as his opinion.

MR. PARNELL said, he was quite aware that the right hon. Gentleman did not. He only gave it as his own opinion. Although he did not think it was a very wonderful concession to have the option of giving to the people of Ireland £200,000 of their own money, when they were going to give £1,500,000 of their own money to the landlords, still, of course, it was a concession, and he was happy to admit it. However, since the 3rd and 4th clauses—which he was really not clear that they ought to have come into any relief of distress Bill, and which would take an enormous deal of time to lick into shape—if, indeed, they could be licked into shape, which he very much doubted—since those clauses were to be postponed, he was, personally, perfectly willing to go on with the Bill for any reasonable time; and perhaps, under those circumstances, the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) would reconsider his Motion.

Mr. Warton

MR. CALLAN hoped the Bill would be entirely finished that night. Other hon. Gentlemen besides the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) had been there all day and had not dined; and he wished to point out that with the tactics pursued by hon. Gentlemen opposite, the only chance of getting the Bill through that night was to go at it in a workmanlike manner, and to keep at it until it was passed. He was not a general supporter of the Government—quite the contrary—but as a Irish Member—as deeply interested in his country as any hon. Gentleman present—as the Chief Secretary for Ireland had shown an anxiety and a laudable desire to aid in passing this Bill, at great trouble to himself, he did hope that the right hon. Gentleman would have his efforts crowned with success, and all the Irish Members should certainly remain to aid him until midnight.

MR. R. POWER said, that after the appeal which had been made to him by the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) he did not feel justified in pressing his Motion. He was sorry the debate could not be adjourned; but, of course, he deferred to the feeling of the Committee, and he hoped they would sit until the Bill was carried, if it should be 3 o'clock in the morning. After he had had a little refreshment, he would be prepared to sit until the Bill was passed, and he hoped every hon. Gentleman present would do the same. He would now ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That Clause 3 be postponed."

MAJOR NOLAN said, he would not object to that, provided Clause 4 were proceeded with.

Question agreed to.

Question put, "That Clause 4 be postponed."

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed, that it would be foolish to discuss this clause after postponing Clause 3.

MR. DALY said, he was in favour of the principle of those clauses, and was willing to sit until 3 o'clock, if there was any prospect of a settlement. At the same time, he thought they should be postponed, because he quite coincided with the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland as to the more imperious necessity for carrying the other portions of the Bill. After that was done, if the hon. and gallant Member for Galway required assistance to carry the 3rd and 4th clauses, he would be quite prepared to sit with him all through the night and the next day.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN hoped the clauses would be postponed, in order that they might, if possible, carry the Bill that night; but he should join the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) in support of those clauses which, in his humble opinion, might be the means of affording considerable relief, by way of employment, that might also be really of enduring service long after the memory of the distress had passed. Railways constructed under those clauses would shower benefits upon the agricultural population. There could be no greater advantage to an agricultural community than to provide them with facilities of transit which would bring their produce into the neighbourhood of quicker markets. A farmer would find his produce worth much more if he had a railway station near his farm. Therefore, he hoped the Committee would make the utmost possible progress with the Bill.

MAJOR NOLAN would assent to the postponement under protest; but when the clause came on he intended to move that the Poor Law Unions be inserted to the exclusion of the baronies.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman was not in Order in discussing the details of the clause on a Motion for its postponement.

MAJOR NOLAN said, his objection to the clause was that it was based on obsolete, re-actionary, and unfair principles, and showed ignorance of the present state of public opinion in Ireland. He pressed upon the Government to consider the necessity of equalizing taxation under the clause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that he thought the remarks which had been made by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) showed that there was some reason for postponing the clause. As far as the Government were concerned, this discussion, though it was somewhat irregular, had not been without advantage. It had enabled him to find out the opinions of various hon. Members. This was a matter on which to consult the feelings of the Irish Members. He, therefore, thought it would be advantageous to have an opportunity of discussing the question before the clauses came on; and, consequently, he had rather altered his views about carrying them that night.

MR. BIGGAR thought that if the clauses in their present shape could be discussed, the Government would be satisfied that it was perfectly impossible to pass them in any reasonable time. There was an enormous difference of opinion among the Irish Members on the clauses generally, as well as on the details, and it would require at least two or three Sittings of the House to pass them. He thought, therefore, the best way would be to postpone them sine die, and not let them hear any more about them.

MR. LEA said, his constituents felt very strongly on the matter. They had been looking forward to those clauses as one means of advantage in the coming winter. He was ready to help the Government in passing the Bill; but he must protest against those clauses being postponed with a view to their abandonment.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he also objected to their postponement sine die, and thought the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) should put his views more fully before the Committee, in order that other hon. Members might have an opportunity of repudiating them. He was quite willing to yield to the Government; but was very anxious that those clauses should not be postponed with an intention of quietly killing them afterwards. Of course, he could not object to their being killed, if they were to be killed; but he wanted it done in a proper fashion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he should like to make a suggestion to hon. Members who were interested in those clauses. He should be very glad to meet them, and to find out what alterations they thought should be made. Of course, he could not say beforehand that he would consent to those alterations. It was possible, however, that if hon. Members were in favour of those clauses, and could agree as to how they thought they should be placed before the Committee, they might be able to get them through without the difficulty which would evidently otherwise arise.

MR. A. MOORE thought the Committee should be satisfied with the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, who had made a very proper proposal. He only wished after what had been said by other hon. Gentlemen to put his opinion on record that those clauses were of the greatest possible value. His constituents were most anxious for them; and, putting aside questions as to machinery and so forth, he regarded the main principle as extremely valuable.

Question agreed to.

Clause 5 (Powers of Board of Works).

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, that in the absence of the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) he would move in page 3, line 13, to leave out "thirty" and insert "sixty." The object was to increase the sum proposed to be given for the purposes of fishery piers.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was out of Order for a private Member to move to increase the grant proposed to be given out of public moneys by this Bill. Such increase could only be proposed by a Minister of the Crown.

MR. W. E. FORSTER believed that was the case. He therefore begged to move that "forty-five" be put in the place of "thirty." When the latter sum was first decided upon, it seemed to him to be the sum required to build piers in the most distressed districts, and where they would do most good; but it had been found desirable to increase it to £45,000, in order that they might take advantage of all the money so generously granted by the Canadian Government. He did not expect hon. Members to say they were satisfied, and that that sum would meet the requirements of all the distressed districts; and however much might be proposed, he dared say they would feel justified in asking for more. But this was a considerable advance, and he believed it would do very great good.

Question proposed, "That 'forty-five' be inserted."—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the right hon. Gentleman told the Committee that, in the opinion of the Government, £30,000 represented what would be likely to be wanted before they had any information, or before they took any steps to meet the grant from Canada. [Mr. W. E. Forster explained that he did not say that.] He could only say that if the Government had information about the Canadian grant they must have been sadly wanting in arithmetical ability not to have arrived at a fairer figure.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, what he said was that they fixed the sum of £30,000 at first, because they thought it would meet those piers for which there was the most urgent necessity.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR did not wish to misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman; but it did seem strange to him that when the Canadians had given £10,000, the Government should have proposed to give only £30,000. At any rate, they knew that from outside sources there was a fund of £15,000 now available, which, treated as a fourth of the entire expenditure, would leave a balance of £45,000 to be supplied from Imperial funds. That was supposing that no contribution whatever was to come from Ireland for fishery purposes. It was supposed, in fact, that the example of the Canadians would not be met by anyone in Ireland. It seemed to him that it was an entirely gratuitous assumption on the part of the Government; and he wished to point out that this clause, and, in his opinion, the whole Bill, was a thorough sham. The Bill, in its entirety, was a sham, and any portion of it was a sham. It was a sham in the first part regarding advances to landlords; and he was convinced that it was a sham with regard to those clauses which even the right hon. Gentleman himself proposed to throw overboard now.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he must prevent this thorough misrepresentation of what he had said. He had within the last 10 minutes distinctly stated that he did not intend to throw these clauses overboard; and, therefore, it was most unfair of the hon. Gentleman to say so.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the right hon. Gentleman, at any rate, told the Committee that he was not going to imperil the Bill for the sake of those clauses; and if that did not amount to much the same thing as throwing the clauses overboard he (Mr. O'Connor) did not know what did. Now the Government proposed, in the third portion of the Bill, to allocate the sum of £45,000 for the purposes of the establishment or repair of fishery piers in different parts of Ireland; but what in reality did that amount to? They knew that for years a sum of £5,000 had been taken in the Estimates for that very purpose; and the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) had, on a previous occasion, informed the House that, in order to provide for the funds referred to in this Bill, the annual grant was for some years to come to be suspended—in other words, that money which otherwise would have been spread over several years was swept up into one heap, and placed as a total in this Bill, and under the provisions of this Bill it was to be distributed over piers in different parts of the Island. Anyone who was conversant with the history of the establishment of these piers knew that there was hardly any kind of work that was more slow or more liable to frequent and long interruptions; and the noble Lord himself, if he chose to consult those channels of information which were open to him, would find plenty of ground for concluding that it would be impossible to do all the work that was to be done within the period during which the distress was expected to be most intense. He would find that in works of that magnitude the expenditure would have to be spread over a long time, and that in all probability the practice of sweeping the annual grants into a heap would have to be reversed by spreading the expenditure over several years. Under all the circumstances, he could not consent to the substitution of the word "forty-five" for the word "thirty," and must, therefore, oppose the Amendment. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he would much more thoroughly meet the requirements of the case by doubling the amount, or, at any rate, substituting £60,000 for the sum of £45,000.

MR. BLAKE said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster) should know that that £45,000, of which £15,000 was a supplementary grant from independent sources, would not finish more than about 20 harbours in the distressed districts. That was positively the fact, so that out of 35 harbours in those districts which should be finished as speedily as possible only 20 could be completed. That was only a little more than a third of the number required. They had heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish), that it was the intention of the Government to give the usual grant for fishery piers; but even if that was done, the total sum would not be nearly enough for the purpose. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would consent to the proposed increase of £15,000, he (Mr. Blake) would venture to say that it would have the effect of doing a vast deal of good. The money could all be usefully employed, and they might take his word for it that if that additional sum were not granted more than half the harbours in the distressed districts which were absolutely urgently required could not be proceeded with. He earnestly appealed to the right hon. Gentleman not to allow such a sum as £15,000 to stand between the Government and the universal feeling of the Irish Members.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, that he understood that on that fishery question his hon. Friend (Mr. Blake) was an authority, and he was sure that he had not represented the matter too strongly to them. For his own part, he (Colonel Colthurst) knew that in the County Cork there were 12 piers which urgently wanted assistance, not only as being a means of giving employment, but also in aid of the fishermen of that district. He had himself, within the last four or five weeks, been in districts—he referred especially to 40 miles of coast—where there was not a landing place where a boat could be drawn up. The districts were barren, and the ordinary means for building those piers were altogether wanting. There was one hard case which he wished especially to bring to the notice of the Committee. That was the case of a pier and harbour of refuge at Ballycotton that was urgently needed. A pier was already built there by the Board of Works; but it did not go far enough into the sea. There was no turning point where fishing boats could get out of the roll of the sea and lie up; and many boats had been wrecked there, not only on coming in, but actually when lying at the pier. He believed that to construct a harbour of refuge there would not cost more than about £10,000, in which both boats and fishing vessels could lie. Application had been made with regard to that pier to the Board of Works; and the answer had been that, as the law then stood, their application could not be entertained. The place lay in the centre of an exceedingly distressed district. He understood that the Guardians had unanimously—or, at any rate, by a large majority—agreed to apply to have the Union scheduled, and their application had been refused, on the ground that the construction of that pier totally excluded them from consideration. Therefore, he would earnestly appeal to his right hon. Friend that he would consider the advisability of granting that £15,000 in aid of that Vote; and that such works as those at Ballycotton, to which he had alluded, might be taken into consideration in preference to others which lay in districts which were not absolutely entitled to be termed distressed districts.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that in answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. A. M. Sullivan), who had appealed to him, it appeared to him (Mr. W. E. Forster) that they thought he had the key of the Treasury. He had not got it, and he would inform the hon. and learned Member that it was not his (Mr. Forster's) money that he was asking for, but the money of the people, which was to be raised by taxation. He must state that he did not think the Government could increase the grant. In so doing, they would be acting quite contrary to all precedent, and nothing but a very strong case would induce them to allow of an increase. He must honestly say that he thought the authorities had done quite right in being reluctant to give public money in such an unprecedented way. He was perfectly sure that it was not in his power to increase the Vote, and if the Amendment was proposed he should be in favour of the Vote remaining at £30,000.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he wished to say a few words, as he was deeply interested in that question. He thought that the grant was utterly insufficient, and he would call the attention of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) to the fact that before long £40,000 would be required for a harbour at Galway. It was not, he knew, a fishery harbour; but that sum alone amounted to within £5,000 of the Vote they now were to receive. With regard to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he would beg to say that the grant of Imperial money for local harbours was not altogether so unprecedented as he wished to make out. Imperial money had been given to matters partly Imperial and partly local before then; and, as that money would go to assist in the construction of harbours of refuge, it was necessary, he thought, that Imperial as well as local funds should contribute. He understood from the hon. Member for the County of Waterford (Mr. Blake), who was the highest authority upon that subject, that according to the present system the power of giving money for fishery piers was, practically considered, rather decreased than increased, and that heavier conditions were to be required from those making applications than were required before. He thought the grant might well be increased to £60,000. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Forster) had stated that he had not the key of the Treasury; but he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) understood that the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury had it. He would suggest that the way out of the difficulty was to grant the £45,000, and also continue the annual grant of £5,000.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that the proposals of the Government had been spoken of as a sham; he must say that he could not regard it in that light. That was an epithet that could hardly with propriety be applied to any Supplemental Vote. Whether or no the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) was right in characterizing the Bill as a sham, there could be no doubt that contributions were to be paid in aid of local works. With regard to the remarks of the hon. Member (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) who had just spoken, as to a single harbour absorbing the whole sum, he would beg to point out to him that the money for fishery piers was limited to comparatively small works, and would not be employed for piers for shipping and such larger craft. For that reason they did not see why the Vote should be increased to £45,000. He was not prepared to say that in the present state of the Exchequer the amount could be increased. It was intended, however, to continue the usual grant of £5,000.

MR. PARNELL said, it appeared from the remarks of the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) that the Treasury would be threatened with bankruptcy in case that grant were increased to £45,000. That only showed to what desperate devices hon. Gentlemen might be driven in order to avoid any increase of expenditure. He did think that such a sum as £45,000 was a poor miserable sum considering what was required to be spent on the West Coast of Ireland. The Inspectors of Fisheries had recommended that some harbours should be built. They asked for that purpose for a Vote of £45,000, and £15,000 was to be given by Canada and Liverpool, making a total of £60,000, and that was all that could be obtained, in order that the fishermen might reap the magnificent harvest that Providence sent them. As a measure for the relief of distress it was equally miserable. He was sorry that the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury had not seen his way to be more generous in that matter. £45,000 was a poor contribution out of the Exchequer for the relief of distress. It was not what they might have expected from a great country, and he thought that they should have received a sum equal to the emergency—say £100,000. It would not ruin England to give a grant of that kind, and the advantage and benefit of it to the poor fishermen on the Western Coast of Ireland would render them perfectly satisfied. Upon studying the question he had become so convinced of the great necessity that existed for a larger sum of money to be expended that he had placed upon the Notice Paper, the previous night, a new clause, in order to enable the sum of £250,000 to be given for that purpose out of the Church Surplus Fund, and he hoped that when the time came for considering that clause the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Forster) would see his way to agree to it. He knew of no purpose to which the Church Surplus Fund could be better put than in national works of that kind, and thus to improve the industrial resources of the country, and increase the wage-earning power, and so relieve those who were then dependent upon relief Committees for their daily bread. He had merely referred incidentally to his own clause, which he hoped to introduce. Looking at the history of the distress in Ireland, he was afraid to think what the state of things would have been had it not been for the magnificent contributions they had received from the United States and far-off Australia. He trusted that the Government would not limit their contributions to the miserable grant of £45,000.

MR. BLAKE said, he had heard the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland with regard to that matter; but he could adduce very strong claims for assistance in the matter of piers and harbours. Fifty years ago a Bill was passed in that House to abolish the grant of £5,000 for harbours in Ireland; but it continued the contribution of £3,000 which had been paid to Scotland. The grant was removed from Ireland, and continued to Scotland, which he believed at the present time did not want a single harbour. Since the Act of Union, Scotland had obtained £1,500,000 more than Ireland for fisheries; and until a very few years ago Scotland received £7,000 over and above the sum granted to Ireland for the same purpose. It would be a mistaken policy on the part of the right hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord—for if the right hon. Gentleman had not the key of the Treasury the noble Lord had it—not to sanction the £15,000 additional being given. The right hon. Gentleman had sufficient information before him to know that not a third of the harbours could be completed with the proposed sum. There were four harbours in his (Mr. Blake's) own county, for which nothing could be done on account of lack of funds. Money was urgently needed to enable the unfortunate people living along those coasts to obtain a livelihood. If those harbours were not completed, the right hon. Gentleman might depend upon it that, on a future occasion, they would have to come before the House and ask for a larger grant to relieve the necessity of the population. He hoped, therefore, that he would be induced to increase the grant to £60,000.

MR. WARTON said, that as an English Member who viewed with the greatest concern some of the revolutionary schemes of the Government for confiscating property in Ireland, and who disagreed with that policy, he should wish to say a few words on that occasion in behalf of Ireland. He thought that, instead of confiscation and revolutionary measures, the best English policy was to develop the material resources of that country; and he must say that, for developing such resources as the railway system and fisheries, the sum under discussion appeared very small indeed. He earnestly hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who was very often squeezed to a considerable extent, would give what was a fair and legitimate sum for that purpose. He asked him, as the Minister of the Crown then present, to acquiesce in what had fallen from two different Irish Members of Parliament—namely, that £60,000 was required, and to grant that Amendment. He (Mr. Warton) could not agree with what had fallen from the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) as regarded the state of the Imperial Exchequer. Certainly, with the present Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Budget that had been laid before them, they could, he believed, well afford to part with some of the income they were sure to have. In all probability, the arrangements were intended to produce a larger sum to the Exchequer than they were told of. The calculations were, no doubt, arranged so as to produce a considerable surplus in order that they might look with astonishment at the wonderful financial ability of the Chancellor of the

MAJOR NOLAN said, he hoped that as the appeal for an additional £15,000 had the support of the whole of the Conservative Party present in the House, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would not be hard-hearted, but give way on the point.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, they had been charged with hard-heartedness, and their generosity had been appealed to. But it was absurd to talk of hard-heartedness in the matter; what they had to consider was the general requirements of the Public Service and the interests of the country all round. It was quite an exceptional thing to make a grant at all, more so one of £30,000, and still more so to be asked to increase it afterwards to £45,000. He must repeat to the Committee that he did not think it possible to go any further than the sum they had stated. He was bound to state that £45,000 was what they had been asked for, and probably if they had granted £60,000 they would have been asked for £80,000, and if they had given £80,000, hon. Members would have asked for £100,000, and so on. There had been a good deal of talk about different harbours about the country; but that was not the object which had been brought before the Government. It was the case of the stormy West Coast, where fishing was the only alternative occupation, and they were asked that small harbours might be constructed. He would not put his information against that of the hon. Member for Waterford County (Mr. Blake); but they had acted on the testimony of the Fishery Department, and several piers were expected to be made at a small cost. No doubt a great deal was required to be done; but it could not all be done under that Act. It was impossible, by the present measure, to develop the resources of Ireland. When that was done, it ought, he thought, to be done by loan and not by grant. He was sorry that what they had done was referred to as being miserable. The only reply he could give to that was, that it was not their own money they were dealing with, but they were the trustees of the money of the public. He never expected to get much thanks for the grant, if any. There was no reason why they should be thanked for doing what was best, considering the balancing of the claims of all concerned, and the exceptional circumstances of the case. He believed that the £40,000 they had, or even the £30,000 of the grant, would give a good number of cottiers in those distressed districts employment, and they had apparently nothing to do at present but miserable cultivation—no alternative employment whatever.

MR. DALY said, they ought to bear in mind the circumstances under which the grant was given. They might be told hereafter that when the question was raised they had not stated that £45,000 would be insufficient. That sum of £45,000 consisted partly of £10,000 from Canada, and £5,000 from Liverpool, making together £15,000. If he understood the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) rightly, he had said that, in case those contributions were by any means diminished, the Government would increase their grant in proportion. Could he not see his way to making the increase without that diminution taking place? They only asked for a sum of £15,000, which represented only £450 a-year. The whole question was a paltry one, and he trusted the Government would see their way to yield to the wishes of Irish Members with regard to it.

Question put, and agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

MR. BLAKE moved as an Amendment, in page 3, line 21, after "eighty," to insert "one."

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the special object of the Government in inserting the date 1880 was to give immediate relief; but he would not object to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Terms upon which Commissioners may undertake works).

MR. BLAKE, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 26, to leave out from "Commissioners" to "Commissioners," in line 35, and instead of "Commissioners" insert "they," said, he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to that and the following

Amendment which he had on the Paper. If the clause were agreed to as it stood, not a single harbour would be erected on the West of Ireland, or anywhere else. The local contributions, being a fourth of the whole cost, were raised with the greatest possible difficulty. These districts were distressed districts, and it was not easy to raise the necessary amount. The conditions, as put in this 6th clause, amounted to this—that in the event of the estimate formed by the engineer of the Board of Works falling short of the sum required for completing the work, the locality must undertake to give their proportion, or a fourth of whatever might be in excess. Supposing the estimated sum for a harbour was £2,000. The engineer had gone down, and made an examination, and said that was the sum required. The Board of Works gave £1,500, and the locality raised £500 by local contributions. There was a condition of that character at present; but the locality was not bound to any sum in excess. The work might come to £3,000 or £4,000, and with the condition compelling the excess sum to be contributed locally in proportion, it would be hopeless at present to get the conditions complied with. It was hard enough to get the fourth, as calculated in the first instance. What he wished was, that when an engineer officer of the Board of Works went down, and made an inspection, in the event of the work not being completed for the estimated sum, the excess should be drawn out of the Consolidated Fund. As it stood at present, so far as the piers and harbours on the West of Ireland were concerned, the Bill was not worth the paper it was printed on. From his experience as a Fishery Inspector, he knew that the localities would not bind themselves to a fourth of whatever the excess over the estimate might be. He asked the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) and the Chief Secretary for Ireland to ponder well on what he said, and, if necessary, to suspend the clause until they had communicated with the Fishery Board in Ireland; and if they did not confirm what he said he would withdraw his opposition to the clause.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he fully admitted that, with this provision, there would be great difficulty in the way of immediate expenditure of this money. He was willing to withdraw the words, and accept the first Amendment, but not the second. If it was found that the actual cost was likely to exceed the original estimate, then the matter would stand over for consideration. The object of the hon. Member would be attained if he (Lord Frederick Cavendish) consented, as he now did, to the withdrawal of those words.

MR. PARNELL said, what would be the effect of adopting the first Amendment and not the second one? It appeared to him, in that case, the work would be stopped, and not proceeded with.

MR. BLAKE said, as the law stood at present, if the estimate amounted to £2,000, and the proposal of a contractor to £3,000, it was optional for them to say that they would go on or not; but as the clause stood it was compulsory. His subsequent Amendment was to the effect that when the Board of Works engineer estimated the cost, and it was found when the work was proceeded with that an extra sum would be needed, then that sum would be borne by the Board of Works. If they made a blunder, it was right that the sum needed should come from them.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BLAKE, in moving a further Amendment, in page 3, line 40, after "that," to leave out to end of paragraph in page 4, and insert—

"In any case where the actual cost shall exceed that estimated by the Engineer of the Board of Works, then the entire of such excess shall be defrayed out of any moneys placed at the disposal of the Commissioners by Parliament for the making of loans or grants,"

said, it was a very reasonable proposal. As Inspector of Fisheries, he had recommended harbours to be made, and got the parties to raise the sum originally estimated; but it was found that the contractors estimated higher, and numerous useful works had, in consequence, to be abandoned. In the present impoverished state of the country that was more likely to occur than ever. The works were of a very simple character, and required no great engineering skill to calculate the cost; and if reckless calculations were made the cost should come from the Board of Works. If the proposal was not acceded to, a great deal of the good intention of the Bill would be destroyed.

Lord Frederick Cavendish

MR. RAMSAY said, he hoped, before the right hon. Gentleman acceded to the Amendment, he would consider the source from which the money, if it was required in consequence of the error of the engineers, was to be drawn. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) had no care of the interests of the taxpayers of Great Britain. It was said that the money for the relief of the Irish distress was to be taken from the Irish Church Surplus Fund. For that very reason, the matter had received less consideration on the part of the Members for Great Britain than it would have done if the money was to be taken from the Consolidated Fund; but the proposal now before them was to take from an Imperial fund the money required for works in Ireland, as to the value of which there was room for diversity of opinion; and he conceived it would be necessary to pause before granting the principle of this Amendment, which would impose a burden upon the taxpayers of this country without regard to their wants and wishes. He protested against the adoption of the Amendment, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not accede to it. He had listened with great interest to the discussion that had taken place, and had heard, with pleasure, the persistent efforts of hon. Members opposite to get money for purposes which might be of use to the people of Ireland; but when they came to ask for money which would come out of the pockets of people living on the West Coasts of Great Britain, where harbours were as much needed as in Ireland, he thought it was requisite to pause. There was a point beyond which the Members for Scotland and England could not be expected to go.

MR. BARRY said, unless this Amendment was adopted by the Committee, the whole clause would be, to a large extent, practically inoperative. There was the keenest distress in this part of the country, and he was quite sure the prospect of a large and indefinite expenditure would deter any expenditure whatever. The Government ought to consent to the Amendment. If the Government Inspector sent down to make an estimate made a serious blunder, and fell short by some thousands of the amount required, it was a hard case that an impoverished district had to contribute to meet a portion of the blunder.

same time, if means were wanted for making those branch railways, which would very nearly pay, he knew very well that it would be doing a very dangerous thing if the schemes were not sent to the Boards of Guardians. The hon. Member for Cork City spoke for himself and his Colleagues; but the Committee would remark, at any rate, that the two Members for Galway, the largest county in Ireland, were both anxious for the clauses in question.

MR. SYNAN rose to Order, and inquired of the Chairman, whether the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) was in Order in discussing the clauses on a Motion to report Progress?

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the hon. and gallant Member would not be in Order in discussing the details of the clauses; but as the Motion to report Progress was, practically, for the postponement of those clauses, he could not say that the hon. and gallant Member was not in Order in speaking of their general principle.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he was very sorry that the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) should try to limit discussion on those very important clauses. If hon. Members meant to reject them, let them do so, and take the whole responsibility; and if his county spoke to him afterwards about the railways, he would say—"I will do my best; but certain Members, like the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan), prevented our even having a discussion on the subject." Then the responsibility would not rest upon himself and his hon. Colleague. As to the Motion before the Committee, he thought it would be discreditable to the Irish Members to report Progress, and he hoped the Motion would be withdrawn.

MR. R. POWER said, he should be very sorry to divide the Committee. He was anxious that the Bill should go through; and if the right hon. Gentleman would only let them adjourn for an hour and a-half until 9 o'clock he would be satisfied. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman himself had dined. [MR. W. E. FORSTER: No.] Well, it was a very convenient system not to dine, and he only wished some of his hon. Friends would get into the habit.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that it would not be in Order for the Committee to adjourn.

MR. R. POWER thought if they reported Progress, and the Committee temporarily adjourned, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) would find that it really facilitated the passage of the Bill. They would all come back refreshed and in much better spirits, and prepared to sit until 7 o'clock in the morning.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped the hon. Member would not persist in the proposal for adjournment. He had never heard of its being done in that way, and he did not know that they would be able to do it. He could not consent to do it, and if he did, he was not sure he would get the Committee together again. He must remind the hon. Member that that was not the first debate—he might say it was not the five hundredth debate—in which there had been a great deal of interest, and in all previous instances hon. Members managed to go out and get their dinners. He believed he was the only person who was in any real difficulty, because he was bound to stop and look after the Bill. He did not think it would look well in Ireland if they had to stop because Irish Members wanted their dinners.

MR. WARTON said, he was extremely anxious to put it to the right hon. Gentleman as earnestly and forcibly as he could that he should persevere with his Bill, and that he should proceed with it in its proper order. He was anxious to support the right hon. Gentleman in doing so. He thought it was a matter of the very highest importance, on general principles, that when Business was to be done it should be done in a business-like and regular manner; and the result of taking clauses out of their order was that hon. Gentlemen who had Amendments could not tell when they might come on. He (Mr. Warton) had no Amendments; but there were his hon. Friends the Members for Coleraine (Sir H. Hervey Bruce) and Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham), to say nothing of others, who had Amendments on the 3rd and 4th clauses of this Bill. Moreover, going beyond general principles, he attached special importance to the arguments of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan), and quite agreed with them.

Question, "That Clause 9 be postponed," put, and agreed to.

Clause 10 (Interpretation).

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in moving, as an Amendment, to add the following words in page 5, line 17:—

"The term 'scheduled union' means a Poor Law Union, which, or any division of which, was comprised in any Schedule published by the Commissioners of Public Works in the 'Dublin Gazette' as a union or division in which loans might be made in accordance with the notices of the said Commissioners dated the twenty-second day of November one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine and the twelfth day of January one thousand eight hundred and eighty,"

said, he moved the addition of these words to define the meaning of the term "scheduled Unions." It was necessary to put in that definition.

MR. CALLAN said, he had hoped the right hon. Gentleman would have continued the discretion of the Local Government Board, and not have confined the Bill to the Unions which were scheduled several months ago, because since then distress had arisen in other Unions, and more accurate information could now be obtained. He thought they should give the Local Government Board full power to name the Unions.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought that, considering what the Committee had done in the earlier part of the evening, they ought to take the same definition here as there. He would withdraw the Amendment, and define the Unions in the same manner as they had been defined by previous Amendments.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Question, "That the postponed clauses be postponed until after the new clauses have been considered," put, and agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, as an Amendment, in page 5, after Clause 9, to insert the following Clause:—

(Amendment of terms of loans to boards of guardians.)

"The fourth and fifth sections of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880,' shall be amended, so far as relates to scheduled Unions, as follows (that is to say):—

"(1) The term for which money may be borrowed by the board of guardians of any scheduled union shall be extended to twelve years. The rate of interest at which the Commissioners of Public Works may lend to any such board of guardians shall be reduced to one per centum per annum; and, in the case of any loan by the Commissioners of Public Works to any such board of guardians, the payment of the first instalment payable in respect of such loans may, with the consent of the Treasury, be postponed for any period not exceeding two years from the making of the loan, and no interest shall be charged on such loan during any such period of postponement of payment of the first instalment;

"(2) In addition to the purposes specified in the said fourth section as the purposes for which a board of guardians may borrow, any board of guardians which has contracted any loan under the provisions of the said Act may borrow money to pay off such loan;

"(3) So much as may be necessary of the said sum of one million five hundred thousand pounds payable by the Commissioners of Church Temporalities to the Commissioners of Public Works shall be applied by the Commissioners of Public Works in making good any advance by way of loan which they may make to a board of guardians under the authority of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880,' upon the terms prescribed by this Act;

"The provisions of the nineteenth section of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880,' shall apply to the repayment of all amounts advanced as last aforesaid by way of loan to Boards of Guardians, as fully as if such advances had been specified in that section."

The right hon. Gentleman said, that whereas Boards of Guardians were empowered to give out-door relief, and to borrow money, which the National Debt Commissioners were to lend at the usual terms of 3½ per cent, the Amendment was to enable the Boards to borrow out of the Church Surplus Fund for the same term of years, with an additional two years at no interest, and afterwards interest at only 1 per cent.

New Clause (Amendment of terms of loans to Boards of Guardians) brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. GIBSON said, he was not sure that he thoroughly understood the clause. He understood the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) to state that it was to enable money to be advanced to Boards of Guardians at 1 per cent out of the Irish Church Surplus; but that was not, he thought, the construction of the clause, taking it altogether. It was to be read, of course, in connection with the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880, which it sought to amend; and that enabled loans to be made to Guardians out of money provided by Parliament. Bearing that in mind, let them read the clause proposed. The clause was divisible into three sub-sections; the first being that the term for which money might be borrowed should be extended to 12 years. That was a general statement; it might be good or bad policy, but he did not dispute it. The second enabled Boards to borrow money to pay off those loans, and he did not question the prudence of that. But then came the 3rd sub-section, which, in no respect, governed or was controlled by the previous sub-sections. It was entirely independent, and might stand or fall by itself. It might be struck out or retained, and would not operate in the slightest degree upon the two previous ones. He should say it was subsidiary and complementary, but not governing. But did the right hon. Gentleman mean to exclude all other resources than the Church Surplus? He apprehended that if the clause were passed, money voted by Parliament would be a source out of which loans might have to be made, so far as it was necessary to supplement this £1,500,000.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Clause stand part of the Bill."
—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

COLONEL COLTHURST moved, as an Amendment, in line 5, to leave out "twelve" and insert "thirty-five." He admitted that some of the reasons which might induce the Committee to accept the Amendment had been modified by the action of his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) with respect to the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell); but he (Colonel Colthurst) claimed the credit of having made the proposal when the hon. Member for Cork City moved his Bill for the relief of distress. He (Colonel Colthurst) then suggested that the Boards of Guardians should be the channel through which relief should be given. He had been denounced in Ireland by the special protégés of his hon. Friend opposite, and he supposed those denunciations would now be withdrawn, seeing that the hon. Gentleman had practically adopted his suggestion. In February last he proposed that the same favourable terms as were given to the landlords—namely, loans for 35 years at 1 per cent interest, should be given to Boards of Guardians for purposes of out-door relief, because he had all along felt that the true way to meet this crisis was through the liberal administration of Poor Law relief; but that the Guardians ought to be forced to give out-door relief, and they could not force them to do so unless they gave them liberal terms. The question was, whether, after the concession Her Majesty's Government had made, the Amendment was still necessary. He humbly submitted it was, because, as the hon. Member for Dublin (Dr. Lyons) had pointed out, the £200,000 to be given in grants, as proposed by the hon. Member for Cork City, would go but a very little way. Perhaps it was because he was enamoured of his own suggestion; but he believed that his proposal to advance £200,000 and such further sums as might be found necessary for 35 years at 1 per cent was a better proposal, taking the interest of the poor into consideration, than the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork City, which had been adopted by the Government. However, that was a matter that was done, and he would now ask the Government to accept his Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER proposed to alter the wording of the first sub-section of his clause by omitting the words "scheduled Unions" and inserting the words—

"Any union authorized to give out-door relief under the 3rd Section of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880.'"

MR. CALLAN was afraid the words would have a restrictive effect. He wished to leave the Local Government Board full power to extend the provisions of the Act to any Unions in which circumstances might hereafter occur which, in their opinion, justified such extension. He would suggest that the words "scheduled Unions" be left out and not replaced by any other definition, unless it were made to read in this way—"Any Board of Guardians approved of by the Local Government Board." That would leave the Board perfectly free.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought the words he had proposed were sufficient. The Poor Law Board had full power to use its discretion with regard to the Unions.

MR. CALLAN said, if the hands of the Board were not tied, he was satisfied; but he should like to know the exact effect of the Amendment. To what Unions would the operation of the clause be restricted?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied, that it would be restricted to whatever Unions the Local Government Board found it necessary, in consequence of the state of distress, to give out-door relief. It applied to all Ireland upon the discretion of the Local Government Board.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he would repeat his Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would not press the Amendment. He hoped the Boards of Guardians would be able to get on with the grants; but, if they required loans, he thought it would be better not to have more than the two descriptions of loans now existing and the possible grants. Besides, 35 years was a dangerously long time.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, of course, he would not press his Amendment against the wish of the right hon. Gentleman or the Committee; but he regarded the administration of out-door relief as the real, vital question at that moment, and he wished to induce the Boards to be liberal in giving out-door relief. Therefore, he thought there was quite as good a case for granting loans for that purpose as for sanitary purposes.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he understood the point of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) to be that these loans should not be extended to every purpose for which Boards of Guardians might borrow.

MR. GIBSON explained that, in his view, the construction of the clause seemed to supersede the right of borrowing from Imperial funds.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that was not the intention. It was intended to confine the clause entirely to loans borrowed for the purpose of out-door relief. He would introduce some explanatory words on the Report.

MR. GIBSON pointed out that a consequential Amendment must be made in the two other sub-sections of the clause, in accordance with the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had proposed, as to the definition of the Unions. If they inserted the words "of any Union as aforesaid" it would make the sections harmonize. He wished to know whether certain Unions which had borrowed money under the old system would have the benefit of the new proposal? He also suggested that in the 3rd sub-section the word "necessary" should be replaced by the word "available;" because it was obvious that they were putting so much on this £1,500,000, that if it were made compulsory to do everything out of it, according to that Amendment, it would be an impossibility.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would accept the words "of any Union as aforesaid." Three or four Unions had already borrowed money since the last Bill, though not to a large extent; and, of course, they would feel themselves in a very unfair position if neighbouring Unions were now enabled to get loans at a cheaper rate. That was the reason why this clause was put in. He moved to omit, in lines 15 and 16, all the words from "in addition" down to "borrow."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That those words stand part of the sub-section."

MR. GIBSON said, he was not sure that identity of meaning would be accomplished in that way, and would suggest that the necessary alteration of the wording might be done on Report.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would like to get it done now. He would, therefore, move to insert in the same sub-section the words—

"The Board of Guardians of any Union authorized as aforesaid which has contracted any loan under the provisions of the said Act for out-door relief,"

after striking out from "any," in line 16, to "Act," in line 18.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman had considerably widened the number of bodies entitled to borrow money. He had added to the scheduled Unions all those who had borrowing powers.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, what he limited the clause to was to those Boards of Guardians who were empowered, in the first place, to give outdoor relief not in accordance with the old provisions of the Poor Law. It was meant to apply to any Board of Guardians throughout Ireland in that position.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR inquired, if it applied to them whether they were in the distressed districts or not?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, yes, if by distressed districts the hon. Gentleman meant the Unions hitherto considered as distressed. Of course, the provisions would not apply to Unions which were not distressed. The Act this year made no restriction in any part of Ireland as to the Unions that would give outdoor relief. It was left to the discretion of the Local Government Board. These loans were meant to apply equally to any Union.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR remarked, that the right hon. Gentleman had by that time discovered that the fact of a Union being scheduled was not a true criterion that it was the only Union in a state of distress. He was informed that hitherto the Unions had been scheduled rather by preference of the local governing bodies than by the prevalence of distress; and he would recommend the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether it was not desirable to add a great many Unions to those already within the scope of the Bill?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, these questions had not been left out of consideration. He hoped to be able to show why he adhered to some definition of the Unions.

MR. BIGGAR observed, that the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have some doubt of the importance of the question raised by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor). His own Colleague, who was a native of County Cavan, told him that the Unions had been scheduled in a most absurdly incorrect way. He said the Union in which there had been most distress was not scheduled at all.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. PARNELL moved, in sub-section 2, after the word "money," to insert "under the provisions of this section."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to move the rejection of sub-section 3.

MR. GIBSON said, he must repeat his suggestion that the word "available" should be substituted for the word "necessary," in the same sub-section. He thought that necessary, because the clause was a mandatory one.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought it would meet the object of the hon. Member for Cork City if he moved to omit the words "so much as may be."

MR. PARNELL would move to omit those words. It was not necessary to go over the arguments which had already been adduced in favour of placing upon the Consolidated Fund the difference between two rates of interest; but an important alteration had been made by the Amendment of the Chief Secretary. Under the Relief Bill of last Session the money borrowed by Boards of Guardians for the purposes of outdoor relief was borrowed from the Exchequer. It was now proposed to be borrowed from the Irish Church Fund, and to that he objected. He wished to have it borrowed, as it was now, from the Imperial funds.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he made this proposition in the hope of meeting the views of hon. Members. He need not go back to a question which had been fully debated, and which had been decided in favour of the public purse. He believed the alteration would not affect the Church Surplus Fund to a large extent, and he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. PARNELL asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would agree to this compromise, that the difference in the interest should be borne by the Treasury?

MR. W. E. FORSTER was afraid he could not do that. The amount in question was not large; but he must adhere to the principle which they had laid down.

Amendment proposed, to leave out sub-section (3).—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question put,

"That the words 'So much as may be necessary of the said sum of one million five hundred thousand pounds payable by the Commissioners of Church Temporalities to the Commissioners of Public Works shall be applied by the Commissioners of Public Works in making good any advance by way of loan which they may make to a Board of Guardians under the authority of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880,' upon the terms prescribed by this Act,' stand part of the Clause."

Question again proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he wished to call attention to the fact that now that the rate of interest had been lowered at their request, the loans had been transferred from the Imperial Exchequer to that special Irish Fund. That fact ought to be known in its naked truth. It was one of the most monstrous things that had ever been done. The Imperial Exchequer had shuffled everything off itself when it was agreed that the interest should be lowered. They resisted the obligation to assist a starving community, and put it upon the Irish Church Fund.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not admit the allegation. In agreeing to give loans at a low rate of interest they had adhered to the principle laid down at the outset, that they should come out of this Fund, and not out of the Imperial Exchequer.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he was quite aware of that; but he wanted to put the fact before the country. The proposal was at first that the loans to Boards of Guardians and others should come out of the Imperial Exchequer; but when they asked that equally good terms should be given to the Guardians as were given to the landlords, and that concession was granted, the Government transferred the loans to this miserable Fund, and so withdrew the modicum that was granted from the Imperial Exchequer.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, if the hon. Member wished to call public attention to the matter, all he (Mr. W. E.

Forster) had to say was, that nothing had been withdrawn. The loans were to have been granted on the usual terms, so that there would have been no loss. The question whether the public funds should relieve the Irish distress had been decided by the Bill in the negative. His hon. Friend was not correct in stating that any help out of the Revenue had been withdrawn.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he must affirm distinctly that something had been withdrawn.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was sorry he could not make his hon. Friend understand it. Under the first Act that was passed, the Guardians were able to borrow money, and the Commissioners of Public Works to lend. The money was to be given at a cheaper rate than it could be got elsewhere; but there was to be no loss to the Treasury. However, a change was made in the rate of interest which would have caused a decided loss; and, right or wrong, it was decided that was not to be borne by the general taxes. As no loss was contemplated, so nothing had been withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, there might have been a loss to the public funds, independent of the interest which, by the change, would now have to be borne by the Church Surplus Fund. It sometimes happened, and it might happen in this case, that some of the Boards of Guardians might not be able to repay the loans, and to that extent the Church Surplus Fund would be a loser instead of the Exchequer. To that extent, a difference had been caused by the adoption of the clause of the right hon. Gentleman. Under the Act of last Session, if any Board of Guardians became bankrupt, as they did in 1847-8, so as to be unable to repay the advances to the Treasury, the public funds would have been the loser; but now, under the alteration made by the right hon. Gentleman, the Church Surplus Fund would be the loser. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would consider the advisability of inserting a new clause, by which the risk of that loss might be taken from that Fund. It was manifestly not fair to put it upon it, for it was not originally intended to do so. It was decided in the last Act that the money should be lent out of the Consolidated Fund; and, consequently, it should bear any loss that might possibly result from the non-payment of the Boards of Guardians. He (Mr. Parnell) thought it would be fair, under all the circumstances, to propose a new clause, which would prevent such loss being thrown upon the Church Surplus Fund.

Question put, and agreed to.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH moved that the following Clause be added to the Bill:—

(Funds for preliminary expenses of loans.)

"In addition to the sum of five thousand pounds which it is provided by the fifteenth section of the Act of the Session of Parliament held in the tenth and eleventh years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter thirty-two, may be advanced by the Treasury to the Commissioners of Public Works in any one year, to be applied by them in making the necessary survey, inspection, and investigation, and in taking all other proceedings preliminary to making any loan or advance as therein mentioned, the Commissioners of Public Works may at any time before the thirty-first day of March next after the passing of this Act, with the consent of the Treasury, out of any moneys placed at their disposal by Parliament for the making of loans, apply the further sum of five thousand pounds, or such other sum as the Treasury may from time to time deem necessary, for defraying the expenses mentioned in the said section."

Motion agreed to; Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

MR. PARNELL moved, after Clause 8, to insert the following Clauses:—

"The Commissioners of Public Works may, from time to time, out of the said sum of one million five hundred thousand pounds, payable to them by the Commissioners of Church Temporalities, apply any sums not exceeding in all the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds for the purposes of the Fishery Piers Act, to be expended in the manner therein mentioned, but subject to the conditions and exceptions hereinafter mentioned.

"Upon the publication by the Commissioners in the 'Dublin Gazette' or otherwise, as they shall think fit, of a notice of their intention to undertake any work which may be executed under the Fishery Piers Act, such notice shall be instead of and shall have all the force and effect of the final notice mentioned in the sixteenth section of the Fishery Piers Act.

"Before publishing such notice, the Commissioners may, if they think fit, do any matter or thing, and shall have, and may if they think fit, exercise any right, power, or authority in connection with such work, which they might do or would have with reference to any of the proceedings preliminary to the publication of the final notice mentioned in the Fishery Piers Act if the work were undertaken in strict compliance with the said Act.

"The provisions contained in the following sections of the Fishery Piers Act (that is to say): section four, sub-section four, section five, and sections ten to fifteen, both included, relative to proceedings preliminary to the publication of such notice, shall not apply to any such work."

(Power to undertake works.)

"At any time notice after the publication by the Commissioners of Public Works of any such notice as is mentioned in this Act, the Commissioners may commence and proceed with the works proposed to be executed and to which such notice relates.

"The Commissioners may, if they think fit, do any matter or thing, and shall have and may, if they think fit, exercise any right, power, or authority with reference to such work, which they might do or would have if the work were undertaken in strict compliance with the Fishery Piers Act, and all the enactments contained in that Act, save so far as they are modified by this Act, shall apply as nearly as may be with reference to any such work."

(Management and maintenance of works when constructed.)

"When such work has been constructed, all the provisions of the Fishery Piers Act and of the Act of the Session of Parliament held in the sixteenth and seventeenth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter one hundred and thirty-six, as amended by any Act or Acts, shall apply to such work as if it was a pier constructed in strict compliance with the Fishery Piers Act."

The hon. Member said, he trusted the Government would carry out the new clause he had placed upon the Paper last night. He regretted he was unable to give longer Notice; but he had intended to bring in a Bill in reference to the matter, and finally came to the conclusion it would be more convenient to propose a clause in connection with the Bill under discussion. The Committee was aware they had agreed to grant the sum of £45,000 out of the Imperial Exchequer in aid of the construction of fishery piers and harbours on the West Coast of Ireland. As many as 70 piers and harbours had been recommended by the Commissioners as urgently required; and in order really to develop the harbours and piers on the West and South Coasts of Ireland, it was necessary that they should have a very much larger grant. He asked, by these clauses, to allow them to have some of the Church Surplus Fund for that natural object. The hon. Member for the County Waterford (Mr. Blake), who was for many years Inspector of Fisheries in Ireland, and had fulfilled his duties in a most satisfactory manner, had assisted him (Mr. Parnell) in framing these clauses, and from his practical knowledge of the operation of the Fishery Piers Act of 1847, he assured him that they would work perfectly with that Act. They would enable the Board of Works in Ireland to undertake the construction of fishery piers and harbours, which they could undertake by the Act of 1847, without the necessity of any local contribution. The Act of 1847 allocated a grant of £50,000 for Fishery Piers and Harbours in the West. It provided that a contribution of one-fourth was necessary from local sources. That had usually been found by baronial grants; but, owing to the repugnance of the ratepayers to burden themselves more, it had been impossible to get these. He proposed to dispense with the necessity of a fourth, and the red tape required by the Act of 1847, and enable the Board of Works to undertake the construction of the fishery piers and harbours which were so much needed. He had every confidence in recommending the application of some of the Church Surplus Fund for this purpose. It would be most difficult to point out a work more urgently needed than the construction of these harbours. It was quite impossible to hope that they could be constructed without this system, for the West Coast of Ireland was far removed from civilization; it had no resident landlords, and the people were left in a sort of wild state to subsist in the best way they could, without anyone to look after their interests; and it would be of the greatest advantage to the teeming population if a grant such as he proposed were made to get on with some of the 70 piers and harbours which had been recommended by the Fishery Inspectors. Some of the piers and harbours constructed in 1847 had fallen out of repair and were now useless, so that very much was needed to develop the fisheries. He asked the Committee, with the utmost confidence, to agree to the second reading. The Irish Members, he believed were almost unanimous in its favour, and thought that no application of the money would be more advantageous to the country.

New Clause (Mr. Parnell) brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

Mr. Parnell

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not accept the clauses. He was not quite sure that £250,000 would be available, although he hoped it might be; but he did not think they ought in a Relief of Distress Bill to vote a large sum out of the Irish Church Surplus Fund for public works, independent of the immediate relief. It would be a very good thing to have piers and harbours made; but that should be done under some great and comprehensive scheme, by means of money lent on good security out of the public funds. It was a very strong and sudden step to take that the remainder of a very large part of the Fund should be swept up in supplying fishery piers. The Government, as trustees of the Fund, could not consent to the clauses.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that with a moderate expenditure upon the piers and harbours of the country they could develop the fisheries, and do a great deal to relieve some of the most distressed of the Irish population. He could not lose this opportunity of supporting the hon. Member for Cork City in pressing this proposal upon the Government. With proper facilities the agricultural population near the coast could supplement their incomes by fishing where piers and harbours had been recommended. Owing to the maladministration in Dublin, that speedy help had not been given which the people had a right to expect. If the right hon. Gentleman had made inquiries which had satisfied him that the expenditure of any money on the Irish fisheries could not be a profitable investment, he could understand his position; but he (Mr. O'Connor Power) was not prepared to accept that conclusion. He was satisfied there was a mine of wealth encircling Ireland which only required development. He would not enlarge upon the general question; but he might easily show by reference to Scotland that Ireland had not been fairly treated in this matter; and even at the risk of detaining the right hon. Gentleman they should endeavour to impress the Government with the necessity of the case.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was afraid he had not made himself understood. He did not deny that it would be of advantage to Ireland that the fisheries should be developed; but he must remind the Committee that since 1846 £125,000 had been spent in fishery piers. The total number of boats engaged in the Irish fisheries had declined from 19,046 to 5,778. He did not deny that advantage would be gained by the development of the piers and fisheries; but that was not the only public industry which it would be well to develop, and now that they were dealing with the question of immediate distress, they were not going to fork into the Bill what would be the great bulk of the Irish Church Surplus Fund for fishery piers. Why not give it for railways or other purposes? If the best way to use the Church Surplus Fund was to apply it to public works the different claims ought to be considered, and they should not grant £250,000 to one, simply because they had a Bill before them to meet the distress.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, a Bill stood for second reading on Wednesday next, dealing with this very question of sea fisheries. Without wishing to deprecate the advance of this large sum, he did not see the slightest chance of the Government adopting a proposal made in this sudden manner. As the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) had the interest of the poor fishermen at heart, he had better withdraw these clauses, and bring them on as an Amendment to the Bill which stood first for discussion on Wednesday. The Government might then reconsider this matter.

MR. BIGGAR said, did the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Colthurst) really imagine that a private Member's Bill, the second reading of which was to be moved on the 7th of July, would pass into law that Session? If he did, he had really occupied his time with little purpose so far as Parliamentary procedure was concerned. This proposition was very reasonable. It was that part of the money granted by this Bill should be spent on fishery piers. It was not proposed that a fresh sum should be taken from the Church Surplus Fund. It came with wonderfully bad grace from the Chief Secretary for Ireland to talk about plundering the Church Fund—plundering, of course, was not the word he used. Well, to talk about an inroad on the Church Fund, when for the necessity of the landlords nearly £1,600,000 had been taken. When an immensely larger sum was given to a particular class, it was not right to talk of giving a large sum to one interest. If the sum given to the landlords had been granted to the tenant farmers, they would have been aiding a much larger and more deserving class. He thought the Committee should agree to the clauses as proposed.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he had given the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) his support when he proposed that a sum of £200,000 should be applied to the immediate relief of the distress; but it was not proposed by this new grant to deal with the distress at present existing in Ireland. They were about to fight the battle of the Church Surplus Fund, and upon a bye question. No one would, for a moment, deny the importance of fishery piers and harbours; but that was not the question before them. The question was whether a Bill introduced for a specific purpose, to relieve the existing distress, was to be turned into a Bill for the allocation of the general property of the whole people of Ireland. Admitting the necessity of doing all that the hon. Member for the City of Cork and other hon. Members said as to the piers and harbours, he would ask whether there were not persons in Ireland who did not profit by the sea, who had a right to look for a share of this sum, especially when it was not made for the purpose of suppressing the existing distress? He thought it was premature to discuss the allocation of the Fund upon the Bill before them.

MR. BLAKE wished to correct the erroneous impression conveyed to the Committee by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the information of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish). He was sorry to say it, but if the right hon. Gentleman had been a better student of the Reports of the Inspectors of the Irish Fisheries he would not have fallen into the blunder he had. He had conveyed to the Committee the information from the noble Lord that, with an increase in harbours, there had been a decrease in the fishery industry and in the number of boats employed in it—that, though since 1846 there had been £120,000 spent in fishery piers in Ireland, there had, notwithstanding, been a decrease in boats and crews. The right hon. Gentleman might have seen from some of the last Reports of the Inspectors of Fisheries, made before he (Mr. Blake) left office himself, that the Inspectors had made a complete revision of the statistics regarding the Irish Fisheries. Formerly, every boat on the Irish Coast employed in the fishery, even if only for one day, was put down as a fishing boat. Many of these boats were really ferry and market boats, and not fishing boats at all. No boat was now put down in the statistics which was not actually a fishing boat. Hence the apparent decrease in the number of boats. No class had suffered more severely from the Famine of 1846-7-8 than the Irish fishermen. The capture of fish used to be pursued, to a large extent, among them; but, during the Famine, thousands were obliged to give up the industry, who were never afterwards able to resume it. Much needed to be done for the Irish Fisheries. There were, on the West and South Coasts of Ireland, large tracts of fine fishing ground, which, for want of suitable harbours, could not be fished, because the fishermen were afraid, owing to the tempestuous character of these seas, to go out except in very fine weather, lest they should be caught in a storm and not be able to regain their little harbours. For the last 10 years the fish had been keeping farther out to sea than before, thus making larger boats and better constructed harbours a necessity. The £45,000 now named by the Government, added to the Canadian, Liverpool, and other grants, would go a very short way in supplying the requisite harbours. For the wants along the East Coast alone, the £5,000 a-year, which the noble Lord said would be continued for future years, would not be sufficient. The hon. Member for Wexford was very anxious for a harbour to be constructed at Cahore for instance. If that were done, some 100 more men than were now employed would be able to ply the trade. Then the hon. Member for Cork was anxious for one at Ballycotton. If four other harbours were constructed in his (Mr. Blake's) county, £10,000 worth of fish would be added to the food supply. Now, if the proposal of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) were carried into operation, and loans were given to the counties that did not receive them now from the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund, he ventured to say that at least £1,500,000 worth of fish would enter the market beyond what was caught now. It was not alone Ireland that was interested in a matter of that kind. The English consumer was interested in it. An enormous quantity of fish came to London and other parts of England, and a great deal more could find a ready market there. Considering the bad agricultural season of the past few years, and the enormous foreign competition that had to be faced in the supply of butcher's meat, pork, and other such commodities, they should endeavour to make the very best of whatever industries remained to them. The seas round Ireland were capable of supplying, under proper management, at least five times the amount of employment and of food they did at present; and, under these circumstances, he thought the proposal of the hon. Member was well worthy of the favourable consideration of the right hon. Gentleman, and those associated with him in the Government of Ireland.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the argument of the hon. Member for Waterford County (Mr. Blake) was an argument for weighing any well-considered scheme on the subject which might be submitted to that House; but it was no argument for the spending of £250,000 immediately on works which, if they were to be of any permanent value at all, required the greatest possible care in their preparation, deliberation in their plan, and skill in their execution. Anyone who knew anything about harbours and piers knew that they could be constructed only during a limited portion of the year. Unfortunately, much of the money which had been spent in England, Scotland, and Ireland on these works had turned out to be a useless expenditure. The question now was, whether money for works of this kind should be taken from other purposes of relief; for that, he thought, was the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell), that £250,000 should be taken out of the sum of £1,500,000 proposed to be given from the Irish Church Surplus, and should be applied to the construction of piers and harbours. In all probability, if that sum were expended immediately, it would be wasted. It would not give the relief that was contemplated, and it would fail to afford the facilities which the hon. Member desired should be given to the working of the Fisheries of Ireland. For his own part, he (Mr. W. H. Smith) might say there was no one who would be more prepared to give the most careful consideration to any scheme which promised to develop the industries of Ireland; but he most cordially supported the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in his opposition to the Motion, because he believed it would entirely defeat the object they had in view, which was to relieve the present distress out of the money which was available.

Mr. SYNAN also regretted that he could not support the Motion. He did not see why they should promote the interests of the consumers of fish in England at the expense of the Irish Church Surplus Fund. Nor did he see how it was possible to meet the present distress in Ireland by the promotion of this scheme. These works were of an Imperial character, and ought to be constructed out of the Imperial Treasury. They were works which should be provided for by a separate Bill, instead of being forced into this Bill, which was only intended for the relief of the present distress in Ireland. He had no doubt it would be a great service to spend £1,000,000 for the purpose of developing the Fisheries of Ireland, and he believed it could be done in such a way that the loan would pay itself; but the money ought not to be taken from the Church Surplus Fund. That was a Fund that should be devoted to purposes for which an Imperial loan could not be obtained. It was intended for the benefit of the whole Irish people in times of famine and calamity; and the Irish Members, who were the trustees of the Irish people, should see that it was encroached upon for no other purpose.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, the objection to the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) was that it was a proposal that would spread over some years the expenditure of a very large sum which should be applied to the relief of the distress which now existed, and that expenditure of that nature was not capable of immediate application in relieving distress. It was not, it was objected, a direct means of giving relief, however useful the expenditure might be for other purposes. The hon. Member for Cork City had, at least, this excuse for having made the proposition which was open to these charges, that the main machinery of this Bill for giving relief was equally indirect. It gave no more than 25 per cent at most of the money it voted to the actual relief of the people. The rest went mainly to benefit the landlords, and would enable them, by improving their estates, to gain in the end an increase of their rents. He thought, therefore, that, so far as the indirectness of the effect went, the hon. Member for Cork City had some excuse in the general framing of the Bill. But, notwithstanding, there might be something in the objection of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. It was a large sum to be spent on those piers, and it was hard to approach the subject now with any chance of proper discussion. There was no doubt that there was a great deal of want; there was no doubt that they could usefully employ people, who would otherwise remain hungry, in building piers; and there was no doubt that the piers would be of much utility if constructed. If, however, instead of taking this £250,000, a small sum were taken for this description of work, could anyone doubt that it might be usefully expended in the relief of distress? They had £45,000 from the Treasury, £15,000 from Canada and other quarters for the purpose of making these harbours. But it had transpired already in the course of this debate that although by means of these sums, and the contributions likely to be raised locally, many works might be carried on for some years, there would be danger of these being at last left uncompleted. Was it an unfair and unreasonable thing to suggest that some small sum, not £250,000, but a sum equivalent to the sum already granted—£60,000—the amount of the two grants—should be given from the Irish Church Surplus? That was justified by the distress which prevailed in those sea-board places, and by the necessity for something more than had yet been secured to complete these works. When the large sum of £1,500,000 was given to the Irish landlords to swell their rents ultimately, it was not too much to ask that some portion of the same Fund should be given in cases where it could be applied directly to the relief of distress by such works. He did not think there was much in the argument of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Blake), who feared that the ultimate effect of such a grant would be to cheapen fish for the English market. Whether the fish came to pious Catholics in English counties, or to Protestants who liked it, the fishermen would equally be benefited.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was glad to find that after nearly 12 hours' debate they were still so cheerful; but he wished to remind them of a difference between that mode of making use of the Church money and any other that had been suggested. As to what had been said about the giving of loans to the landlords resulting in an eventual increase of their rents, that system of giving loans to the landlords had been decided upon by the late Government. The hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) had asked whether they might not make a small grant for fishery piers to promote employment, when they were giving so large a sum to the landlords for the same purpose of promoting employment. But there was this immense difference—that they lent the money to the landlords, whereas it was proposed to give it for the fishery piers. That was an enormous difference at the very outset of their proposal, and it was introducing a perfectly new principle, which it had never occurred to anyone could be brought into this debate. They had to consider whether they should absolutely give away an Irish Church Surplus for public works. He thought they should be very careful before they made over the principal of the Irish Church Surplus for any such purpose. This evening they had assented to the possibility of a diminution of the principal of the Fund for the special purpose of relieving immediate distress and keeping the people alive; but it was a somewhat startling proposal that they should allocate any of that principal for this description of public works. He could not imagine that hon. Members from Ireland, if aware of its full effects, would assent to the Motion, or that it would be generally accepted.

MR. BIGGAR said, the Chief Secretary for Ireland had remarked a difference in the nature of the two proposals. He had said that the money to be advanced under the other provisions of the Bill was to be given in the way of loan. But when money was given in the shape of a loan at a nominal rate of interest, the real fact was that the proceeding amounted to a present of three-fourths of the money. Then, as to the question whether this money was really used for the relief of the poor. They knew very well, from the discussions that had taken place, that there was only a nominal relief provided for the poor by this money given to the landlords. A very small amount of the principal sum of that loan would even reach the poor. The hon. Baronet the Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien) had insinuated that some of the supporters of this clause were actuated by selfish motives, because they represented maritime counties. He (Mr. Biggar) represented an inland county which had no sea-board whatever, and a town in a tidal river which had no fishing whatever; and he was, therefore, free from any personal temptation. But he really did think, in all seriousness, that it would be a very much more judicious outlay of this £1,500,000, were it given for the purpose of these piers which would be reproductive, if they were to believe the statements of the hon. Member for Waterford County (Mr. Blake), whose experience was worth that of all the rest of the Members of the Committee, than if given to the landlords. The hon. Member had shown them that the money would not only be reproductive and benefit the fishermen, but that it would also benefit the consumers of fish in Ireland and England. The hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) seemed to think that it was a great grievance that the consumers of fish in the large towns of England should reap any part of the benefit. But they would simply get the benefit of these large supplies of fish, if they gave a price for it which would tempt it from the mouth of the Irish consumer. And if they got the fish, the men who caught it and sent it to England would be benefited. The other systems of spending the money would only benefit a few people, and that in a much more questionable way. He thought the Government ought to agree to the proposal to allocate a portion of this money to fishing piers, which, under the former provisions of the Bill, would be commenced, but were never likely without a further grant of money to be finished, and which were, therefore, likely to be utterly worthless.

Mr. O'Shaughnessy

MR. P. MARTIN said, that the Irish Members were not unanimous in recommending the adoption of the proposal. He did not think it would be a wise proceeding to take £250,000 for fishing harbours and piers out of the £1,500,000 which it had been already arranged to allocate for the purpose of relieving the immediate distress existing in the country. The description of work required in erecting harbours and piers would not be the kind likely to be useful for the purposes of affording that immediate relief demanded by the exigency of the present circumstances. Skilled labour would be required, and to supply it he feared in very many cases the artizans employed would be brought over from England. That had been found too frequently to be the case in their past experience. But wherever the labour came from, this description of work required time; and it would not be effectual, as it occurred to him, in at once and before the harvest relieving the sufferings of those shown to be in a state verging on starvation. Under those circumstances, he trusted that the Chief Secretary for Ireland would adhere to the resolution he had come to, and would not suffer the sum which should be applied to the immediate relief of a distress that was of a deep and widespread character to be applied to purposes of a different nature. If they were discussing the general question as to whether the Fisheries of Ireland should be encouraged or not, he would quite agree with the weighty observations delivered by the hon. Gentleman who had been lately an Inspector of Fisheries. He trusted the Chief Secretary for Ireland would take these observations into consideration at the proper time, and find funds for promoting an industry too long neglected in Ireland. He had heard something said about Scotland. In Scotland harbours were rising very much from the aid given, not by the Government, but from a body of resident landlords, able and willing to encourage works of that character. This, unfortunately, was not the case in Ireland. The Scotch Fisheries, which had admirable piers, had also, however, been assisted by Government formerly in a way that the Irish had not been up to the present. He hoped that, in process of time, attention would be given to this subject; but, so far as this Bill was concerned, he thought, notwithstanding the respect he had for the hon. Member for Cork City, that they ought not to accept his clauses.

MR. PARNELL thought there was some force in the objections which had been urged on the other side to grants being taken at such short notice, more especially as it would appear to raise the question of the allocating of the Church Surplus Funds, and their distribution among the industries of Ireland; but the proposition of the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) did not fall under these objections. The amount which had been allocated by this Bill—one of the most useful the Bill contained next to that of £200,000 for assisting the Poor Law Unions in giving out-door relief—that for harbours and fishery piers was a very small one, and when that question was under discussion the Irish Members urged the desirability of increasing it. This was impressed on the Government; but the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury was unwilling, he said, in view of the Budget proposals, to recommend an increase. Taken with the Liverpool and the Canadian funds it would amount to £60,000. This was a very small thing for the assistance of the Fisheries of the West Coast. It would go a very little way, and he was afraid it would raise expectations among the fishermen which, in nine cases out of ten, would be doomed to disappointment. Now, if power were given to the Commissioners to take from the Church Surplus Fund £60,000 in addition to the £60,000 already granted for piers and harbours, it would make something of a little gift to the West Coast Fisheries. Although there was a great deal of force in the objection of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) that a considerable portion of this must go in materials, though not so much as he seemed to think, yet nothing he (Mr. Parnell) believed would do more to relieve the poverty and privations during the coming winter than affording such facilities to these fishing stations. In many instances they had no harbours, but only little boat slips. It would encourage the men to hold on and fight through the winter. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider this. He did not know whether it was the intention to finish the Bill that night; but if not he would ask leave to withdraw his clause for the present, in order that it might be fully considered in the interval between then and the next Sitting of the Committee; that the right hon. Gentleman might consider whether or not he would give, say £60,000, so as to make something of a little gift to these little harbours of the West Coast. This would not trench much on the Church Surplus, and it would be something out of the £1,500,000, which he felt sure would do a great deal of good. The question had been thoroughly inquired into, the harbours were well known. The Board of Works would know perfectly well where the works were to be constructed, and he felt sure it would be an enormous assistance.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, this amended proposal was really a most reasonable one. He was a little startled with the original proposal, and could not have supported it. He would remind the Committee that there was a Committee of the Board of Works, composed of at least one Member of that Board, one Fishery Commissioner, and one Naval Officer, sitting now in Dublin on this question of small piers and harbours, for which the Treasury gave £45,000, and charitable funds provide other £15,000, making together £60,000. Applications to that body had been very numerous, the greater part of them for sums of £30,000 and £40,000, and these grants would be of the greatest use. But the Commissioners could only make a selection from the applications; they could not take a great number, because their funds were limited. What could be more reasonable than to take from this Irish Fund, which the House disposed of as it wished, not as the Irish Representative wished, out of which the House, under the auspices of the Government, took £1,500,000. What more reasonable than to apply £60,000, for this purpose to supplement the sum of £60,000 already allocated? When the winter came, whether the year's harvest were good or bad, there would still be an immense deal of poverty in the country. Nobody must suppose, when they heard these tales of distress told to the world, that they described an exceptional state of things; they were the normal condition of many parts of the country, where a sum spent as proposed would be spent for the best purpose. Therefore he hoped the Chief Secretary for Ireland would not "put his foot down" and refuse the proposition, but that he would reconsider it between now and when the Bill was finally disposed of, whether he could not permit Ireland to have £60,000 out of her own money spent in this way.

THE CHAIRMAN asked, did the hon. Member for Cork City withdraw his Motion?

MR. PARNELL said, yes: he proposed to withdraw his clauses in order to give the right hon. Gentleman a little time for consideration, for a very short Notice had been given of them.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. VILLIERS STUART, in rising to move the following Clause:—

(Power to Board of Works to make advances to boards of guardians, &c.)

"It shall be lawful for the Board of Works to make advances to boards of guardians and municipal corporations in scheduled districts on the same terms as to landlords, to enable them to give employment as an alternative to gratuitous out-door relief to able-bodied labourers, and to make advances through the medium of boards of guardians to tenant farmers in scheduled districts to enable them to give employment on their farms in the making of permanent improvements," said, as a large proportion of Irish distress was created by want of employment, of course the obvious means of relieving that distress would be to afford employment. That was the principle which the late Government had recognized in granting the loans to landowners. That was a good measure so far as it went; but it did not go far enough, because it did not sufficiently diffuse the employment given. Only the area immediately surrounding the estate upon which the loan was expended derived any benefit, the district beyond remaining untouched by it. Labourers could not come from their homes a distance of four or five miles for work, returning again when the day's work was over. What was wanted was a measure which should be the means of diffusing the employment; and he ventured to submit that no better means could be devised for doing that thoroughly than by advances to tenant farmers to enable them to make improvements on their holdings, making the Board of Guardians the intermediaries for these advances. There was a precedent for such a measure in the Seeds Loans, and the Bill which was introduced for that purpose last Session. Of course, there was the question of security; but in the Seeds Loans this presented no great difficulty, and the difficulties would be more easily met in the case of loans to large farmers than was the case in the Seeds Loans, which included an infinite number of petty loans to small cottiers. There would be no difficulty in reaching the tenant farmers through the means of the Board of Guardians, and also in taking sufficient security. Of course, the Board of Guardians were the natural and proper machinery for relieving distress; they would be thoroughly acquainted with the circumstances of every man in the Union; they could put their finger on him at once; they knew which farmer was solvent and which was not; in fact, no more capable machinery could be employed or any more immediately available. There they were available at once, and he thought that relief could not be more carefully administered than through the medium of the Board of Guardians. The Government proposal was to confine the loans to these bodies for purposes of out-door relief; but the object of his Amendment was to enable the Boards to give not only outdoor relief, but to give employment, and to have a discretion; for Poor Law Guardians well knew the demoralizing effect of giving out-door relief. The labouring men were perfectly conscious of that themselves, for he heard deputations of them say—"We do not want charity; we want employment to earn an honest subsistence for ourselves and our families." And there was no doubt that was by far the best means of meeting distress without unnecessary delay. At the present time the Boards of Guardians were not empowered to give employment; they could only give out-door relief; and he had often heard Guardians complain during the last winter of the demoralizing effect of the mode of relief, and that if they only had the power to give employment it would be an immense benefit. He hoped the Government would think favourably of his proposal, which was—

So far as that went, the Chief Secretary for Ireland had stated his unwillingness to extend the term of repayment beyond 12 years. Yet he hoped he might be willing to extend the term beyond 12 years, because he knew in the case of baronial sessions what an obstacle this had been in preventing ratepayers availing themselves of the loans. He hoped the Chief Secretary would see his way to making the term a little more near the condition attaching to loans to landlords; and if he saw objections to extending the term to so long as 35 years, yet he might extend it to 25 years. If he would do that he would be adding immensely to the boon he was bestowing. He then proceeded to move the first of the two clauses of which he had given Notice.

New Clause (Power to Board of Works to make advances to boards of guardians, &c.) brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."—(Mr. Villiers Stuart.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, one reason for objecting to the clause was that he did not know that there was the money to meet the object to which it was directed. The £1,500,000 would be pretty well swept up by the several charges put upon it. In addition to that, he thought this proposal was made at the beginning of the year, as an alternative mode of relief. It was not then adopted, and it was not too late, as a means of meeting the necessities of the time between now and the harvest. They were within five or six weeks of the harvest, and the clause would require at least two or three weeks to come into operation. He did not think it would be possible to change the operation of their machinery now, even supposing his hon. Friend's idea was the best. Whether it was the best or not, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) did not say; but he did not think it was possible now to make the change. He hoped his hon. Friend would not press the Amendment. It would appear to be a matter that deserved a thorough consideration, if brought forward earlier; but now, certainly, it was too late to bring it forward.

MR. FINIGAN said, as it was a very late hour, and it was agreed that this was an important new clause, he thought the Committee could not do better than close the Sitting, and he would move that the Chairman do now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Finigan.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, there was only that clause, and just one or two others, and he could hardly suppose those would be pressed. Of course, if they led to a long debate it would be useless to prolong the Sitting; but he did hope it would be felt that it was too late now to introduce the clause.

COLONEL COLTHURST also ventured to ask the hon. Member for Waterford County (Mr. Villiers Stuart) not to press the clause. He did so, because in February the hon. Gentleman had moved an Amendment to enable advances to be made to Guardians and Municipal Corporations on the same terms as to landlords, for the purpose of giving employment, instead of gratuitous relief. But the Amendment was then rejected, and the hon. Member must see it was too late to hope to carry it.

MR. PARNELL did not think the clause, as moved, would be found of a workable description. In order to set it in motion, some scheme would have to be provided. At all events, the outlines of the scheme would have to be embodied in a set of clauses, for it would be quite impossible to set in motion the clause as it stood. He had been thinking about the best means of meeting the object of the clause, and had intended, if it had not been so late in the season, if the urgency had not been so great, and if they had not had other concessions of a valuable character from the right hon. Gentleman, he had intended to move a set of clauses in the Bill which would have enabled the Committee, at all events, to discuss the subject properly. However, he did not wish to detain the Committee with the clauses he had proposed to move. He would have constituted the county surveyor to assist, in conjunction with the Poor Law Boards, in the machinery for carrying into effect the provisions of the clause. He would have proposed that power should be given to Boards of Guardians to make advances to occupiers of land, and that they should borrow money, to be so advanced on the security of the rates, and that the money should be recovered from occupiers in the shape of rates. Therefore, this money would be the first charge on their holdings. He would propose that the county surveyor should be appointed as the authority for checking the Poor Law Boards in their allocation of the advances. That would have given the county surveyor the veto, as regarded any work proposed. He had the clauses there; but he did not propose to read them, for he had abandoned all intention of moving them some time ago. But, in that way, a simple machinery would be provided for carrying into effect the object of the hon. Member for Waterford County (Mr. Villiers Stuart), the county surveyor acting as a check on the Poor Law Board, as to the work to be undertaken. But now, as the season had got so late, it would be useless for immediate relief; and as he was assured that, should the distress continue next winter, the Chief Secretary for Ireland intended to adopt sweeping measures to cope with it, then there would be an opportunity of raising the question again. He did not see the slightest practical use in persevering with the clause now.

MR. W. E. FORSTER trusted the Motion for reporting Progress would be withdrawn. He was thankful to the Committee for having sat so long, and hoped soon to relieve them from further effort.

MR. BIGGAR really thought they ought to report Progress. There was no ground for going on longer, and if they wanted to go to church at all they had better get to bed. He believed the clause of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Villiers Stuart) though, perhaps, not couched in the proper form, still did contain a valuable principle. Amendments might be found to it, and certainly he thought the Committee should consider them. As to the argument of the hon. Member for Cork City, that this subject had received a discussion in the last Parliament, and should not, therefore, be discussed now, he (Mr. Biggar) would only say that the present Parliament represented popular ideas and interests which its predecessor did not, and he thought it obligatory on a so-called Liberal Government to give the opportunity of another discussion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, if he went to church on the morrow, he should do so with a clearer conscience if he first got the Bill through Committee. He thought the hon. Gentleman would see that this was really not a remarkable clause, and that it was too late in the history of the distress to bring this clause in now. If they had another bad harvest, they would have to consider this and much more besides. He hoped also that the Motion to report Progress would not be persevered with. They were within a short time of going through all the clauses; and he had always found that a Committee having once got to work appreciated the convenience of not leaving off until they reached a point for making a clear division of their labours.

MR. VILLIERS STUART expressed his unwillingness to withdraw his Motion for the insertion of the new clause.

MR. PARNELL said, it might be left until the time came for dealing with the clause of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan). That was the only other important clause on the Paper with the exception of the "Suspension of Ejectments" Clause in the name of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), which he (Mr. Parnell) thought had better be left to be moved as an Amendment to the Government Land Bill. So far as he could see, the only important part of the Business remaining was the clause of his hon. Friend; but, of course, if a discussion was raised upon that, they ought not to go on that night.

MR. FINIGAN said, why he moved to report Progress was because when they asked for grants for fishery piers, they were told it would take so long that it would be useless for purposes of relief; and then when they asked for money for the tenant farmers, they were told it was too late for the relief of distress, although they had previously been told that some of the loans advanced to landlords would not be expended for two or three years. Really he could not understand which of these reasons to believe. It was simply because, to use a common expression, "things had got considerably mixed" in the Committee, that he moved to report Progress; but, in answer to the appeal of his hon. Leader, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. VILLIERS STUART said, he would now ask leave to withdraw the clause.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, the clause of which he had given Notice was not likely to provoke dissent. It was only to extend to the Local Government Board that which they had now to enforce, or require out-door relief to be given in certain districts up to the 31st December this year, to extend that power up to the 30th June next year. He therefore moved the insertion of the following clause:—

(Grant of out-door relief.)

"The Local Government Board shall, up to the thirtieth day of June one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, be entitled to authorise the grant of out-door relief in food and fuel, or either, by order for the time and subject to the power of revocation stated in section three of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880,' and the said section three shall be read and construed in all respects as if the said thirtieth day of June one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one had been there inserted, instead of the thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and eighty."

New Clause (Grant of out-door relief) brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."—(Colonel Colthurst.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was reasonable that the clause should correspond with the other portions of the Bill which ran into next Session; and, therefore, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would make the date March 1st, instead of June 30th, he would accept the clause.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he would agree to the Amendment, and would accordingly move the substitution of the date March 1st for June 30th.

Amendment of proposed New Clause agreed to.

Clause, as amended, read a second time, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

MR. SYNAN said, he had a new clause to propose, which, unless accepted by the Government, might lead to a long discussion; and, if it would be more convenient, he was willing to let it stand for discussion among the postponed clauses. He was quite prepared to move it now. It was a clause which was intended to amend the 9th clause of the Bill of last

Session. It was contained in the Bill as it left the House of Commons, but was rejected in the House of Lords. The clause was as follows:—

“Whenever by any award or otherwise the rent of any tenant shall be increased by reason or in respect of any works executed on his holding under the Relief of Distress, Ireland, Act, 1880, then, and in every such case, the works so executed shall, so far as such increase shall be paid by such tenant or his successor in title, be deemed to be improvements made by such tenant within the meaning of the fourth section of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870.”

It was admitted that the money was given out of the Church Surplus Fund, not for the benefit of the landlords, but for the purpose of relieving distress in Ireland, and, indirectly, for the purpose of promoting the agricultural interest of the country. Under the Act as it stood, by an Amendment of his (Mr. Synan's), the landlord was prevented, if he had an award for raising rent, from charging the tenant more under that award than he paid himself; but that Amendment would not prevent a bad landlord from serving a notice to quit, and evicting his tenant, unless the tenant consented to pay a greater rent. For the purpose of taking that power out of the hands of the bad landlord, this new clause came in to supplement the other clause, so that if a tenant were disturbed in the enjoyment of his holding he should be paid the value of his improvements, as far as he had paid the instalments upon them, but no farther. If he had paid increased rent he was entitled to the value of improvements, so far as that increased rent went. The property of the tenant was not protected unless some such arrangement were made. Probably three-fourths, or even nine-tenths, of the Irish landlords would be content with the award, and would regard themselves as well paid by having their rents well secured. Under those circumstances, he put it to the Government whether they were prepared to accept the clause. It was accepted by the previous House of Commons and rejected by the House of Lords.

New Clause (Definition of improvements under S. 4 of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870) brought up, and read a first time.

Mr. Synan

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Synan.)

SIR H. HERVEY BRUCE thought there was no great objection to the principle of the clause, because the tenant who had been paying interest on his outlay ought to receive the benefit of it; but he could not accept the wording of the clause, because there was no appeal. It said “that the rent of any tenant shall be increased by reason.” It did not say who was to decide.

MR. SYNAN said, it was previously expressed in the clause “by any award or otherwise.”

SIR H. HERVEY BRUCE said, the wording should be more clear as to the tenancy that was to be benefited. If he read it aright, a tenant for one year would be benefited by that use; and if another tenant came in for a year or so, he also would be benefited. Some words should be inserted to limit the operation of the Bill to tenancies of a certain period.

MR. GIBSON thought the hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir H. Hervey Bruce) was perfectly right in the point he had taken. A tenant might have the enjoyment for 15 or 20 years, until the improvements exhausted; and then a County Court Judge, under this clause, might award him the full value. There was a clause in the Land Act to the effect that the Judge should take into consideration the enjoyment that the tenant had had; and he was sure the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) did not wish to withdraw that from his consideration.

MR. SYNAN quite agreed with that; but it was met by the words—

“Shall be deemed to be improvements made by such tenant within the meaning of the fourth section of ‘The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870.’”

MR. GIBSON thought it would not apply to all tenants, but only those existing at the passing of the Land Act.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, this was a matter upon which it was necessary to consider, not only the words of the clause, but what had already been done. He was in favour of the clause when it was originally brought in. He thought that in its general meaning it was perfectly fair and equitable; and his only doubt about it would have been whether they had any right, at that time, to import any fresh condition into the contract by putting the landlord under a fresh obligation to the tenant. His difficulty was removed when the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) stated that he saw no objection to the spirit of it; and, therefore, he was quite willing to accept the Amendment, subject to the possible alteration which had been suggested.

MR. GIBSON said, he must discharge himself from any misunderstanding. He only came into the House when the hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir H. Hervey Bruce) was speaking, and rose at once to apply himself to the matter he heard going on. The clause was open, no doubt, to objections; but he preferred taking the matter as far as he could without objections. He would consider the matter carefully between that time and Report; and, of course, he reserved to himself the full right of making any objection on Report.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Postponed Clauses 3 and 4.

MR. PARNELL said, before coming to those clauses, there was an important point to be settled in reference to the Seeds Act. He believed the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster) undertook to bring up a new clause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he undertook to do so on Report, as far as he could recollect.

MR. PARNELL said, there was also the hon. Member for Limerick's (Mr. Synan's) clause as to limitation of time, and his (Mr. Parnell's) own little matter about the £60,000. He supposed the right hon. Gentleman did not intend to finish the Committee that night; and, therefore, he would be content to allow the three questions he had named to remain until the Committee resumed. He, therefore, now moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not wish to ask the Committee to proceed any further now.

MR. PARNELL inquired whether it would be possible to move any other clauses when the Committee resumed?

THE CHAIRMAN replied, not in Committee; but on the Report.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

House resumed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

MR. PARNELL said, it was only 20 minutes past 12, and he thought they might go on with the Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill, and take a step in that; and there was also the Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Bill. They were both opposed Orders; and if they had not an opportunity of taking them now, they might not be able to get them any other night.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Government clearly pledged themselves that nothing should be taken at that Sitting but the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill, and they were certainly bound by their guarantee to hon. Members who were not now present, and must abide by it.

MR. CALLAN appealed to hon. Gentlemen who wished to proceed not to persist in that idea. He was as anxious as they were for the measures which had been mentioned; but the House was honourably bound, and every individual Member who assented to the undertaking of the Government was bound by it. Although he did not wish to speak against proceeding with an Irish Bill, he certainly should vote with the Government on that occasion. But he hoped hon. Members opposite would not place himself or others in the false position of voting against Bills in which they were interested. He appealed to them not to oppose the adjournment of the House.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 22: Majority 21.—(Div. List, No. 41.)

The House was adjourned accordingly at half after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

ARMY EDUCATION—LITERARY AND PHYSICAL COMPETITIONS—REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE.

OBSERVATIONS.

EARL FORTESCUE, in rising to call attention to the Report of the Joint Committee of the War Office and the Civil Service Commissioners on supplementing the literary examinations for the Army by physical competition, said: I am very glad that I complied with the wishes of my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Lansdowne), some months ago, and postponed bringing on the question which I have the honour of now submitting to your Lordships; for since that time great changes have taken place. A new Secretary of State for War has been appointed, and I have the advantage of bringing under his notice, through my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State, views which I had repeatedly brought in vain under the consideration of the late Secretary of State for War. Not that I should have despaired of ultimately convincing him; because some 40 years of Parliamentary life have taught me that, however resolute the opposition, and however positive the declarations of Ministers may be against a measure, if it is founded on sound principles, is conformable to common sense, and has the support of competent practical authority, it will sooner or later be carried—indeed, I have not seldom seen measures carried by the very Ministers who had before most strongly denounced them. As I think that supplementing the present purely literary and scientific examinations for commissions in what may be called the non-Scientific Corps of the Army is sound in principle and conformable to common sense, and I know that it is strongly recommended by high practical authorities, both civil and military, and unofficially by almost every officer of experience with whom it has been my fortune to converse on the subject, I venture sanguinely to hope that this great practical improvement will be extended to the candidates seeking commissions in the Cavalry and Infantry, as it has long been partially applied to candidates seeking commissions in the Artillery and Engineers. It should be remembered that this recognition of the principle in the case of the two Scientific Corps is all the more valuable because the system of competitive examinations for commissions in them grew up gradually to meet the requirements of the Service; and was not in any way the result of popular pressure from without, as the adoption of competitive examinations for the Cavalry and Infantry must be allowed to have been to a certain degree, however strong may have been the conscientious convictions of its superiority over Purchase in those who carried it into effect. I must, therefore, still hold the new system in its present shape decidedly crude and imperfect; though, after the noble Lord's (Viscount Cardwell's) assurances, I do not doubt much consideration was bestowed upon it. To show the superiority of the old over the new system, riding, which, though indispensable from the first in every Horse Artillery officer, and, after attaining a certain rank, in every Field Artillery officer, may practically hardly be required for years together in an Engineer officer employed upon works, such as many of those which I have seen at Malta, Corfu, and Gibraltar, yet counts for a number of marks in the Woolwich examinations. But riding is not more indispensable from the first in a Horse Artillery than a Cavalry officer, nor, I believe, more in a Field Artillery than in an Infantry officer for a certain number of years; while, as I have shown, it is decidedly less so in many Engineer officers. Yet Cavalry and Infantry officers can only obtain, in competing for commissions, marks for literary acquirements, or for an amount of arithmetical and mathematical knowledge, desirable, no doubt, in itself for us all, but professionally requisite for the Engineer and Artillery officer to quite a different extent from what it is in the Infantry or Cavalry officer. This I may confidently say, if the system be, as I have been told and believe experience has shown it to be, good for the two Scientific Corps, much more must it be so for the Cavalry and Infantry. Let us have, at all events, some consistency and some regard to principle on this question. But we shall be told again, I doubt not, by the Under Secretary of State for War and the illustrious Duke, that the physical vigour and activity of the officers entering under the present system are, in general, most satisfactory. I do not doubt it on the average; though I must observe that this is not the consequence of any encouragement given to the development of these qualities by Her Majesty's Government, but rather to habits, traditions, and sympathies yet lingering—and, I hope, long yet to linger in moderation—in the class from which the officers of our Army are principally derived; to a love of sport and athletic exercises, denounced, indeed, by some Members of the Government and many of its supporters, but countenanced by others, and among them by my noble Friend the Lord President, who, conscientiously diligent in the discharge of his duties, during his seasons of relaxation, Gaudet equis canibusque et—I will omit the epithet as inappropriate to him—et gramine campi. But was the new system adopted in consequence of the proved general incapacity of our officers entering or promoted by Purchase? Will anyone stand up and declare that they were not in general highly efficient; that under their command and leading the British Army habitually disgraced itself; that, to say nothing of the glories of the Peninsula and Waterloo, the British officers in the Crimea and in the Indian Mutiny, in China and at the Red River, entering and promoted under that Purchase system not then superseded, did not, under a tropical sun and in frost and snow, North and South, East and West, maintain nobly the honour of the British flag? If this argument of the officers under the present system being good is to exclude any attempt at improvement, what justification was there for the introduction of competitive examinations, which Mr. Cardwell proposed, and I, amongst others, supported? The ground was simply this—that though the officers under the Purchase system had shown themselves generally good, there were solid reasons for believing that under the competitive system they, on the average, would be better. It was on this ground alone that I, in this House and elsewhere, year after year pressed for an improvement in the present system of competitive examinations for commissions. It was to ascertain whether it was expedient that the present literary examination for the Army should be supplemented by physical competition that the Joint Committee were appointed. It was on this point that they reported; and it is to their unanimous Report, based upon careful inquiry and the opinions of most competent witnesses, that I venture again to call your Lordships' attention. Of the military Members of the Committee I will say no more than this—that their appointment upon it ought to be taken to be conclusive as to their eminent qualifications. But of the civilian Members of the Joint Committee, I will remind you that at their head appeared the honoured name of Lord Hampton, with whom I had the pleasure of some acquaintance during the many years I sat with him in the other House of Parliament. He had filled, among other high Cabinet Offices, that of Secretary of State for the War Department, and, therefore, was fully acquainted with our military administration. But, more than that, his sympathies had always been strongly and markedly with education, and he had shown himself on that subject much in advance of most Members of both political Parties. I cannot but recall, with melancholy satisfaction, that the very last time I saw him I had some conversation with him, as I had often before, upon this very question; and he kindly promised me his hearty aid once more upon it—aid which would have powerfully supplemented my own feeble advocacy of a thoroughly good cause. Sir George Dasent's eminent ability and high culture are too well known to require my dwelling on them; and Mr. Walrond, though he enjoys a less extended reputation, is most highly spoken of by those who know him. These are the high authorities who unanimously agreed to the Report which

I hold in my hand. But they did not base it merely on their own opinion. They inquired as to the views of 21 heads of the most eminent large educational establishments. Of these 21 highly qualified witnesses, only 3 of whom could be supposed to have any military prejudice, 15 were favourable to the additional examinations proposed, and of these 9 were most strongly so, and among them the Commandant of the Staff College, General Napier, and the Governor of Sandhurst, Sir Archibald Alison; 3 only were strongly opposed to it, among whom was the Governor of Woolwich, Sir John Adye. Of the remaining 3, 2 wrote rather doubtfully, and 1 was in favour of a qualifying, instead of a competitive, examination. The letters of these high educational authorities, 18 of them ex hypothesi of high literary attainments, are given in the Appendix to the Report; and I must say the superiority in argument of most of the 15 favourable ones was as striking to me as their superiority in number to the 3 unfavourable ones; while the careful consideration of the whole subject, its practical difficulties and the way of overcoming them, the moderation and excellent good sense of the whole Report, must, I think, strike everyone who reads it. They say—

“On the general question of the proposed addition we apprehend there can be little difference of opinion. Whether regard be had to the direct utility of physical vigour in the discharge of military duties, or to its importance as connected with valuable mental and moral qualities, we entertain no doubt that some account should be taken of it in these examinations, provided the value set upon it be not such as to depreciate superior intellectual ability, that proper tests can be agreed upon, and that satisfactory means can be found of applying those tests.”

I have heard it said that as there are some 600 or 700 candidates for commissions at each examination, the number of candidates for the physical competition would render the scheme unworkable. But the Report proves that the Committee had anticipated and satisfactorily met that objection. Further on, they say that in competitions—

“It is commonly found that below the degree of superior merit, and on each side of the line which separates the successful from the unsuccessful, there occurs a long list of candidates showing a comparative level of mediocrity; and we consider that no undue weight will be given to physical excellence if it be allowed practically to decide the question of success or failure among candidates of this class. . . . In these examinations, at which about 100 candidates are usually selected, the average difference between the 50th and the 150th is about 1,000 marks.”

It is clear, from their Report, that the Joint Committee contemplated for these physical examinations, which were to be purely voluntary, rules which would certainly keep the number of competitors in this supplementary examination well below 100—a number which I cannot for a moment believe it would be found practically difficult to examine as proposed by the Joint Committee. And, now, do not let it be said that I am a wild enthusiast about athletics, and at all indifferent to book-learning. I think that, as regards athletic games and exercises, the fashion at present runs to a mischievous and absurd excess. The enormous crowd, for instance—very different from that in my earlier days—of late years assembled to see 22 boys play a game at cricket, affords, in my opinion, a ridiculous, not to say humiliating, spectacle. I have done much more and worked much harder for many years in the promotion of book-learning. I had offered an annual prize for modern languages at Harrow years before I gave some champion cups for excellence in various games and athletic exercises to be annually contended for there. I was one of the founders, and have been one of the trustees and directors, for more than 20 years, of the Devon County School, the first middle-class county school established in England, and have taken an active part ever since both in that and in Cavendish College at Cambridge. It is my deep interest in the Army, and my desire to see its efficiency promoted, which alone have prompted me, year after year, to bring the subject before your Lordships. I supported by my vote the abolition of Purchase. The competitive system substituted, professed to be based on the sound principle that, as the number of candidates for commissions greatly exceeded the number of commissions to be disposed of, it was desirable for the country to secure the best of those candidates for the service. But, then, that principle has been very imperfectly carried out. And though, not at all thanks to that system, I quite allow that under it, as under the superseded Purchase system, pretty satisfactory results are obtained, I contend—

and in this I am supported by the concurrent opinion of almost every officer whom I have talked with on the subject, from Field Marshals down to subalterns, of the highest educational authorities, and; I must add, by the general common sense of the public—that a better system might be introduced, which would secure all the good results of the present system without any of its inherent disadvantages, of which examples from time to time, though, I admit, not very flagrant ones, are seen. Mr. Cardwell said, “Let us have the most learned officers we can get, provided they pass a medical examination;” which I know, on excellent authority, was some time ago far from a severe one. I say, Let us have the best men all round, intellectually and physically, as far as competitive examination can enable us to test them. And do not let us be told that, if riding is one of the subjects, injustice will be done to the sons of parents who cannot afford to mount their sons. The object is not to secure a good race, but the best winners. As I said once before, in taking servants ourselves, we look to their qualifications for the work they have to do; we do not ask what facilities for obtaining the requisite training they had enjoyed. As there may be, and in past times has been, an unfair preference for favoured families in military as well as civil appointments, so there may be an unfair preference for less qualified over better qualified candidates for the Army under a false plea of fair play. All we have to look to is obtaining the best article we can for our money, without giving any unfair protection to inferior articles, because they happen to be of the middle instead of the higher class. A fair field and no favour is the sound principle. If riding, which is a very important one, be, which I do not believe, such a very costly accomplishment to acquire, let the country have the advantage of officers who have become efficient in it at no expense to the Treasury. Do not us have in these days a disguised Protection for inferiority in qualifications, a clap-trap favouritism to the relatives of middle-class constituents. I have been for 40 years a Free Trader, and I protest against Protection to high or low, middle class or wage class. In conclusion, I will very shortly recapitulate the argument in favour of the adoption of the Report of the Joint Committee. I protest against this imperfect scheme of yesterday—a quite recent innovation—being treated as if it were a time-honoured institution, not to be touched without hazard by any innovating hand, when the secular system of Purchase, though it had worked well, had been superseded by the competitive system, because that was expected to work better. Secondly, I protest against the bugbear of hopeless impracticability being raised against the additional examination recommended by the Joint Committee, when they indicate so plainly how easy and practicable would be the means of carrying it out with regard to the limited number of candidates which would have to be dealt with. Thirdly, I protest against the ignorant talk of literary and educational enthusiasts about the supreme importance of book-learning and high intellectual culture, and the unimportance of physical strength and activity in officers—placing a knowledge of Chaucer above skill in riding, and a knowledge of Lucretius above swimming. Fourthly, I protest against a bounty being given at the expense of the country to the less wealthy in the shape of the admission to the Army of candidates of their class giving less promise of future efficiency as officers, in the place of candidates from a richer class giving greater promise of efficiency as officers. Let the country get the best officers it can for its money; not merely the most learned, but the best officers all round—as far as these can be tested and selected by examination.

LORD DORCHESTER said, he had great pleasure in supporting the views of his noble Friend who had just sat down (Earl Fortescue). The subject to which his noble Friend had called attention was of the utmost importance and deserved every consideration at the hands of their Lordships, and he believed that there was no tribunal better qualified to give an opinion on the subject than their Lordships’ House. In addition to the Report to which his noble Friend had alluded, there was another, the Report of Lord Airey’s Committee on the Organization of the Army, which he regretted had not been presented. That Report was sure to ooze out through the newspapers. He thought it ought to be produced.

EARL GRANVILLE rose to Order, and suggested to the noble Lord that it was irregular to allude to a Report not before the House, and which was on a subject not before the House.

LORD DORCHESTER said, he accepted the noble Earl's apology. [Much laughter.] He begged pardon—he bowed to his reproof; but he might add that he believed the Report to which he had alluded would throw much light on the matter. He begged to support his noble Friend (Earl Fortescue) in every observation he had made. Good riding was, of course, indispensable in the Cavalry; but he held, from his own experience of 25 years, that it was highly useful to Infantry officers and to Naval officers also. [Laughter.] He repeated that it was useful for Naval officers, who occasionally might have to ride with despatches across a strange country. It was a well-known fact that a distinguished member of the Naval Profession had obtained great credit in the Crimea for carrying despatches on horseback in an enemy's country.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, that as his noble Friend (Earl Fortescue) had alluded to the Report of the Joint Committee, he wished to explain, as representing the Civil Service Commission, that the Commissioners saw no paramount difficulties in the way of a physical competition in the case of candidates for the Army; but, at the same time, they felt that unless they should be adequately supported in that view not only by the authorities at the Horse Guards and the War Office, but also by public opinion outside their Lordships' House, no steps ought to be taken by them. If they were asked to do so, they were perfectly ready to carry out such alterations in the examinations for entrance to the Army as would secure a mixture of physical competition with other subjects now required of candidates. The inquiry originated in this way. On the 20th of December, 1877, Lord Hampton made a private suggestion on this subject to the Secretary of State for War. Soon after the Civil Service Commissioners, through their Secretary, wrote to the Director General of Military Education, assenting to a conference on the subject, as suggested by Mr. Gathorne Hardy, the then Secretary of State for War. In February, 1878, the Joint Committee met in Cannon Row—Lord Hampton, Sir George Dasent, and Mr. Walrond, as Civil Service Commissioners; the Director General of Military Education (Lieutenant General Beauchamp Walker), the Assistant Military Secretary (Major General R. B. Hawley), and the Assistant Adjutant General (Colonel G. R. Greaves), representing the military authorities. Previously to making their Report, which they did on the 26th of April, 1878, the Joint Committee circulated questions on the subject of their inquiry to General W. C. E. Napier, Governor of the Royal Military College at Sandhurst; Major General Sir John Miller Adye, Governor of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich; Major General Sir Archibald Alison, Governor of the Staff College at Aldershot; and to the head masters of these 18 public schools—Charterhouse, Cheltenham, Clifton, Dulwich, Eton, Harrow, Haileybury, Malvern, Marlborough, Merchant Taylor's, Repton, Rugby, Sherborne, St. Paul's, Westminster, Wellington College, Winchester, and Uppingham. He thought he was correct in saying that out of the replies received from the 21 military and civil authorities thus consulted, 14 were variously though not wholly favourable to the proposed scheme, and that while those distinguished persons who were favourable to it thought with the Joint Committee that there would be an advantage in having a physical as well as a literary examination, they, as well as the Joint Committee, were of opinion that the former ought not to be compulsory. The subjects recommended by the Joint Committee for physical competition were riding, walking, running, leaping, swimming, and gymnastics; but they recommended that the candidate should only be at liberty to select three out of the six subjects, and that the maximum number of marks for them should be 1,200. The Report of the Committee was sent in on the 26th of April, 1878, and on the 28th of the same month another conference was held between the Civil Service Commissioners and the War Office Representatives; but nothing definite was agreed upon, the Civil Service Commissioners not regarding themselves as having any authority to undertake examinations under the proposed scheme, except in the circumstances he had already indicated. There was this Memorandum—

“At a meeting held at the Office of the Civil Service Commission on May 28, 1878, in pursuance of a letter from the Director General of Military Education, dated the 24th of that month—present, Lord Hampton, Lieutenant General Walker, Sir George Dasent, Mr. Walrond—General Walker having, after some preliminary discussion, suggested that the Commissioners should put themselves in communication with such persons as they might think fit with the view of settling the method of carrying out the proposed physical competitions for the Army, the Commissioners stated that they did not regard themselves as having authority at present to take any action in the matter, but that they would be quite willing to undertake the arrangement and superintendence of such examinations if informed that it was the wish of the Secretary of State for War and His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief that they should do so, and General Walker was requested to report to His Royal Highness accordingly.”

From the 28th of May, 1878, nothing more was done in the matter till the 28th of February, 1879, when his noble Friend brought it under the notice of their Lordships' House. On that occasion, it appeared that the Commander-in-Chief and the then Under Secretary of State for War (Viscount Bury) were not favourable to the proposed alterations. The Under Secretary of State said—

“It was true that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War was at first disposed to carry out the recommendation of the Committee; but on considering it, and taking the opinion of military authorities, he found that difficulties of an insurmountable nature presented themselves against giving effect to it, and therefore he would not advise the Government or Parliament to endeavour to carry it out.”—[3 Hansard, cxxliii. 1951.]

The illustrious Duke said, in the same debate—

“He felt strongly with noble Lords who had addressed the House; but he must honestly confess that when he came to the question of bringing the proposed system into practice, he found it would be utterly impossible to do so—he did not himself see how it could be done; and two distinguished officers, who signed the Report, being present when the question was further discussed, could not give any plan as to how their own recommendation could be carried out. If the recommendation should be adopted, it would change the whole present system of education, and changing the whole system was an extremely grave matter. . . . There might be very good grounds for doing this, and possibly there might be found a reason for combining the two things; but, he and his noble Friend at the War Office having given every consideration to the matter, he did not see how it was possible to combine the two things. . . . The other day his representative, General Lyons, the Quartermaster General, went down to Sandhurst, and he said that he never saw a finer or a better set of young men than he saw there. . . . He (the Duke of Cambridge) himself had also been struck with the qualifications of the young men.”—[Ibid. 1592-3.]

After those two speeches, the Civil Service Commissioners did not think it right to take any step in the matter, though they were not opposed to the proposed changes, if the Horse Guards and the War Office authorities thought them desirable for the welfare of the Army. He (Viscount Enfield), however, believed he was correct in stating that the late Secretary for War and the Commander-in-Chief were opposed to any action being taken in the matter. For himself, he did not see how the scheme could be worked out. A better class of young men than they obtained at present could not be had. The Commissioners themselves deprecated the continually stirring up of this question, which only unsettled the minds of parents of candidates and of tutors, who did not know what alterations in the system of Army examinations might be contemplated. Besides, all history and all experience showed that it was quite possible to combine the highest military education and knowledge even with a somewhat deficient physical exterior. He begged to remind his noble Friend that Lord Macaulay, referring to the Battle of Neerwinden, mentioned—

“The hunchbacked dwarf who urged forward the fiery onset of France, and the asthmatic skeleton who covered the slow retreat of England.”

No doubt, physical qualifications were of great importance; but he thought that if the preliminary private medical examination which preceded the literary examination was fairly carried out, in all probability no officer physically incompetent could be admitted into the Army; and that if it were a real and a tolerably stringent one, the test of physical competence for entering the Army would be solved in, perhaps, a more satisfactory manner than by making the candidates run, jump, swim, or ride, as the noble Earl wished. At the same time, his Colleagues and himself were only anxious to meet the wishes of the military authorities and the public in a matter of such vital interest to the future

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—
(Mr. Finigan.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, there was only that clause, and just one or two others, and he could hardly suppose those would be pressed. Of course, if they led to a long debate it would be useless to prolong the Sitting; but he did hope it would be felt that it was too late now to introduce the clause.

COLONEL COLTHURST also ventured to ask the hon. Member for Waterford County (Mr. Villiers Stuart) not to press the clause. He did so, because in February the hon. Gentleman had moved an Amendment to enable advances to be made to Guardians and Municipal Corporations on the same terms as to landlords, for the purpose of giving employment, instead of gratuitous relief. But the Amendment was then rejected, and the hon. Member must see it was too late to hope to carry it.

MR. PARNELL did not think the clause, as moved, would be found of a workable description. In order to set it in motion, some scheme would have to be provided. At all events, the outlines of the scheme would have to be embodied in a set of clauses, for it would be quite impossible to set in motion the clause as it stood. He had been thinking about the best means of meeting the object of the clause, and had intended, if it had not been so late in the season, if the urgency had not been so great, and if they had not had other concessions of a valuable character from the right hon. Gentleman, he had intended to move a set of clauses in the Bill which would have enabled the Committee, at all events, to discuss the subject properly. However, he did not wish to detain the Committee with the clauses he had proposed to move. He would have constituted the county surveyor to assist, in conjunction with the Poor Law Boards, in the machinery for carrying into effect the provisions of the clause. He would have proposed that power should be given to Boards of Guardians to make advances to occupiers of land, and that they should borrow money, to be so advanced on the security of the rates, and that the money should be recovered from occupiers in the shape of rates. Therefore, this money would be the first charge on their holdings. He would propose that the county surveyor should be appointed as the authority for checking the Poor Law Boards in their allocation of the advances. That would have given the county surveyor the veto, as regarded any work proposed. He had the clauses there; but he did not propose to read them, for he had abandoned all intention of moving them some time ago. But, in that way, a simple machinery would be provided for carrying into effect the object of the hon. Member for Waterford County (Mr. Villiers Stuart), the county surveyor acting as a check on the Poor Law Board, as to the work to be undertaken. But now, as the season had got so late, it would be useless for immediate relief; and as he was assured that, should the distress continue next winter, the Chief Secretary for Ireland intended to adopt sweeping measures to cope with it, then there would be an opportunity of raising the question again. He did not see the slightest practical use in persevering with the clause now.

MR. W. E. FORSTER trusted the Motion for reporting Progress would be withdrawn. He was thankful to the Committee for having sat so long, and hoped soon to relieve them from further effort.

MR. BIGGAR really thought they ought to report Progress. There was no ground for going on longer, and if they wanted to go to church at all they had better get to bed. He believed the clause of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Villiers Stuart) though, perhaps, not couched in the proper form, still did contain a valuable principle. Amendments might be found to it, and certainly he thought the Committee should consider them. As to the argument of the hon. Member for Cork City, that this subject had received a discussion in the last Parliament, and should not, therefore, be discussed now, he (Mr. Biggar) would only say that the present Parliament represented popular ideas and interests which its predecessor did not, and he thought it obligatory on a so-called Liberal Government to give the opportunity of another discussion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, if he went to church on the morrow, he should do so with a clearer conscience if he first got the Bill through Committee. He thought the hon. Gentleman would see that this was really not a remarkable clause, and that it was too late in the history of the distress to bring this clause in now. If they had another bad harvest, they would have to consider this and much more besides. He hoped also that the Motion to report Progress would not be persevered with. They were within a short time of going through all the clauses; and he had always found that a Committee having once got to work appreciated the convenience of not leaving off until they reached a point for making a clear division of their labours.

MR. VILLIERS STUART expressed his unwillingness to withdraw his Motion for the insertion of the new clause.

MR. PARNELL said, it might be left until the time came for dealing with the clause of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan). That was the only other important clause on the Paper with the exception of the "Suspension of Ejectments" Clause in the name of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), which he (Mr. Parnell) thought had better be left to be moved as an Amendment to the Government Land Bill. So far as he could see, the only important part of the Business remaining was the clause of his hon. Friend; but, of course, if a discussion was raised upon that, they ought not to go on that night.

MR. FINIGAN said, why he moved to report Progress was because when they asked for grants for fishery piers, they were told it would take so long that it would be useless for purposes of relief; and then when they asked for money for the tenant farmers, they were told it was too late for the relief of distress, although they had previously been told that some of the loans advanced to landlords would not be expended for two or three years. Really he could not understand which of these reasons to believe. It was simply because, to use a common expression, "things had got considerably mixed" in the Committee, that he moved to report Progress; but, in answer to the appeal of his hon. Leader, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. VILLIERS STUART said, he would now ask leave to withdraw the clause.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, the clause of which he had given Notice was not likely to provoke dissent. It was only to extend to the Local Government Board that which they had now to enforce, or require out-door relief to be given in certain districts up to the 31st December this year, to extend that power up to the 30th June next year. He therefore moved the insertion of the following clause:—

(Grant of out-door relief.)

"The Local Government Board shall, up to the thirtieth day of June one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, be entitled to authorise the grant of out-door relief in food and fuel, or either, by order for the time and subject to the power of revocation stated in section three of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880,' and the said section three shall be read and construed in all respects as if the said thirtieth day of June one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one had been there inserted, instead of the thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and eighty."

New Clause (Grant of out-door relief) brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."—(Colonel Colthurst.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was reasonable that the clause should correspond with the other portions of the Bill which ran into next Session; and, therefore, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would make the date March 1st, instead of June 30th, he would accept the clause.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he would agree to the Amendment, and would accordingly move the substitution of the date March 1st for June 30th.

Amendment of proposed New Clause agreed to.

Clause, as amended, read a second time, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

MR. SYNAN said, he had a new clause to propose, which, unless accepted by the Government, might lead to a long discussion; and, if it would be more convenient, he was willing to let it stand for discussion among the postponed clauses. He was quite prepared to move it now. It was a clause which was intended to amend the 9th clause of the Bill of last

Session. It was contained in the Bill as it left the House of Commons, but was rejected in the House of Lords. The clause was as follows:—

“Whenever by any award or otherwise the rent of any tenant shall be increased by reason or in respect of any works executed on his holding under the Relief of Distress, Ireland, Act, 1880, then, and in every such case, the works so executed shall, so far as such increase shall be paid by such tenant or his successor in title, be deemed to be improvements made by such tenant within the meaning of the fourth section of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870.”

It was admitted that the money was given out of the Church Surplus Fund, not for the benefit of the landlords, but for the purpose of relieving distress in Ireland, and, indirectly, for the purpose of promoting the agricultural interest of the country. Under the Act as it stood, by an Amendment of his (Mr. Synan's), the landlord was prevented, if he had an award for raising rent, from charging the tenant more under that award than he paid himself; but that Amendment would not prevent a bad landlord from serving a notice to quit, and evicting his tenant, unless the tenant consented to pay a greater rent. For the purpose of taking that power out of the hands of the bad landlord, this new clause came in to supplement the other clause, so that if a tenant were disturbed in the enjoyment of his holding he should be paid the value of his improvements, as far as he had paid the instalments upon them, but no farther. If he had paid increased rent he was entitled to the value of improvements, so far as that increased rent went. The property of the tenant was not protected unless some such arrangement were made. Probably three-fourths, or even nine-tenths, of the Irish landlords would be content with the award, and would regard themselves as well paid by having their rents well secured. Under those circumstances, he put it to the Government whether they were prepared to accept the clause. It was accepted by the previous House of Commons and rejected by the House of Lords.

New Clause (Definition of improvements under S. 4 of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870) brought up, and read a first time.

Mr. Synan

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Synan.)

SIR H. HERVEY BRUCE thought there was no great objection to the principle of the clause, because the tenant who had been paying interest on his outlay ought to receive the benefit of it; but he could not accept the wording of the clause, because there was no appeal. It said “that the rent of any tenant shall be increased by reason.” It did not say who was to decide.

MR. SYNAN said, it was previously expressed in the clause “by any award or otherwise.”

SIR H. HERVEY BRUCE said, the wording should be more clear as to the tenancy that was to be benefited. If he read it aright, a tenant for one year would be benefited by that use; and if another tenant came in for a year or so, he also would be benefited. Some words should be inserted to limit the operation of the Bill to tenancies of a certain period.

MR. GIBSON thought the hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir H. Hervey Bruce) was perfectly right in the point he had taken. A tenant might have the enjoyment for 15 or 20 years, until the improvements exhausted; and then a County Court Judge, under this clause, might award him the full value. There was a clause in the Land Act to the effect that the Judge should take into consideration the enjoyment that the tenant had had; and he was sure the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) did not wish to withdraw that from his consideration.

MR. SYNAN quite agreed with that; but it was met by the words—

“Shall be deemed to be improvements made by such tenant within the meaning of the fourth section of ‘The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870.’”

MR. GIBSON thought it would not apply to all tenants, but only those existing at the passing of the Land Act.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, this was a matter upon which it was necessary to consider, not only the words of the clause, but what had already been done. He was in favour of the clause when it was originally brought in. He thought that in its general meaning it was perfectly fair and equitable; and his only doubt about it would have been whether they had any right, at that time, to import any fresh condition into the contract by putting the landlord under a fresh obligation to the tenant. His difficulty was removed when the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) stated that he saw no objection to the spirit of it; and, therefore, he was quite willing to accept the Amendment, subject to the possible alteration which had been suggested.

MR. GIBSON said, he must discharge himself from any misunderstanding. He only came into the House when the hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir H. Hervey Bruce) was speaking, and rose at once to apply himself to the matter he heard going on. The clause was open, no doubt, to objections; but he preferred taking the matter as far as he could without objections. He would consider the matter carefully between that time and Report; and, of course, he reserved to himself the full right of making any objection on Report.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Postponed Clauses 3 and 4.

MR. PARNELL said, before coming to those clauses, there was an important point to be settled in reference to the Seeds Act. He believed the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster) undertook to bring up a new clause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he undertook to do so on Report, as far as he could recollect.

MR. PARNELL said, there was also the hon. Member for Limerick's (Mr. Synan's) clause as to limitation of time, and his (Mr. Parnell's) own little matter about the £60,000. He supposed the right hon. Gentleman did not intend to finish the Committee that night; and, therefore, he would be content to allow the three questions he had named to remain until the Committee resumed. He, therefore, now moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not wish to ask the Committee to proceed any further now.

MR. PARNELL inquired whether it would be possible to move any other clauses when the Committee resumed?

THE CHAIRMAN replied, not in Committee; but on the Report.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

House resumed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. William Edward Forster.)

MR. PARNELL said, it was only 20 minutes past 12, and he thought they might go on with the Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill, and take a step in that; and there was also the Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Bill. They were both opposed Orders; and if they had not an opportunity of taking them now, they might not be able to get them any other night.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Government clearly pledged themselves that nothing should be taken at that Sitting but the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill, and they were certainly bound by their guarantee to hon. Members who were not now present, and must abide by it.

MR. CALLAN appealed to hon. Gentlemen who wished to proceed not to persist in that idea. He was as anxious as they were for the measures which had been mentioned; but the House was honourably bound, and every individual Member who assented to the undertaking of the Government was bound by it. Although he did not wish to speak against proceeding with an Irish Bill, he certainly should vote with the Government on that occasion. But he hoped hon. Members opposite would not place himself or others in the false position of voting against Bills in which they were interested. He appealed to them not to oppose the adjournment of the House.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 22: Majority 21.—(Div. List, No. 41.)

The House was adjourned accordingly at half after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

those clauses should not be postponed with an intention of quietly killing them afterwards. Of course, he could not object to their being killed, if they were to be killed; but he wanted it done in a proper fashion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he should like to make a suggestion to hon. Members who were interested in those clauses. He should be very glad to meet them, and to find out what alterations they thought should be made. Of course, he could not say beforehand that he would consent to those alterations. It was possible, however, that if hon. Members were in favour of those clauses, and could agree as to how they thought they should be placed before the Committee, they might be able to get them through without the difficulty which would evidently otherwise arise.

MR. A. MOORE thought the Committee should be satisfied with the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, who had made a very proper proposal. He only wished after what had been said by other hon. Gentlemen to put his opinion on record that those clauses were of the greatest possible value. His constituents were most anxious for them; and, putting aside questions as to machinery and so forth, he regarded the main principle as extremely valuable.

Question agreed to.

Clause 5 (Powers of Board of Works).

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, that in the absence of the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) he would move in page 3, line 13, to leave out "thirty" and insert "sixty." The object was to increase the sum proposed to be given for the purposes of fishery piers.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was out of Order for a private Member to move to increase the grant proposed to be given out of public moneys by this Bill. Such increase could only be proposed by a Minister of the Crown.

MR. W. E. FORSTER believed that was the case. He therefore begged to move that "forty-five" be put in the place of "thirty." When the latter sum was first decided upon, it seemed to him to be the sum required to build piers in the most distressed districts, and where they would do most good; but it had been found desirable to increase it to £45,000, in order that they might take advantage of all the money so generously granted by the Canadian Government. He did not expect hon. Members to say they were satisfied, and that that sum would meet the requirements of all the distressed districts; and however much might be proposed, he dared say they would feel justified in asking for more. But this was a considerable advance, and he believed it would do very great good.

Question, "That 'thirty' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That 'forty-five' be inserted."—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the right hon. Gentleman told the Committee that, in the opinion of the Government, £30,000 represented what would be likely to be wanted before they had any information, or before they took any steps to meet the grant from Canada. [Mr. W. E. Forster explained that he did not say that.] He could only say that if the Government had information about the Canadian grant they must have been sadly wanting in arithmetical ability not to have arrived at a fairer figure.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, what he said was that they fixed the sum of £30,000 at first, because they thought it would meet those piers for which there was the most urgent necessity.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR did not wish to misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman; but it did seem strange to him that when the Canadians had given £10,000, the Government should have proposed to give only £30,000. At any rate, they knew that from outside sources there was a fund of £15,000 now available, which, treated as a fourth of the entire expenditure, would leave a balance of £45,000 to be supplied from Imperial funds. That was supposing that no contribution whatever was to come from Ireland for fishery purposes. It was supposed, in fact, that the example of the Canadians would not be met by anyone in Ireland. It seemed to him that it was an entirely gratuitous assumption on the part of the Government; and he wished to point out that this clause, and, in his opinion, the whole Bill, was a thorough sham. The Bill, in its entirety, was a sham, and any portion of it was a sham. It was a in the Seeds Loans this presented no great difficulty, and the difficulties would be more easily met in the case of loans to large farmers than was the case in the Seeds Loans, which included an infinite number of petty loans to small cottiers. There would be no difficulty in reaching the tenant farmers through the means of the Board of Guardians, and also in taking sufficient security. Of course, the Board of Guardians were the natural and proper machinery for relieving distress; they would be thoroughly acquainted with the circumstances of every man in the Union; they could put their finger on him at once; they knew which farmer was solvent and which was not; in fact, no more capable machinery could be employed or any more immediately available. There they were available at once, and he thought that relief could not be more carefully administered than through the medium of the Board of Guardians. The Government proposal was to confine the loans to these bodies for purposes of out-door relief; but the object of his Amendment was to enable the Boards to give not only outdoor relief, but to give employment, and to have a discretion; for Poor Law Guardians well knew the demoralizing effect of giving out-door relief. The labouring men were perfectly conscious of that themselves, for he heard deputations of them say—"We do not want charity; we want employment to earn an honest subsistence for ourselves and our families." And there was no doubt that was by far the best means of meeting distress without unnecessary delay. At the present time the Boards of Guardians were not empowered to give employment; they could only give out-door relief; and he had often heard Guardians complain during the last winter of the demoralizing effect of the mode of relief, and that if they only had the power to give employment it would be an immense benefit. He hoped the Government would think favourably of his proposal, which was—

So far as that went, the Chief Secretary for Ireland had stated his unwillingness to extend the term of repayment beyond 12 years. Yet he hoped he might be willing to extend the term beyond 12 years, because he knew in the case of baronial sessions what an obstacle this had been in preventing ratepayers availing themselves of the loans. He hoped the Chief Secretary would see his way to making the term a little more near the condition attaching to loans to landlords; and if he saw objections to extending the term to so long as 35 years, yet he might extend it to 25 years. If he would do that he would be adding immensely to the boon he was bestowing. He then proceeded to move the first of the two clauses of which he had given Notice.

New Clause (Power to Board of Works to make advances to boards of guardians, &c.) brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."—(Mr. Villiers Stuart.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, one reason for objecting to the clause was that he did not know that there was the money to meet the object to which it was directed. The £1,500,000 would be pretty well swept up by the several charges put upon it. In addition to that, he thought this proposal was made at the beginning of the year, as an alternative mode of relief. It was not then adopted, and it was not too late, as a means of meeting the necessities of the time between now and the harvest. They were within five or six weeks of the harvest, and the clause would require at least two or three weeks to come into operation. He did not think it would be possible to change the operation of their machinery now, even supposing his hon. Friend's idea was the best. Whether it was the best or not, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) did not say; but he did not think it was possible now to make the change. He hoped his hon. Friend would not press the Amendment. It would appear to be a matter that deserved a thorough consideration, if brought forward earlier; but now, certainly, it was too late to bring it forward.

MR. FINIGAN said, as it was a very late hour, and it was agreed that this was an important new clause, he thought the Committee could not do better than close the Sitting, and he would move that the Chairman do now report Progress.

ment, but also in aid of the fishermen of that district. He had himself, within the last four or five weeks, been in districts—he referred especially to 40 miles of coast—where there was not a landing place where a boat could be drawn up. The districts were barren, and the ordinary means for building those piers were altogether wanting. There was one hard case which he wished especially to bring to the notice of the Committee. That was the case of a pier and harbour of refuge at Ballycotton that was urgently needed. A pier was already built there by the Board of Works; but it did not go far enough into the sea. There was no turning point where fishing boats could get out of the roll of the sea and lie up; and many boats had been wrecked there, not only on coming in, but actually when lying at the pier. He believed that to construct a harbour of refuge there would not cost more than about £10,000, in which both boats and fishing vessels could lie. Application had been made with regard to that pier to the Board of Works; and the answer had been that, as the law then stood, their application could not be entertained. The place lay in the centre of an exceedingly distressed district. He understood that the Guardians had unanimously—or, at any rate, by a large majority—agreed to apply to have the Union scheduled, and their application had been refused, on the ground that the construction of that pier totally excluded them from consideration. Therefore, he would earnestly appeal to his right hon. Friend that he would consider the advisability of granting that £15,000 in aid of that Vote; and that such works as those at Ballycotton, to which he had alluded, might be taken into consideration in preference to others which lay in districts which were not absolutely entitled to be termed distressed districts.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that in answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. A. M. Sullivan), who had appealed to him, it appeared to him (Mr. W. E. Forster) that they thought he had the key of the Treasury. He had not got it, and he would inform the hon. and learned Member that it was not his (Mr. Forster's) money that he was asking for, but the money of the people, which was to be raised by taxation. He must state that he did not think the Government could increase the grant. In so doing, they would be acting quite contrary to all precedent, and nothing but a very strong case would induce them to allow of an increase. He must honestly say that he thought the authorities had done quite right in being reluctant to give public money in such an unprecedented way. He was perfectly sure that it was not in his power to increase the Vote, and if the Amendment was proposed he should be in favour of the Vote remaining at £30,000.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he wished to say a few words, as he was deeply interested in that question. He thought that the grant was utterly insufficient, and he would call the attention of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) to the fact that before long £40,000 would be required for a harbour at Galway. It was not, he knew, a fishery harbour; but that sum alone amounted to within £5,000 of the Vote they now were to receive. With regard to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he would beg to say that the grant of Imperial money for local harbours was not altogether so unprecedented as he wished to make out. Imperial money had been given to matters partly Imperial and partly local before then; and, as that money would go to assist in the construction of harbours of refuge, it was necessary, he thought, that Imperial as well as local funds should contribute. He understood from the hon. Member for the County of Waterford (Mr. Blake), who was the highest authority upon that subject, that according to the present system the power of giving money for fishery piers was, practically considered, rather decreased than increased, and that heavier conditions were to be required from those making applications than were required before. He thought the grant might well be increased to £60,000. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Forster) had stated that he had not the key of the Treasury; but he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) understood that the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury had it. He would suggest that the way out of the difficulty was to grant the £45,000, and also continue the annual grant of £5,000.

must say that he could not regard it in that light. That was an epithet that could hardly with propriety be applied to any Supplemental Vote. Whether or no the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) was right in characterizing the Bill as a sham, there could be no doubt that contributions were to be paid in aid of local works. With regard to the remarks of the hon. Member (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) who had just spoken, as to a single harbour absorbing the whole sum, he would beg to point out to him that the money for fishery piers was limited to comparatively small works, and would not be employed for piers for shipping and such larger craft. For that reason they did not see why the Vote should be increased to £45,000. He was not prepared to say that in the present state of the Exchequer the amount could be increased. It was intended, however, to continue the usual grant of £5,000.

MR. PARNELL said, it appeared from the remarks of the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) that the Treasury would be threatened with bankruptcy in case that grant were increased to £45,000. That only showed to what desperate devices hon. Gentlemen might be driven in order to avoid any increase of expenditure. He did think that such a sum as £45,000 was a poor miserable sum considering what was required to be spent on the West Coast of Ireland. The Inspectors of Fisheries had recommended that some harbours should be built. They asked for that purpose for a Vote of £45,000, and £15,000 was to be given by Canada and Liverpool, making a total of £60,000, and that was all that could be obtained, in order that the fishermen might reap the magnificent harvest that Providence sent them. As a measure for the relief of distress it was equally miserable. He was sorry that the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury had not seen his way to be more generous in that matter. £45,000 was a poor contribution out of the Exchequer for the relief of distress. It was not what they might have expected from a great country, and he thought that they should have received a sum equal to the emergency—say £100,000. It would not ruin England to give a grant of that kind, and the advantage and benefit of it to the poor fishermen on the Western Coast of Ireland would render them perfectly satisfied. Upon studying the question he had become so convinced of the great necessity that existed for a larger sum of money to be expended that he had placed upon the Notice Paper, the previous night, a new clause, in order to enable the sum of £250,000 to be given for that purpose out of the Church Surplus Fund, and he hoped that when the time came for considering that clause the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Forster) would see his way to agree to it. He knew of no purpose to which the Church Surplus Fund could be better put than in national works of that kind, and thus to improve the industrial resources of the country, and increase the wage-earning power, and so relieve those who were then dependent upon relief Committees for their daily bread. He had merely referred incidentally to his own clause, which he hoped to introduce. Looking at the history of the distress in Ireland, he was afraid to think what the state of things would have been had it not been for the magnificent contributions they had received from the United States and far-off Australia. He trusted that the Government would not limit their contributions to the miserable grant of £45,000.

MR. BLAKE said, he had heard the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland with regard to that matter; but he could adduce very strong claims for assistance in the matter of piers and harbours. Fifty years ago a Bill was passed in that House to abolish the grant of £5,000 for harbours in Ireland; but it continued the contribution of £3,000 which had been paid to Scotland. The grant was removed from Ireland, and continued to Scotland, which he believed at the present time did not want a single harbour. Since the Act of Union, Scotland had obtained £1,500,000 more than Ireland for fisheries; and until a very few years ago Scotland received £7,000 over and above the sum granted to Ireland for the same purpose. It would be a mistaken policy on the part of the right hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord—for if the right hon. Gentleman had not the key of the Treasury the noble Lord had it—not to sanction the £15,000 additional being given. The right hon. Gentleman had sufficient information before him to know that not a third of the harbours could be completed with the proposed sum. There were four harbours in his (Mr. Blake's) own county, for which nothing could be done on account of lack of funds. Money was urgently needed to enable the unfortunate people living along those coasts to obtain a livelihood. If those harbours were not completed, the right hon. Gentleman might depend upon it that, on a future occasion, they would have to come before the House and ask for a larger grant to relieve the necessity of the population. He hoped, therefore, that he would be induced to increase the grant to £60,000.

MR. WARTON said, that as an English Member who viewed with the greatest concern some of the revolutionary schemes of the Government for confiscating property in Ireland, and who disagreed with that policy, he should wish to say a few words on that occasion in behalf of Ireland. He thought that, instead of confiscation and revolutionary measures, the best English policy was to develop the material resources of that country; and he must say that, for developing such resources as the railway system and fisheries, the sum under discussion appeared very small indeed. He earnestly hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who was very often squeezed to a considerable extent, would give what was a fair and legitimate sum for that purpose. He asked him, as the Minister of the Crown then present, to acquiesce in what had fallen from two different Irish Members of Parliament—namely, that £60,000 was required, and to grant that Amendment. He (Mr. Warton) could not agree with what had fallen from the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish) as regarded the state of the Imperial Exchequer. Certainly, with the present Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Budget that had been laid before them, they could, he believed, well afford to part with some of the income they were sure to have. In all probability, the arrangements were intended to produce a larger sum to the Exchequer than they were told of. The calculations were, no doubt, arranged so as to produce a considerable surplus in order that they might look with astonishment at the wonderful financial ability of the Chancellor of the

MAJOR NOLAN said, he hoped that as the appeal for an additional £15,000 had the support of the whole of the Conservative Party present in the House, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would not be hard-hearted, but give way on the point.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, they had been charged with hard-heartedness, and their generosity had been appealed to. But it was absurd to talk of hard-heartedness in the matter; what they had to consider was the general requirements of the Public Service and the interests of the country all round. It was quite an exceptional thing to make a grant at all, more so one of £30,000, and still more so to be asked to increase it afterwards to £45,000. He must repeat to the Committee that he did not think it possible to go any further than the sum they had stated. He was bound to state that £45,000 was what they had been asked for, and probably if they had granted £60,000 they would have been asked for £80,000, and if they had given £80,000, hon. Members would have asked for £100,000, and so on. There had been a good deal of talk about different harbours about the country; but that was not the object which had been brought before the Government. It was the case of the stormy West Coast, where fishing was the only alternative occupation, and they were asked that small harbours might be constructed. He would not put his information against that of the hon. Member for Waterford County (Mr. Blake); but they had acted on the testimony of the Fishery Department, and several piers were expected to be made at a small cost. No doubt a great deal was required to be done; but it could not all be done under that Act. It was impossible, by the present measure, to develop the resources of Ireland. When that was done, it ought, he thought, to be done by loan and not by grant. He was sorry that what they had done was referred to as being miserable. The only reply he could give to that was, that it was not their own money they were dealing with, but they were the trustees of the money of the public. He never expected to get much thanks for the grant, if any. There was no reason why they should be thanked for doing what was best, considering the balancing of the claims of all concerned, and the exceptional circumstances of the case. He believed that the £40,000 they had, or even the £30,000 of the grant, would give a good number of cottiers in those distressed districts employment, and they had apparently nothing to do at present but miserable cultivation—no alternative employment whatever.

MR. DALY said, they ought to bear in mind the circumstances under which the grant was given. They might be told hereafter that when the question was raised they had not stated that £45,000 would be insufficient. That sum of £45,000 consisted partly of £10,000 from Canada, and £5,000 from Liverpool, making together £15,000. If he understood the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) rightly, he had said that, in case those contributions were by any means diminished, the Government would increase their grant in proportion. Could he not see his way to making the increase without that diminution taking place? They only asked for a sum of £15,000, which represented only £450 a-year. The whole question was a paltry one, and he trusted the Government would see their way to yield to the wishes of Irish Members with regard to it.

Question put, and agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

MR. BLAKE moved as an Amendment, in page 3, line 21, after "eighty," to insert "one."

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the special object of the Government in inserting the date 1880 was to give immediate relief; but he would not object to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Terms upon which Commissioners may undertake works).

MR. BLAKE, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 26, to leave out from "Commissioners" to "Commissioners," in line 35, and instead of "Commissioners" insert "they," said, he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to that and the following

Amendment which he had on the Paper. If the clause were agreed to as it stood, not a single harbour would be erected on the West of Ireland, or anywhere else. The local contributions, being a fourth of the whole cost, were raised with the greatest possible difficulty. These districts were distressed districts, and it was not easy to raise the necessary amount. The conditions, as put in this 6th clause, amounted to this—that in the event of the estimate formed by the engineer of the Board of Works falling short of the sum required for completing the work, the locality must undertake to give their proportion, or a fourth of whatever might be in excess. Supposing the estimated sum for a harbour was £2,000. The engineer had gone down, and made an examination, and said that was the sum required. The Board of Works gave £1,500, and the locality raised £500 by local contributions. There was a condition of that character at present; but the locality was not bound to any sum in excess. The work might come to £3,000 or £4,000, and with the condition compelling the excess sum to be contributed locally in proportion, it would be hopeless at present to get the conditions complied with. It was hard enough to get the fourth, as calculated in the first instance. What he wished was, that when an engineer officer of the Board of Works went down, and made an inspection, in the event of the work not being completed for the estimated sum, the excess should be drawn out of the Consolidated Fund. As it stood at present, so far as the piers and harbours on the West of Ireland were concerned, the Bill was not worth the paper it was printed on. From his experience as a Fishery Inspector, he knew that the localities would not bind themselves to a fourth of whatever the excess over the estimate might be. He asked the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) and the Chief Secretary for Ireland to ponder well on what he said, and, if necessary, to suspend the clause until they had communicated with the Fishery Board in Ireland; and if they did not confirm what he said he would withdraw his opposition to the clause.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, he fully admitted that, with this provision, there would be great difficulty in the way of immediate expenditure of this money. He was willing to withdraw the words, and accept the first Amendment, but not the second. If it was found that the actual cost was likely to exceed the original estimate, then the matter would stand over for consideration. The object of the hon. Member would be attained if he (Lord Frederick Cavendish) consented, as he now did, to the withdrawal of those words.

Mr. PARNELL said, what would be the effect of adopting the first Amendment and not the second one? It appeared to him, in that case, the work would be stopped, and not proceeded with.

Mr. BLAKE said, as the law stood at present, if the estimate amounted to £2,000, and the proposal of a contractor to £3,000, it was optional for them to say that they would go on or not; but as the clause stood it was compulsory. His subsequent Amendment was to the effect that when the Board of Works engineer estimated the cost, and it was found when the work was proceeded with that an extra sum would be needed, then that sum would be borne by the Board of Works. If they made a blunder, it was right that the sum needed should come from them.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving a further Amendment, in page 3, line 40, after "that," to leave out to end of paragraph in page 4, and insert—

"In any case where the actual cost shall exceed that estimated by the Engineer of the Board of Works, then the entire of such excess shall be defrayed out of any moneys placed at the disposal of the Commissioners by Parliament for the making of loans or grants,"

said, it was a very reasonable proposal. As Inspector of Fisheries, he had recommended harbours to be made, and got the parties to raise the sum originally estimated; but it was found that the contractors estimated higher, and numerous useful works had, in consequence, to be abandoned. In the present impoverished state of the country that was more likely to occur than ever. The works were of a very simple character, and required no great engineering skill to calculate the cost; and if reckless calculations were made the cost should come from the Board of Works. If the proposal was not acceded to, a great deal of the good intention of the Bill would be destroyed.

Lord Frederick Cavendish

Mr. RAMSAY said, he hoped, before the right hon. Gentleman acceded to the Amendment, he would consider the source from which the money, if it was required in consequence of the error of the engineers, was to be drawn. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) had no care of the interests of the taxpayers of Great Britain. It was said that the money for the relief of the Irish distress was to be taken from the Irish Church Surplus Fund. For that very reason, the matter had received less consideration on the part of the Members for Great Britain than it would have done if the money was to be taken from the Consolidated Fund; but the proposal now before them was to take from an Imperial fund the money required for works in Ireland, as to the value of which there was room for diversity of opinion; and he conceived it would be necessary to pause before granting the principle of this Amendment, which would impose a burden upon the taxpayers of this country without regard to their wants and wishes. He protested against the adoption of the Amendment, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not accede to it. He had listened with great interest to the discussion that had taken place, and had heard, with pleasure, the persistent efforts of hon. Members opposite to get money for purposes which might be of use to the people of Ireland; but when they came to ask for money which would come out of the pockets of people living on the West Coasts of Great Britain, where harbours were as much needed as in Ireland, he thought it was requisite to pause. There was a point beyond which the Members for Scotland and England could not be expected to go.

Mr. BARRY said, unless this Amendment was adopted by the Committee, the whole clause would be, to a large extent, practically inoperative. There was the keenest distress in this part of the country, and he was quite sure the prospect of a large and indefinite expenditure would deter any expenditure whatever. The Government ought to consent to the Amendment. If the Government Inspector sent down to make an estimate made a serious blunder, and fell short by some thousands of the amount required, it was a hard case that an impoverished district had to contribute to meet a portion of the blunder.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, if the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) would withdraw the Amendment, he would move that the whole of the paragraph dealing with excess be deleted, so as to meet the Amendment previously carried.

MR. BLAKE said, he wished the Board of Works to make correct estimates; and where they did not make correct estimates it was a small affair that they should pay the excess. If they made an erroneous calculation they should pay for it, and useful works should not be abandoned.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, if the words he (Mr. Forster) had alluded to were struck out, then Notice would be published of the intentions of the Board of Works to undertake the works, and, by the clause, the works would be proceeded with. The suggestion of the hon. Member to insert words in the clause went a great deal further. With regard to the estimates, he said the engineer ought to be quite safe. The result of putting it in that way would probably be disadvantageous to the matter in hand; for it would be a strong stimulus to the engineer to put the estimate at too great a height, so as to be within the actual outlay. He thought the clause might be fairly left without any proviso. The result would be that upon the reception of a Report the Board of Works would begin the work. They would spend three-fourths of the money upon it; and he did not think it at all likely they would give it up without very strong reasons. What they probably would do, if left to themselves, was to ask the parties locally interested whether they could not subscribe the other fourth.

MR. BLAKE said, he did not want to worry the right hon. Gentleman, because he had been worried enough; but he could give cases in point where the work was left unfinished, and liable to be swept away with the first heavy storm, in consequence of localities being unable or unwilling to meet expenses beyond the estimated cost. They might depend upon it, if this was put upon the Board of Works, the estimates would be correctly made.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not think there would be any difficulty in raising the fourth, as he could not believe that the distress was so great that the very small sum of a fourth of the excess could not be found. He thought they could leave it safely with the Board of Works.

MR. BLAKE said, to save further trouble, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR complained that a very useful provision of the Piers and Harbours Act would not be available under the terms of the Bill. Clause 4 of the Fishery Piers Act prescribed the conditions under which a grant should be made as follows:—

“And the amount of any such grant shall not exceed three-fourths of the total actual cost of any such work, and such grant shall only be made on condition that the repayment of the residue of such grant shall be secured or agreed to be secured by the county or district, or proprietors of lands, which or who, as hereinafter [directed, ought, in the opinion of the said Commissioners, to provide for securing the same.”

The 5th clause went on to provide that not only might the Commissioners grant three-fourths of the total expenses, but that if the locality failed to provide the other fourth the Commissioners might advance it on loan at interest. Now, it seemed to him (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) that, considering the difficulties which had beset many of these piers in different parts of Ireland, it would be a very good thing if the Government would consent to leave in that provision, in order that, in cases of emergency, the Board of Works might have the power to advance on loan that fourth part which the locality could not supply.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) rather misunderstood the objects with which they started, one of which was to get the work done as quickly as possible, and that was why they had not put in these clauses of the Fishery Piers Act.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Power to undertake works); and Clause 8 (Management and maintenance of works when constructed) severally agreed to.

Clause 9 (Supplementary provision as to presentments).

MAJOR NOLAN suggested that the clause should be postponed, because it contained a reference to Clause 4.

Question, "That Clause 9 be postponed," put, and agreed to.

Clause 10 (Interpretation).

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in moving, as an Amendment, to add the following words in page 5, line 17:—

"The term 'scheduled union' means a Poor Law Union, which, or any division of which, was comprised in any Schedule published by the Commissioners of Public Works in the 'Dublin Gazette' as a union or division in which loans might be made in accordance with the notices of the said Commissioners dated the twenty-second day of November one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine and the twelfth day of January one thousand eight hundred and eighty,"

said, he moved the addition of these words to define the meaning of the term "scheduled Unions." It was necessary to put in that definition.

MR. CALLAN said, he had hoped the right hon. Gentleman would have continued the discretion of the Local Government Board, and not have confined the Bill to the Unions which were scheduled several months ago, because since then distress had arisen in other Unions, and more accurate information could now be obtained. He thought they should give the Local Government Board full power to name the Unions.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought that, considering what the Committee had done in the earlier part of the evening, they ought to take the same definition here as there. He would withdraw the Amendment, and define the Unions in the same manner as they had been defined by previous Amendments.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Question, "That the postponed clauses be postponed until after the new clauses have been considered," put, and agreed to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER moved, as an Amendment, in page 5, after Clause 9, to insert the following Clause:—

(Amendment of terms of loans to boards of guardians.)

"The fourth and fifth sections of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880,' shall be amended, so far as relates to scheduled Unions, as follows (that is to say):—

"(1) The term for which money may be borrowed by the board of guardians of any scheduled union shall be extended to twelve years. The rate of interest at which the Commissioners of Public Works may lend to any such board of guardians shall be reduced to one per centum per annum; and, in the case of any loan by the Commissioners of Public Works to any such board of guardians, the payment of the first instalment payable in respect of such loans may, with the consent of the Treasury, be postponed for any period not exceeding two years from the making of the loan, and no interest shall be charged on such loan during any such period of postponement of payment of the first instalment;

"(2) In addition to the purposes specified in the said fourth section as the purposes for which a board of guardians may borrow, any board of guardians which has contracted any loan under the provisions of the said Act may borrow money to pay off such loan;

"(3) So much as may be necessary of the said sum of one million five hundred thousand pounds payable by the Commissioners of Church Temporalities to the Commissioners of Public Works shall be applied by the Commissioners of Public Works in making good any advance by way of loan which they may make to a board of guardians under the authority of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880,' upon the terms prescribed by this Act;

"The provisions of the nineteenth section of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880,' shall apply to the repayment of all amounts advanced as last aforesaid by way of loan to Boards of Guardians, as fully as if such advances had been specified in that section."

The right hon. Gentleman said, that whereas Boards of Guardians were empowered to give out-door relief, and to borrow money, which the National Debt Commissioners were to lend at the usual terms of 3½ per cent, the Amendment was to enable the Boards to borrow out of the Church Surplus Fund for the same term of years, with an additional two years at no interest, and afterwards interest at only 1 per cent.

New Clause (Amendment of terms of loans to Boards of Guardians) brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That the Clause be now read a second time."—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. GIBSON said, he was not sure that he thoroughly understood the clause. He understood the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) to state that it was to enable money to be advanced to Boards of Guardians at 1 per cent out of the Irish Church Surplus; but that was not, he thought, the construction of the clause, taking it altogether. It was to be read, of course, in connection with the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880, which it sought to amend; and that enabled loans to be made to Guardians out of money provided by Parliament. Bearing that in mind, let them read the clause proposed. The clause was divisible into three sub-sections; the first being that the term for which money might be borrowed should be extended to 12 years. That was a general statement; it might be good or bad policy, but he did not dispute it. The second enabled Boards to borrow money to pay off those loans, and he did not question the prudence of that. But then came the 3rd sub-section, which, in no respect, governed or was controlled by the previous sub-sections. It was entirely independent, and might stand or fall by itself. It might be struck out or retained, and would not operate in the slightest degree upon the two previous ones. He should say it was subsidiary and complementary, but not governing. But did the right hon. Gentleman mean to exclude all other resources than the Church Surplus? He apprehended that if the clause were passed, money voted by Parliament would be a source out of which loans might have to be made, so far as it was necessary to supplement this £1,500,000.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."
—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

COLONEL COLTHURST moved, as an Amendment, in line 5, to leave out "twelve" and insert "thirty-five." He admitted that some of the reasons which might induce the Committee to accept the Amendment had been modified by the action of his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) with respect to the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell); but he (Colonel Colthurst) claimed the credit of having made the proposal when the hon. Member for Cork City moved his Bill for the relief of distress. He (Colonel Colthurst) then suggested that the Boards of Guardians should be the channel through which relief should be given. He had been denounced in Ireland by the special protégés of his hon. Friend opposite, and he supposed those denunciations would now be withdrawn, seeing that the hon. Gentleman had practically adopted his suggestion. In February last he proposed that the same favourable terms as were given to the landlords—namely, loans for 35 years at 1 per cent interest, should be given to Boards of Guardians for purposes of out-door relief, because he had all along felt that the true way to meet this crisis was through the liberal administration of Poor Law relief; but that the Guardians ought to be forced to give out-door relief, and they could not force them to do so unless they gave them liberal terms. The question was, whether, after the concession Her Majesty's Government had made, the Amendment was still necessary. He humbly submitted it was, because, as the hon. Member for Dublin (Dr. Lyons) had pointed out, the £200,000 to be given in grants, as proposed by the hon. Member for Cork City, would go but a very little way. Perhaps it was because he was enamoured of his own suggestion; but he believed that his proposal to advance £200,000 and such further sums as might be found necessary for 35 years at 1 per cent was a better proposal, taking the interest of the poor into consideration, than the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork City, which had been adopted by the Government. However, that was a matter that was done, and he would now ask the Government to accept his Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER proposed to alter the wording of the first sub-section of his clause by omitting the words "scheduled Unions" and inserting the words—

"Any union authorized to give out-door relief under the 3rd Section of 'The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880.'"

MR. CALLAN was afraid the words would have a restrictive effect. He wished to leave the Local Government Board full power to extend the provisions of the Act to any Unions in which circumstances might hereafter occur which, in their opinion, justified such extension. He would suggest that the words "scheduled Unions" be left out and not replaced by any other definition, unless it were made to read in this way—"Any Board of Guardians approved of by the Local Government Board." That would leave the Board perfectly free.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought the words he had proposed were sufficient. The Poor Law Board had full power to use its discretion with regard to the Unions.

MR. CALLAN said, if the hands of the Board were not tied, he was satisfied; but he should like to know the exact effect of the Amendment. To what Unions would the operation of the clause be restricted?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied, that it would be restricted to whatever Unions the Local Government Board found it necessary, in consequence of the state of distress, to give out-door relief. It applied to all Ireland upon the discretion of the Local Government Board.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he would repeat his Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would not press the Amendment. He hoped the Boards of Guardians would be able to get on with the grants; but, if they required loans, he thought it would be better not to have more than the two descriptions of loans now existing and the possible grants. Besides, 35 years was a dangerously long time.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, of course, he would not press his Amendment against the wish of the right hon. Gentleman or the Committee; but he regarded the administration of out-door relief as the real, vital question at that moment, and he wished to induce the Boards to be liberal in giving out-door relief. Therefore, he thought there was quite as good a case for granting loans for that purpose as for sanitary purposes.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he understood the point of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) to be that these loans should not be extended to every purpose for which Boards of Guardians might borrow.

MR. GIBSON explained that, in his view, the construction of the clause seemed to supersede the right of borrowing from Imperial funds.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that was not the intention. It was intended to confine the clause entirely to loans borrowed for the purpose of out-door relief. He would introduce some explanatory words on the Report.

MR. GIBSON pointed out that a consequential Amendment must be made in the two other sub-sections of the clause, in accordance with the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had proposed, as to the definition of the Unions. If they inserted the words "of any Union as aforesaid" it would make the sections harmonize. He wished to know whether certain Unions which had borrowed money under the old system would have the benefit of the new proposal? He also suggested that in the 3rd sub-section the word "necessary" should be replaced by the word "available;" because it was obvious that they were putting so much on this £1,500,000, that if it were made compulsory to do everything out of it, according to that Amendment, it would be an impossibility.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would accept the words "of any Union as aforesaid." Three or four Unions had already borrowed money since the last Bill, though not to a large extent; and, of course, they would feel themselves in a very unfair position if neighbouring Unions were now enabled to get loans at a cheaper rate. That was the reason why this clause was put in. He moved to omit, in lines 15 and 16, all the words from "in addition" down to "borrow."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That those words stand part of the sub-section."

MR. GIBSON said, he was not sure that identity of meaning would be accomplished in that way, and would suggest that the necessary alteration of the wording might be done on Report.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would like to get it done now. He would, therefore, move to insert in the same sub-section the words—

after striking out from "any," in line 16, to "Act," in line 18.

and in this I am supported by the concurrent opinion of almost every officer whom I have talked with on the subject, from Field Marshals down to subalterns, of the highest educational authorities, and; I must add, by the general common sense of the public—that a better system might be introduced, which would secure all the good results of the present system without any of its inherent disadvantages, of which examples from time to time, though, I admit, not very flagrant ones, are seen. Mr. Cardwell said, “Let us have the most learned officers we can get, provided they pass a medical examination;” which I know, on excellent authority, was some time ago far from a severe one. I say, Let us have the best men all round, intellectually and physically, as far as competitive examination can enable us to test them. And do not let us be told that, if riding is one of the subjects, injustice will be done to the sons of parents who cannot afford to mount their sons. The object is not to secure a good race, but the best winners. As I said once before, in taking servants ourselves, we look to their qualifications for the work they have to do; we do not ask what facilities for obtaining the requisite training they had enjoyed. As there may be, and in past times has been, an unfair preference for favoured families in military as well as civil appointments, so there may be an unfair preference for less qualified over better qualified candidates for the Army under a false plea of fair play. All we have to look to is obtaining the best article we can for our money, without giving any unfair protection to inferior articles, because they happen to be of the middle instead of the higher class. A fair field and no favour is the sound principle. If riding, which is a very important one, be, which I do not believe, such a very costly accomplishment to acquire, let the country have the advantage of officers who have become efficient in it at no expense to the Treasury. Do not us have in these days a disguised Protection for inferiority in qualifications, a clap-trap favouritism to the relatives of middle-class constituents. I have been for 40 years a Free Trader, and I protest against Protection to high or low, middle class or wage class. In conclusion, I will very shortly recapitulate the
